They faced a chicken-or-egg problem: The boilers needed water to make steam to generate electricity to drive the pumps that could then replenish the water in the boilers and keep them running. If the boilers could stay up long enough, they could generate enough power to work the pumps that pull water out of the river and keep the system from running dry.

The first try required manually filling the boilers and overriding all sorts of safety mechanisms. The plant came back to life for 20 minutes, but the boilers ran out of water and had to be shut down again.

The operators regrouped and tried again the next day, with a firetruck delivering water to help prime the boilers. This time the system stayed up for an hour.

On the third day, the plant had enough city power to run the pumps drawing water from the river, which flows by gravity into the acres of open basins and treatment tanks. This essentially "primed" the plant.

This time it worked. The engineers fired up the boilers, which did not run out of water. The turbines made enough power to drive the high-pressure distribution pumps, keeping the boilers full.

On Sunday, Fouchi and his colleagues started disinfecting the water for the first time since the storm. It's not yet good enough to drink. But 90 million gallons a day are in circulation, driven by the big heart that's back at work.

La. Deaths At 423; Facility Owners Charged (AJC/AP)

By Adam Nossiter, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — In a day of reckoning across battered New Orleans, the owners of a nursing home were charged in the deaths of dozens of patients killed by Hurricane Katrina's floodwaters, the death toll in Louisiana jumped to 423, and the mayor warned that the city is broke.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin said the city was working "feverishly" with banking and federal officials to secure lines of credit through the end of the year, but for now, it is unable to make its next payroll.

Amid the discouraging news, there were also clear signs of progress on many fronts: The New Orleans airport reopened to commercial flights, the port resumed operations, and the mayor said dry sections of the ravaged city — including the French Quarter and the central business district — could be reopened during the daytime as early as Monday, provided the Environmental Protection Agency finds the air is safe.

"We're out of nuclear-crisis mode and into normal, day-to-day crisis mode," Nagin said.

Entergy-New Orleans said it had restored power to 75 percent of the 1.1 million customers that were out at the height of the storm. And Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said most of the military's search and rescue work was complete.

President Bush also put a final word on what he had called the "blame game" among politicians, saying: "I take responsibility" for the government's failures in dealing with the hurricane.

The death toll from Hurricane Katrina climbed more than 50 percent in a single day Tuesday to 423, including last week's grisly discovery of 34 dead patients and staff members at St. Rita's nursing home in the town of Chalmette in hard-hit St. Bernard Parish.

In the nursing home case, Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti charged the husband-and-wife owners of St. Rita's with 34 counts of negligent homicide for not doing more to save their elderly patients.

"The pathetic thing in this case was that they were asked if they wanted to move them and they did not," Foti said. "They were warned repeatedly that this storm was coming. In effect, their inaction resulted in the deaths of these people."

Salvador A. Mangano and his wife, Mable, were released on $50,000 bond each.

Their attorney, Jim Cobb, said his clients were innocent.

Cobb said they followed the nursing home's evacuation plan that had been filed with officials, and he blamed the St. Bernard Parish officials for not ensuring the plan was proceeding.

"They sat and waited for a mandatory evacuation order from the officials of St. Bernard Parish that never came," he said.

Cobb said the Manganos were forced to make a difficult decision as the hurricane approached: evacuate the patients, many of them elderly and on feeding tubes, or keep them comfortable at the home through the storm.

"If you pull that trigger too soon (on evacuation) those people are going to die," Cobb said.

Tammy Daigle, a nurse who worked at the home, also said the owners had been worried about trying to evacuate some residents of the home who they knew wouldn't survive the move.

Tom Rodrigue, whose mother was among the dead, was still angry and near tears.

"She deserved the chance, you know, to be rescued instead of having to drown like a rat," he told CNN.

In addition to St. Rita's, the attorney general said he is investigating the discovery of more than 40 corpses at flooded-out Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans. A hospital official said the 106-degree heat inside the hospital as the patients waited for days to be evacuated probably contributed to the deaths.

Even though the airport and waterfront were running at just a fraction of their capacity, the symbolic importance was not lost on a city that only days before had all but collapsed into looting and desperation.

"From a commercial and psychological standpoint, this is five stars," port president Gary LaGrange said between an outgoing barge shipment of auto parts to Alabama and the arrival of a ship carrying coffee and wood from Argentina, Brazil and Mexico. "This shows the people of New Orleans their city is back in business."

Some experts had predicted it would take up to six months to get the port operating again after the hurricane damaged terminals and knocked out the electricity to operate cranes. A backlog of vessels had formed along the Mississippi River, waiting to load and unload cargo.

The Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport, which escaped widespread damage from Katrina but was reserved for humanitarian flights in the storm's aftermath, received its first commercial arrival, a flight with about two dozen emergency workers and returning residents.

"Welcome home," airport director Roy Williams said as he greeted the passengers. "We're glad to see you."

Airport officials hope to be up to 60 flights a day within the week and back to full operation of 350 flights a day in six months. Before Katrina hit, the airport was on pace for a record 10 million passengers this year.

During a tour of hurricane-stricken Mississippi, U.S. Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta pronounced Katrina the worst disaster for transportation in U.S. history and estimated the damage to bridges and highways — including broken and disjointed stretches of vital Interstate 10 — at $3 billion.

The Army Corps of Engineers reported significant progress running the operation to pump out flooded areas of New Orleans and neighboring parishes.

Col. Duane Gapinski estimated that half of the flooded area or less was still under water, and at the rate of 8 billion to 9 billion gallons a day, the city was on target to be almost completely drained by Oct. 8.

The mayor said more than 40 pumping stations were operating in the city, including the city's biggest pump.

"That will change the world as we know it," he said.

Amid the encouraging signs from the streets, there were promises from the White House and the Federal Emergency Management Agency to learn from their mistakes and intensify efforts to help the victims.

In Washington, Bush said "I take responsibility" for the government's failures in dealing with the hurricane, and he said the disaster raised questions about the nation's ability to respond to natural disasters as well as terrorist attacks.

"Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack? That's a very important question and it's in the national interest that we find out what went on so we can better respond," the president said.

The new acting director of FEMA, R. David Paulison, also promised to get thousands of evacuees out of shelters and into temporary housing.

"We're going to move on and get them the help they need," Paulison said in his first public statements since taking over the job.

Port Comes Back Early, Surprisingly (WP)

By Keith L. Alexander And Neil Irwin

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 13 -- The Port of New Orleans began unloading its first cargo ship since Hurricane Katrina on Tuesday night, months sooner than was predicted, a sign that disruption to the nation's shipping capacity may be less severe than originally forecast.

After the storm, port officials figured it would take six months to resume service in New Orleans and at facilities throughout the Gulf Coast. Importers scurried to reroute coffee, steel and other commodities, and Midwest farmers worried that they wouldn't be able to ship their grain to the rest of the world during the harvest. The disruption threatened the supply of goods across the United States, and some forecasters said it would cause a drag on the economy.

But Tuesday, the port was coming back to life, with electrical power restored to parts of the facility by late afternoon. About 8:30 p.m., the Lykes Flyer container ship pulled into the port, and towering cranes began lifting boxcar-size containers of plywood and coffee beans from the ship, as if they were children's building blocks. The goods were to be placed on trucks that would carry them out along newly cleared roads, for distribution across the nation.

Gary P. LaGrange, chief executive of the port, said he expects it to be at 80 percent of capacity within three months. The Port of South Louisiana and Port Fourchon, on the Gulf Coast, have also partially restored service, and the Port of Pascagoula, Miss., expects to resume service by early October, according to the American Association of Port Authorities.

That has made economists more optimistic about the hurricane's impact on the nation. "I was surprised at how quickly the ports got going again," said Mark M. Zandi, chief executive of Economy.com, a research firm. "The longer they remained closed, the greater the risk that we'd all be paying higher prices for coffee, cocoa, lumber, steel, zinc, aluminum and any number of other things. Now that things are going well, there's likely to be no measurable disruption at all."

That doesn't mean the economy is in the clear. Zandi noted that disruptions to energy production have been more persistent, and the drop in employment and production in the Gulf Coast is likely to be great. The improved expectations depend on continued progress, and there are no guarantees that it will continue at this pace, analysts said. Coastal Cargo Co., for example, operates barges from a terminal at the Port of New Orleans and on Monday shipped out a load of steel coils to an automaker in Alabama. But that was after a two-week effort to get back to business, and the company has only two -- instead of its usual 10 to 15 -- "gangs" of workers, each of which has about a dozen people. One of Coastal Cargo's barges was washed ashore in the storm, but was in decent condition, said Mike Lauland, the company's director of risk management. So it has been put to use to help clear out barges clogging shipping channels.

More will be needed to get the local economy fully back in business.

For example, Folgers coffee has a roasting plant in New Orleans that accounts for more than half its supply. For the first 10 days after the storm, it was unreachable except by helicopter, because of downed trees and security concerns on the roads. For the plant to be reopened, it needs a return of water, sewer and natural gas service, said Doug McGraw, vice president for global coffee at Folgers' parent company, Procter & Gamble.

There is enough green coffee in storage to supply the roasting plant for now, but without water and fuel, the company lacks the ability to turn bitter green coffee beans into the Folgers that shows up on shelves.

"We're hopeful that between starting some initial production, and living on inventories in the distribution centers and at retailers, the disruption to consumers will be limited," McGraw said. "But it's going to be a problem."

Nonetheless, the work at the Port of New Orleans proceeded at full speed Tuesday as workers toiled to reopen a trading hub through which 31 million tons of cargo flowed last year.

The faster-than-expected reopening came about through some bureaucratic arm-twisting, coordination between groups, and a careful focus on the most urgent areas for repair, said LaGrange and outside analysts.

"They're moving at light speed," said C. James Kruse, director of the Center for Ports and Waterways at the Texas Transportation Administration. "It's been an example of good cooperation between federal agencies and the port authority, and an action plan to get to the critical things first and fix other problems later."

LaGrange, a large, jovial man who Tuesday wore tennis shoes and a purple baseball cap that reads "Port of New Orleans," was celebrating his fourth year as head of the port. The most immediate problems, he said, were finding workers and getting a place for them to stay. The federal Maritime Administration provided ships with sleeping quarters, which are docked at the port and serve as floating dormitories for longshoremen and managers.

The port also collaborated with the dockworkers' union, the International Longshoremen's Association, to bring in workers from other ports. LaGrange said it was necessary because most Port of New Orleans employees were forced to leave the area and could not be located.

And state police are guarding the access roads from hijackers, and agreed to give truck drivers delivering goods to and from the port clearance to deliver their loads. Tyrone Dolese, 51, of Destrehan, La., is a clerk for the Port of New Orleans who usually works in the office. But because of a shortage of help, Dolese agreed to work outside under the hot afternoon sun at the Napoleon Avenue Container Terminal about five miles down the road to help prepare the cargo for export . He helped inspect containers that were to be a part of the first shipments exported.

"We are going to get this place back," he said.

The Region Starts To Stagger Back (WP)

By Evelyn Nieves

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

WIGGINS, Miss., Sept. 13 -- Once the local television station announced that hurricane money was finally coming to Stone County, word spread fast.

People began showing up in front of Stone High School just after 10 p.m. Monday. By 8 the next morning, when the Red Cross opened for business, the line was 4 1/2 blocks long.

This line was just to get a number for an appointment later in the week that could land a cash voucher. "We've been waiting 15 days, so I guess we can wait some more," said Waymon Parker, whose trailer was wrecked.

As relief agencies are starting to get around to the last coastal towns left on their lists, assessments of Hurricane Katrina's devastation to 80 miles of coast and reaching 150 miles inland are just getting underway. State officials could offer no figures for damage to the Gulf Coast, but they say that Mississippi will take years, if not decades, to rebuild.

More than 115,000 evacuees remain in Red Cross shelters or temporary housing, and tens of thousands of others are staying with relatives or in other temporary housing. Debris is virtually all that is left of some smaller coastal towns. The Federal Emergency Management Agency remains swamped with cries for help. The agency has identified more than 154,000 people in need of assistance so far, said a spokesman, Gene Romano. It anticipates perhaps hundreds of thousands more as hurricane victims who have been trying to reach FEMA finally get through.

At the same time, life has noticeably improved in the five coastal counties where Katrina unleashed the brunt of her fury -- Stone, Hancock, Harrison, Jackson and Pearl River, where about 435,000 people lived and the death toll has reached 218, with 600 people reported missing. More businesses open every day, power is back to 80 percent of the buildings that could receive power and lines for gasoline are back to normal.

The Gulf Coast has a future; on that, most agree. But whether it can re-create a culture that took more than 200 years to build, return with its blend of residents, black and white, rich and poor, old money and new immigrant, or will become an entirely new and unfamiliar version of itself -- that is another story.

Even as the immediate mop-up of Katrina has brought in thousands of National Guard crews and relief workers from all over the country, some in once-booming Mississippi coast towns are worrying about what will come afterward.

Mayor A.J. Holloway of Biloxi (population 55,000) is among them. Biloxi, home to 10 casinos and most of the Mississippi coast's shrimp industry, was devastated from its waterfront to well inland, with more than 5,000 structures destroyed and uncounted others too damaged to fix.

"We've lost our history, all of our landmarks," Holloway said. "We have some completely devastated areas, especially along the east end." Those included the city's old, working-class and poor neighborhoods, which casinos had coveted for years as prime real estate.

The Gulf Coast was the heart of Mississippi's floating casino industry, accounting for nearly half of the state's nearly $2.93 billion a year in gambling revenue. With the coast's 13 casinos destroyed by the hurricane, Mississippi, already the poorest state in the nation, is losing $500,000 in gambling taxes every day. Now the casino industry is lobbying for land-based alternatives to their former barges, and some fear the coast will look like a cut-rate Las Vegas, with slablike condominiums, cinder-block subdivisions and gaudy hotels.

The $700 million-a-year shrimping industry lost not only much of its fleet but also the processing plants needed to bring the shellfish to market, at the peak of the season.

The immediate cleanup of Katrina is just beginning. Garbage trucks have just started to roll through towns in the last few days, and schools are gearing up to open, in some places as early as next Monday, in others by the beginning of next month.

Officials on the Gulf Coast are also trying to find a way to ease traffic, now that it appears that Interstate 90, the major coastal highway, will not reopen for at least 90 days.

"If I'd said on August 29th that two weeks later we were going to be where we are now -- well, no one would believe me," said Col. Joe Spraggins, the relentlessly upbeat director of emergency operations for Harrison County (population 185,000). "I mean, we're doing great," he said. "I could see now that the future of the coast will be better than ever."

Others are not so sure. "We've lost 80 percent of Hancock County, at least," said Eddie Favre, the mayor of Bay St. Louis, which had 8,000 residents.

Its neighbor, Waveland, which had 7,000 residents, lost virtually its entire infrastructure and population. Only about two dozen residents remain, living off relief food and water.

Pass Christian, a city of about 8,500, was considered the little jewel of the coast, a place where tourists came just to gawk at its mix of antebellum mansions and century-old shotgun shacks. Almost the entire city is gone, save for between 50 to 100 houses on the east side, where residents have been holed up since the hurricane, said Joseph Piernas, an alderman there.

Those who lost their houses or businesses were finally allowed into Pass Christian to survey the damage Tuesday morning, though lines hours long have tried to get into the town every day for a week, only to be turned away by the National Guard.

"The good news is, people are saying they'll rebuild," Piernas said. "We have no idea when that can start."

The governor's office said 1,250 FEMA trailers or mobile homes were in a staging area in Jackson, 135 were ready for occupancy and 20 have been delivered to evacuees in Biloxi, where perhaps as many as 20,000 people need new places to live.

Much Wider Damage To Levees Is Disclosed (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The massive levee system protecting New Orleans has sustained heavy damage well beyond the five breaches that are widely known to have caused flooding after Hurricane Katrina, the Army Corps of Engineers said Monday.

Miles of levees that protected the eastern flank of the region, which borders Lake Borgne, washed away in the storm surge from Katrina, which swept inland and caused deep flooding in St. Bernard Parish and the 9th Ward of New Orleans.

Army officials disclosed the destruction of the city's eastern levee system in a detailed helicopter tour of the region Monday. Unlike some of the levees in New Orleans that continuously hold water back from areas below sea level, these levees exist mainly to repel storm surges.

The loss of the levees has left portions of New Orleans with little or no protection midway through the hurricane season, senior Army officials said. And rebuilding the levees will be a massive undertaking that could take years, meaning the city could be vulnerable for a long time.

"It is gone," said Col. Richard Wagenaar, the Army Corps' head engineer for the New Orleans district. "It is literally leveled in places. The power of the surge in this storm was greatly underestimated."

Wagenaar estimated that 90% of the levee system protecting the region's eastern flank had been knocked out.

The region is protected by two levees. One is formed by a 17-foot-high barrier along a shipping channel known as the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet. The controversial channel was built in the 1960s and has long stirred the ire of environmentalists and local officials, who say it has made the area more vulnerable to flooding by destroying the natural marshes that can blunt storm surges.

The other, lower levee further inland provides a second layer of defense for St. Bernard Parish and the 9th Ward.

As Katrina approached the Louisiana coastline from the south, it accumulated a wall of water possibly higher than 18 feet. As the storm continued north, its counterclockwise winds pushed the water westward. First, it surged into the bay known as Lake Borgne and then through a narrow barrier island. It next swept across the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet and then encountered the first levee.

Giant sections of that levee are heavily eroded or gone. The levees are made with piled dirt and rock with a steel sheet sandwiched vertically in the dirt. The steel is completely exposed in most of the area and badly deformed.

After sweeping past the levee, Katrina continued inland through a large marsh. Along the way, it deposited more than a dozen large shrimp boats and shipping barges, tossing them like toys.

"I don't know where those shrimp boats came from," Wagenaar said, shaking his head. "There are some pretty nice boats down there."

He predicted that many of the barges stuck hundreds of yards into the marshes would never be removed.

After the surge moved through the marsh, it hit the second levee, the last line of defense for residential neighborhoods. It destroyed that barrier, leaving deep bowls in the dirt where the surging water and waves scoured the soil. It then swept over the suburban neighborhoods on the other side.

The first blocks were heavily damaged or destroyed. An entire row of houses was pushed back a quarter of a mile into the woods. Other houses ended up in the middle of the street. It appears that much of the area will be a total loss, because the damage involves serious structural failures.

Army officials have said repeatedly that the levees and storm walls protecting New Orleans were never designed to handle a Category 4 or 5 hurricane such as Katrina. But now, without any levee system, the city's eastern flank could be vulnerable even to smaller storms.

It appears that St. Bernard Parish and the 9th Ward were hit from two sides. In addition to the surge from Lake Borgne, water poured through a breach in the Inner Harbor Navigation Channel.

The channel is part of the complex system of shipping, flood control and industrial ports that snakes its way through this city. It connects the Mississippi River, Lake Pontchartrain, the Intracoastal Waterway and ultimately the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet.

Engineers have temporarily patched all five of the breaches in sea walls around the city that are designed to keep water at bay. In addition to the Inner Harbor Navigation Channel, breaches also occurred at the 17th Street Canal and the London Avenue Canal.

Progress is being made in removing standing water from the city. The Army reports that about 6.5 billion gallons are being pumped out each day. Col. Duane Gapinski, who was appointed Sunday to run the "dewatering" team the Army has set up, estimates that the city should be dried out by mid-October at the latest.

Engineers Say A Key Levee Won't Be Set For Months (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - Hurricane Katrina washed away a 17-foot-tall earthen levee that had protected St. Bernard Parish, east of New Orleans, from the waters of a shipping canal, and the Army Corps of Engineers said Tuesday that the ravaged parish would be left defenseless against even small storms at least until early next year because replacing the structure would take months.

In a conference call with reporters, Col. Duane P. Gapinski of the corps acknowledged that the levee might not be rebuilt even by the start of next year's hurricane season.

On the other hand, Colonel Gapinski and other corps officials said, at this point there is little for the levee to protect. "St. Bernard Parish is complete destruction," he said.

Local authorities have ordered the parish evacuated and have said no one will be allowed to return for four months.

"It's going to take longer than four months to rebuild that levee, a lot longer than four months," even to restore it to the level of protection it afforded before the hurricane, Colonel Gapinski said. "But it's going to take a lot longer than four months to rebuild St. Bernard Parish."

The parish, which unlike New Orleans lies above sea level, was protected by the levee from the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet, a canal built by the corps that is now a subject of scrutiny. Completion of the canal four decades ago allowed saltwater intrusion that, the corps acknowledges, was a factor in the death of marshes that once helped protect the city from storm surges. Some experts say the canal may also have provided an express lane for the Aug. 29 surge to reach populated areas.

Corps officials report progress in pumping out floodwaters from New Orleans and adjacent areas. The city is now 50 percent inundated, they said Tuesday, from a high of 80 percent, with 27 permanent pumps and 46 temporary pumps moving a daily total of seven billion to eight billion gallons.

The corps on Tuesday stuck to its estimate of "dewatering" the main part of New Orleans by Oct. 2, and the East New Orleans section and St. Bernard Parish - barring new flooding - by Oct. 8. Plaquemines Parish will be dry by Oct. 18, the corps said.

Officials also reported that the Mississippi River was now open to deep-draft navigation along its entire length, although a small part of the southern end is limited to daylight transit because some aids to navigation have not yet been replaced.

Canal May Have Worsened City's Flooding (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

On May 19, Hassan Mashriqui addressed a roomful of emergency planners and warned of a "critical and fundamental flaw" in the coastal defenses for New Orleans. Mashriqui, a computer modeler at Louisiana State University's Hurricane Center, singled out the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet, a 40-year-old shipping canal aimed at the city's gut.

For years, local residents had decried the little-used canal as a "hurricane highway" that would deliver massive storm surges into their neighborhoods.

But now Mashriqui was offering proof. His hydrodynamic modeling showed that a "funnel" created by the Gulf Outlet and a nearby waterway would amplify storm surges by 20 to 40 percent. He described the funnel as "Crescent City's Trojan Horse," carrying the Gulf of Mexico's waters into the city.

"I showed how dangerous that outlet was -- there was no ambiguity," says Mashriqui, who came to the United States after a tropical cyclone devastated his native Bangladesh. "And now it's all come true."

Authorities have not yet concluded what caused the drowning of New Orleans, and most attention has focused on two breached floodwalls near Lake Pontchartrain, to the city's north. But now experts believe that the initial flooding that overwhelmed St. Bernard Parish and the Lower Ninth Ward of New Orleans came from the Gulf Outlet, a channel that was an ecological and economic disappointment long before Hurricane Katrina.

Satellite images show that levees along the outlet were severely damaged by storm surges. Flyovers by the Army Corps of Engineers have revealed a path of destruction consistent with Mashriqui's theory that the Outlet provided a pathway for storm surges from the Gulf and neighboring Lake Borgne.

Mashriqui had warned that the confluence of the MRGO and the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway created a funnel that would direct storm surges into the New Orleans Industrial Canal and on into St. Bernard Parish. On the Friday before Katrina made landfall, the parish's state senator, Walter Boasso, complained at a congressional hearing that the federal government was "playing Russian roulette" with his constituents.

Katrina's first storm surges apparently shot up the Gulf Outlet and neighboring Lake Borgne from the southeast, then overtopped levees along the Outlet and the Industrial Canal. The floodwaters eventually breached the Industrial Canal's levees, and officials believe a large portion of the Outlet's levees have been destroyed as well.

"That funnel was a back door into New Orleans," said G. Paul Kemp, an oceanographer at the LSU Hurricane Center. "I don't think there's much doubt that was the initial cause of the disaster."

In 1965, the Corps of Engineers completed the MRGO -- pronounced "Mr. Go" locally -- which was a larger dirt-moving project than the Panama Canal. It was designed as a 76-mile shipping shortcut from the Gulf of Mexico to the Port of New Orleans that would give cargo ships an alternative to the sinuous Mississippi River.

But less than 3 percent of the port's cargo -- fewer than one ship per day -- passes through it. MRGO's freight totals had dropped by half since 1994, while the port's had increased overall. But the Corps still spent $13 million dredging the canal last year.

Critics have calculated the cost to taxpayers at more than $12,000 per vessel per day, and the Outlet has destroyed or damaged more than 20,000 acres of adjacent wetlands.

Shirley Laska, director of the Center for Hazards Assessment, Response and Technology at the University of New Orleans, says local flood-control meetings have been dominated for years by complaints about the Outlet, but nothing has changed.

Before Katrina, the Corps was already studying whether to close the canal. The initial conclusion was no, but the Bush administration ordered the agency to redo its analysis.

The main advocates for the channel were the Port of New Orleans and its supporters in the Corps of Engineers and in Louisiana's congressional delegation. "You had the people of St. Bernard Parish against the Port of New Orleans," Boasso said at a community meeting Monday. "And the Port of New Orleans had the clout."

Port Director Gary LaGrange said "the jury is still out" on whether MRGO contributed to Katrina's devastation. But he said the port would have been willing to give up the Outlet if the Corps had completed a $750 million project to expand a lock on the Industrial Canal, another little-used shipping channel.

Most ships heading to New Orleans use the Mississippi River, but LaGrange said many local businesses rely on the alternative routes, including America's largest chicken exporter -- which now has 5 million pounds of rotting meat on its hands.

In any case, LaGrange said, the city would never have drowned if Congress had authorized levees protecting it from a Category 5 hurricane, instead of a Category 3.

"We've been stuffing a 250-pound body into 180-pound pants," he said. "That's your problem right there."

But in 1998, the St. Bernard Parish Council unanimously called for the channel's closing. In 2002, an LSU study noted that "locally, the MRGO is perceived as a superhighway for storm surge because of the channel's susceptibility to inundation by tropical storms and hurricanes." In 2004, a federally funded simulation drill called Hurricane Pam concluded that surges from a Category 3 hurricane would overwhelm the MRGO "funnel," flood surrounding areas and kill tens of thousands of people.

Mashriqui has dedicated his career to preventing a repetition of the Bangladesh catastrophe, and after the grim experience of the Hurricane Pam study, he became an evangelist for building a floodgate across the throat of the funnel.

When he spoke to emergency responders at the Metairie, La., library on "Hurricane Vulnerability Modeling for Southeast Louisiana," the next speaker was an Army Corps engineer. But he said Corps officials told him they could not study anything that was not in their congressional authorization. One colleague at the Hurricane Center predicted that nothing would happen until hundreds of people died.

"I told everyone: If New Orleans is a boat, here are the holes," Mashriqui said. "This is my passion; I don't want people to die in hurricanes. But nobody did anything."

Several current and former Corps of Engineers employees say the Corps' New Orleans district was reluctant to give up MRGO.

In recent years, Corps officials have spoken about closing it. But last year, they estimated their "project capability" for dredging the outlet at a whopping $38 million, signaling their desire to keep it open. "The general feeling was: 'There's no way we're closing that,' " says one biologist who left the district this year. "They wanted all the business they could get."

John Paul Woodley Jr., the assistant Army secretary who oversees the Corps, said the Bush administration had to instruct the agency to restart its study of whether to close the channel, because it hadn't taken into account the channel's destruction of wetlands, even though it was conducting a separate study of a $14 billion project to restore Louisiana's coastal wetlands. Woodley said there was also concern that further erosion could merge the channel with Lake Borgne -- which happened after Katrina.

Yesterday, Woodley pointedly declined to rule out the possibility that MRGO contributed to the tragedy of Katrina. "I've heard those concerns, and I wouldn't discount them," he said.

Woodley cautioned that the investigation of the catastrophe has just begun, but many scientists, environmentalists and St. Bernard Parish officials said they do not need a forensic investigation by the Corps of Engineers to know that their warnings have come true. Larry Ingargiola, the head of emergency management in St. Bernard, said he knows exactly why only 52 of its 28,000 structures made it through Katrina unscathed.

"That's where the damn water came -- right up MRGO," he said. "We've been screaming about it for years. I don't know how many politicians I've taken on tours. But there it is."

Death Toll In Louisiana Climbs Past 400 (AJC/AP)

By Adam Nossiter, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Hurricane Katrina's death toll in Louisiana jumped by more than half Tuesday to 423 as recovery workers turned more of their attention to gathering up and counting the corpses in a city all but emptied out of the living.

The number of dead is all but certain to rise, because some flooded-out areas of the city have not been fully searched. But how high it might go is unclear.

Mayor Ray Nagin said earlier this month that New Orleans could have 10,000 dead. But a street-by-street sweep of the city last week yielded far fewer bodies than feared, and authorities said the toll could be well below the dire projections. They offered no specific estimates.

Up until the past few days, authorities were slow to release numbers, saying they were concentrating on rescuing the living first. Rescuers reported pushing corpses aside, or tying them down to banisters or roofs for others to collect later.

As of Monday at least 236 people were reported dead elsewhere along the Gulf Coast, most of them in Mississippi.

"Let me caution everyone: We have not done the secondary searches in the areas where the water was the highest. So we still have a lot of work to do, and those numbers probably will go up," Nagin said Tuesday.

Dr. Frank Minyard, the Orleans Parish coroner, suggested that further such discoveries are possible as the floodwaters recede.

"There just may be a lot of people who are still down in those deep waters, and some of waters were 10, 12, 15 feet deep," he said. "My biggest fear is that we will find something down there that is way out of proportion. Hopefully, it doesn't happen, but we worry."

The updated Louisiana numbers were released as Gov. Kathleen Blanco lashed out at the federal government, accusing it of moving too slowly in recovering the bodies.

The dead "deserve more respect than they have received," she said.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, who took charge of the hurricane rescue efforts last week, said Tuesday that federal agencies involved had been meeting their mission to recover the remains quickly "and to treat them with the dignity and respect they deserve."

But Blanco said FEMA has slowed down the process by failing to sign a contract with the company hired to handle the removal of the bodies, Houston-based Kenyon International Emergency Services. Kenyon is working without a contract but threatened to pull its workers out of Louisiana unless either the state or the federal government offered it a signed agreement, Blanco said. Calls to Kenyon were not immediately returned.

"No one, even those at the highest level, seems to be able to break through the bureaucracy to get this important mission done," Blanco said.

Troops Returning To Duties (NYT)

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - In a sign that initial rescue efforts after Hurricane Katrina are coming to an end, Pentagon officials said late Tuesday that about 4,000 active-duty troops, two large Navy vessels and three dozen helicopters ordered into the relief effort would return to their regular duties.

Officials said a sizable active-duty contingent remained, including the approximately 5,200 ground soldiers from the 82nd Airborne Division and the First Cavalry Division. At the height of the effort, more than 20,000 active-duty troops were committed to hurricane relief, military officials said.

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is preparing to pull back some active-duty forces it sent to Mississippi and Louisiana in the early aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, even as it sends in some new groups for specialized work like the processing of corpses and aerial spraying for disease-carrying mosquitos.

The role of active-duty forces, including Navy ships like the aircraft carrier USS Harry S. Truman and Army ground combat units like the 82nd Airborne Division, may diminish within days or weeks, officials said Tuesday.

Maj. Gen. Bill Caldwell, commander of the 82nd Airborne, said on Monday in New Orleans that it appeared the search for city residents who still want assistance could be completed within 10 days. He said it remained to be determined by state and federal civilian authorities what tasks his soldiers would be assigned after that.

As the Army's premier quick-response force with important wartime roles in Iraq and Afghanistan, the 82nd Airborne seems unlikely to stay in New Orleans for an extended period. The first of the 3,800 soldiers it has in New Orleans began arriving Sept. 3 from Fort Bragg, N.C.

Operating with the 82nd Airborne are about 1,400 soldiers from the 1st Cavalry Division, based at Fort Hood, Texas.

National Guard troops under the direct control of Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco are expected to remain on the scene much longer, although likely on rotations of one month or less.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Tuesday there are about 45,800 National Guard troops and about 22,400 active-duty personnel participating in recovery operations in Mississippi and Louisiana, plus about 1,900 Reserves.

While traveling in Europe, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Tuesday the search-and-rescue portion of the military's mission on the hurricane-battered Gulf Coast is about over.

"Some helicopters can undoubtedly be moved out over the period ahead," Rumsfeld told reporters. He stressed that nothing would be withdrawn without authorization by the two states' governors and the president.

The Pentagon's internal news service quoted Rumsfeld as also saying the Navy's dock landing ship USS Whidbey Island, which brought bridging equipment and supplies to the region, would be departing. Some sailors from the Whidbey Island went ashore at Biloxi, Miss., on Sept. 8 to deliver goods and help in other ways.

The Truman aircraft carrier, which deployed from its home port at Norfolk, Va., three days after Katrina struck the Gulf Coast and arrived in waters off Mississippi on Sept. 4, was another candidate for an early return home, officials said.

Rumsfeld said there is a large surplus of hospital beds for victims of Katrina, so those could also be decreased. The USNS Comfort, a hospital ship based at Baltimore, arrived off the Mississippi coast late last week.

The Pentagon's internal news service said Rumsfeld approved the Federal Emergency Management Agency's request that the military take over the mortuary affairs mission in New Orleans. It reported that nine mortuary affairs teams from the 54th Quartermaster Company at Fort Lee, Va., were preparing to deploy to the region, and that nine other teams from that unit are on alert and are ready to deploy if ordered.

C-130 transport planes with the Air Force Reserve's 910th Air Wing began mosquito-spraying operations in St. Bernard and Jefferson parishes in New Orleans.

Officials Fear Texas May Have To Foot Bill (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON – The bills are piling up: rent, police overtime, meals, transportation, hospital beds. Texas is already spending hundreds of millions of dollars caring for Katrina victims – but exactly how much may not be known for weeks.

And as they start tallying costs, state officials are becoming increasingly worried that despite a federal disaster declaration, Washington will leave Texas taxpayers stuck with huge bills.

The biggest items not yet covered by Congress: up to $450 million for schools and as much as $400 million for health coverage for the 205,000 evacuees thought to be in Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0005119

"Are we concerned? Yes," Gov. Rick Perry's spokesman, Robert Black, said Tuesday after the latest in a series of meetings between state and local leaders and federal emergency officials. "We are not completely comfortable with the federal response in terms of education and Medicaid."

Mr. Black noted that Texas still hasn't received $2 million it sought from the Federal Emergency Management Agency after Tropical Storm Allison four years ago.

Direct costs for states that took in evacuees include Medicaid, welfare payments, unemployment coverage, housing and public safety. Many of these costs will be completely covered by federal disaster funding, though there will be headaches along the way.

"It's going to be a huge accounting process," said William Ayres, Texas Emergency Management Agency spokesman. "We don't even have ballpark estimates."

At last count, Texas schools had enrolled 33,000 evacuee students, and the state's education commissioner, Shirley Neeley, said she expected as many as 60,000. The annual cost per pupil is about $7,500.

The other big-ticket item is Medicaid. Albert Hawkins, chief of the Texas Health and Human Services Commission, estimated that Katrina could add $85 million a month to the state's Medicaid bill. The federal government covers 61 percent. So unless Congress steps in, Texas taxpayers could be forced to absorb nearly $400 million over the next year.

And there are smaller items. Emergency food stamps have gone to about 110,000 families who sought refuge in Texas. The federal government pays for the stamps but splits administrative costs 50-50 with states. U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt has assured Texas officials that he would work to find funding to cover that extra burden.

President Bush's Sept. 2 disaster declaration made Texas eligible for full reimbursement on a range of outlays. But many of the costs associated with long-term resettlement aren't covered.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, said that inevitably, some evacuees would end up as Texas residents, so the state will have to accept responsibility. "We will have to come up with some arbitrary timeframe," he said.

On Monday, Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison introduced legislation to ensure that states get repaid fully for at least six months on Medicaid and children's health coverage. Her Texas counterpart, Sen. John Cornyn, is a co-sponsor, and he is also pushing for federal funding for education and health care costs, as are other Texans.

Meanwhile, costs are mounting for school districts, cities and counties.

The Dallas school district, with an enrollment topping 160,000, has taken in 1,248 evacuees at 134 schools – roughly doubling the number of new students. But as soon as they start attending classes, the district starts collecting money from the state based on average daily attendance.

Dallas City Manager Mary Suhm said the city has kept meticulous records of supplies bought and overtime paid, especially to police officers who've staffed the city's evacuee shelters by the dozen. Officials haven't tallied the costs, but they do expect full reimbursement through FEMA.

El Paso officials said the city had spent $475,000. San Antonio officials say they expect to spend $1 million on food and shelter for evacuees, and Bexar County officials say they've spent more than $1 million already, mostly on health care and sheriff personnel. In Houston, police overtime alone is estimated at $1 million.

Last week, Ken Welch, director of fiscal management at the state comptroller's office, urged state agency heads to keep careful records, on the assumption that Congress will issue refunds.

Other states are struggling with the price tag, too.

"Even the categories are still up in the air," said Bill Wyatt, spokesman for the National Council of State Legislators. "We don't know how many lives have been affected."

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Tuesday signed legislation allowing California to join 47 states in a pact to provide rescue responders and other resources to disaster locations.

California's firefighters had balked at the Emergency Management Assistance Compact out of fear that they would have less legal protection and reduced death and disability benefits if they were hurt while assisting in another state.

After a prolonged standoff, Schwarzenegger and Democratic legislators, in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, fashioned a compromise that protects the firefighters.

The Schwarzenegger administration said that without membership in the compact, California had to negotiate individual arrangements with other states, potentially delaying response times.

Owners Of Nursing Home Charged (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey And Ann Scott Tyson

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 13 -- Louisiana authorities charged the owners of a New Orleans area nursing home with negligent homicide Tuesday after 34 patients perished in the facility in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

On a day in which Louisiana's death toll escalated to 423, state Attorney General Charles C. Foti Jr. said the owners of St. Rita's nursing home in St. Bernard Parish had been warned repeatedly by government officials and the news media that Katrina was coming, and also declined to evacuate the patients when asked if they wanted to do so. "In effect, their inaction resulted in the deaths of these patients," he said.

Foti announced the charges against the owners, Mable B. Mangano, 62, and Salvador A. Mangano, 65, at a late-afternoon news conference here. He said they had turned themselves in and had been booked on 34 counts of negligent homicide at the East Baton Rouge Parish jail.

Foti also said the state would investigate the deaths of 45 patients whose bodies were discovered Monday at Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans, as well as any other instances in which negligence may have led to the deaths of senior citizens or others unable to care for themselves.

"I'm going to look at every place in the affected area where patients died of unnatural causes," he said. A hospital or health care facility with "people that can't make a free choice because they are sick or unable to care for themselves has a duty to provide for their safety."

Bob Habans, an attorney for the Manganos, said they are "completely innocent." He said the couple and their children and grandchildren had attempted to evacuate residents, and had saved 50 people at the nursing home. "When all of the facts come out, everyone will know that they were heroes in this tragedy," he said.

As state officials issued an updated death toll, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) once again ripped into the Federal Emergency Management Agency for not moving more rapidly to collect the bodies of those who died in the storm and its aftermath.

Saying she had expressed her "absolute frustration" to federal authorities about the pace of recovering bodies, Blanco told reporters, "I cannot stand by while this vital operation is not being handled appropriately." She said the state signed a contract with a body-recovery company that had been in prolonged discussions with FEMA to do the same work.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, the on-scene federal coordinator of disaster relief, responded in a written statement: "The state has always maintained direct control over the mortuary process following this tragedy. We are committed to a process that treats the victims of Katrina with dignity and respect and accomplishes the mission as quickly as possible. We will work with state officials on what they believe to be the best solution for their constituents."

Meanwhile, there were additional signs of recovery along the battered Gulf Coast. Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport resumed limited commercial service with the arrival of a Northwest Airlines flight that carried only about 30 passengers, including federal emergency relief officials. The Port of New Orleans was due to handle its first ship since before the hurricane hit on the morning of Aug. 29 -- well ahead of predictions that it could be out of business for months.

The overall death toll from the storm topped more than 640 on Tuesday, including 218 in Mississippi and a few deaths in Alabama. In Louisiana, the number of confirmed dead leapt from 279 to 423, and officials in New Orleans said many more bodies are likely to be found as waters recede an average of one city block a day and allow them to reach neighborhoods that experienced the most severe flooding. State mortuary workers said they were ramping up their manpower in New Orleans on Tuesday to remove more bodies.

A California National Guard unit looking for bodies rescued an unconscious and emaciated Edgar Hollingsworth, 74, from his house, and doctors said they expected him to survive, the Orange County Register reported.

As the work shifts from rescue and evacuation of the living toward the recovery of remains, the U.S. military has begun planning for withdrawing some of the 68,000 troops, 21 ships and dozens of aircraft from the Gulf Coast region, senior military officials said.

A large-scale troop pullout is already underway in Mississippi, with all of the several thousand out-of-state National Guard forces there scheduled to depart within eight to 10 days, Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore, commander of Joint Task Force Katrina, said in an interview.

Military forces are expected to remain longer in Louisiana, but with the primary search effort in New Orleans expected to be completed by Wednesday, thousands of troops are expected to start departing within weeks, according to FEMA and military officials.

"It will be weeks, not months," when active-duty soldiers begin departing Louisiana, said Brig. Gen. Mark A. Graham, deputy commanding general of the 5th U.S. Army. About 7,200 active-duty troops, including 5,200 soldiers and 2,000 Marines, are engaged in relief work.

Honore said that as lifesaving missions such as search and rescue, providing food and water, and medical evacuation wind down, so will the military presence. He said some helicopter crews are already departing, including those from the 4th Infantry Division, which is preparing to return to Iraq.

In terms of providing security, Honore indicated that the city has an adequate law enforcement presence without federal troops. But Honore and other officials said the military is likely to stay to assist the city with planning, logistics and basic services until it can bring back a full contingent of municipal workers. "Until we've got these city workers back, we've got to keep the city running," he said.

One military unit winding up its mission Tuesday was a contingent of the 20th Special Forces Group, which has rescued nearly 8,000 New Orleans residents using inflated Zodiac boats since the flood hit. The unit, trained to partner closely with indigenous forces abroad, used those skills to help organize the search effort for the New Orleans Police Department.

Now, its officers say, the police are ready to work on their own. "We think they'll be on their feet in the next two days. They'll be able to handle it and we'll pull out," said Warrant Officer Bruce Erick, from a 20th Special Forces Group team based in Birmingham. The team helped the police carry out a systematic search plan.

As recovery efforts continued, FEMA's newly named acting director, R. David Paulison, spoke to reporters in Washington and said he will examine later the lessons learned from FEMA's failures.

"I can't deal with what happened in the last two weeks, but I can tell you, from this point forward, we are going to be focusing on the victims of this hurricane," he said. "But we've had a hurricane of unimaginable proportions, and we're going to deal with it. We're going to get those people out of shelters, and we're going to move and get them the help that they need."

At the same news conference, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff once again praised Michael D. Brown, who resigned as FEMA director on Monday after being yanked back to Washington amid withering reviews of the agency's performance the first week of the disaster. "As I said previously, I believe Mike Brown did everything that was within his capability to manage this crisis effectively," he said.

Owners Of Nursing Home Charged In Deaths Of 34 (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan And Al Baker

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 13 - The owners of a nursing home where 34 people died in the floodwaters that inundated the New Orleans area were charged Tuesday with multiple counts of negligent homicide, shortly after a new dispute broke out between the State of Louisiana and the federal government over the retrieval of hundreds of other bodies.

Mable B. Mangano and her husband, Salvatore A. Mangano Sr., owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home in Violet, just east of New Orleans, turned themselves in after the charges were filed, Attorney General Charles C. Foti Jr. said. He said the couple had not acted on several warnings to move the residents as Hurricane Katrina approached.

"They were warned repeatedly, both by the media and by the St. Bernard Parish emergency preparation people, that the storm was coming," Mr. Foti said at a news conference here. "In effect, I think that their inactions resulted in the death of these people."

The charges represent the first major prosecution to emerge in the hurricane's aftermath.

The legal action came as the pace of recovery of the storm's other casualties increased. Louisiana authorities said the number of confirmed dead in the state increased to 423, a substantial rise from the 279 reported on Monday. Bob Johannessen, a spokesman for the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, said the number of confirmations was expected to rise each day.

Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said the pace of recoveries should have been much faster, however, and accused the Federal Emergency Management Agency of slowing the retrieval of the dead to the point where the contractor responsible for that work had threatened to pull out.

After days of news reports of bodies in the streets of New Orleans, Ms. Blanco, with palpable frustration, said the state would bypass FEMA and sign its own contract with the company, Kenyon Worldwide Disaster Management.

"In recent days, I have spoken with FEMA officials and administration officials to convey my absolute frustration regarding the lack of urgency and the lack of respect involving the recovery of our people whose lives were lost as a result of Hurricane Katrina," Ms. Blanco said at a news conference in Baton Rouge. "We have pleaded for contract resolution. In death, as in life, our people deserve more respect than they have received."

FEMA officials responded by saying that the recovery of bodies was a state responsibility, while the federal role was to assist state officials.

"The state has always maintained direct control over the mortuary process following this tragedy," Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen of the Coast Guard, who is directing FEMA efforts in the region, said in a written statement. "We are committed to a process that treats the victims of Katrina with dignity and respect and accomplishes the mission as quickly as possible. We will work with state officials on what they believe to be the best solution for their constituents."

Kenyon officials said they had been struggling under cumbersome conditions to execute a task that gets grislier by the day. The company, which has a contract with FEMA to respond when called, arrived Sept. 1 but was not asked to begin recovering bodies until Sept. 6, said Bill Berry, a company spokesman.

The company's 100 or so workers have bunked in a funeral home in Baton Rouge, forcing them to drive four hours round-trip each day, and Kenyon officials said they had repeatedly asked for living quarters in New Orleans.

On Sunday, Kenyon officials told FEMA that they would not enter into a contract with the agency and would pull out as soon as a replacement was found, Mr. Berry said.

Mr. Berry said the company was already responding to Ms. Blanco's request that it increase its staffing even before the new contract was completed. "We just keep moving the cots a little closer together," he said.

Mr. Berry said he did not consider it appropriate to discuss why the company did not want to continue working under FEMA. But he had high praise for the state, which reached out to Kenyon after the company notified FEMA on Sunday that it would not accept a contract.

"I can't say enough about the Louisiana state people," Mr. Berry said. "They heard our problems, and they simply fixed them. It's beautiful to see a general sitting there from the National Guard saying, 'I can do that,' and it's done."

In an effort to explain why Kenyon may have walked away from a federal contract, a senior official from the Department of Homeland Security, who would not allow his name to be used because the department had already issued an official statement, said Tuesday that the state's proposed contract was "less detailed than the plan we were negotiating" and had four provisions compared with nine that FEMA had wanted.

For example, the official said the federal proposal would have required that the Kenyon employees have specialized training and use personal protective gear and have appropriate security, provisions that the federal official said were not included in the state contract.

Mr. Berry declined to respond, except to say that the company had 76 years of experience in disasters. It was hired in the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001, and last year's tsunami. "We will let our record speak for itself," he said.

Kenyon - a unit of Service Corporation International, a giant funeral company - operates worldwide and handled preservation of remains after the World Trade Center attacks and the cleanup of mass graves in Iraq under government contracts. The company, which is based in Houston, has contributed heavily to President Bush's campaigns. The chairman and founder of the company is Robert L. Waltrip, a longtime friend of the Bush family and a trustee of the George Bush Presidential Library Foundation.

In New Orleans, anger over the slow collection of bodies, which officials say has been hampered by floodwater and debris, still smoldered. Dr. Brobson Lutz, a former health director for the City of New Orleans, led an impromptu and morbid tour on Tuesday that he said reflected the extent to which those who perished had been neglected.

It included a nursing home on Dauphine Street, where three bodies had stayed until Dr. Brobson had mentioned them on Fox News, and the kitchen area of his own office, where he wiped at blood from the body of Michael Lala, the owner of Old N'Awlins Cookery. Mr. Lala had died from heart failure a week after the storm, but the authorities did not respond to requests to pick up the body, Dr. Brobson said, so he stored it in his office for a week until it finally was collected on Tuesday morning.

"FEMA couldn't get the live people out in time and they can't get the dead people out in time," Dr. Brobson said. "They failed the living and the dead."

The residents of St. Rita's did not have to die, Attorney General said, and he warned that other nursing homes that failed to remove residents also faced prosecution.

Local officials had ordered a mandatory evacuation amid news reports about the approach of the storm, Mr. Foti said. Because St. Rita's was licensed as a Medicaid facility, it had an evacuation plan in place, but it did not use it, he said.

In addition to the mandatory evacuation order, officials offered to send two buses to the nursing home, but Mr. Foti said the Manganos declined that offer. Also, the owners had an agreement with an ambulance company, signed in April, to provide ambulances to evacuate special-needs patients, but "they were never called," Mr. Foti said.

At least two drowning victims at the home could have been family members who went to the scene or people who took refuge there, he said, adding that the remains were being identified.

James A. Cobb, the lawyer for the Manganos, said that they were not guilty of the charges and that they were unaware a mandatory evacuation order had been issued. Mr. Cobb said that if the patients - some on feeding tubes, oxygen and in need of medication - had been put on a bus for 12 hours to evacuate, "people are going to die."

A deputy at the East Baton Rouge jail said the Manganos had posted a bond of $50,000 and were expected to be released.

La. Nursing Home Owners Charged In Deaths (AJC/AP)

By Doug Simpson, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. — The husband-and-wife owners of a nursing home near New Orleans were charged Tuesday with negligent homicide in the deaths of 34 people during the flooding unleashed by Hurricane Katrina. The case represents the first major prosecution to come out of the disaster.

The owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home in Chalmette "were asked if they wanted to move (the patients). They did not. They were warned repeatedly that this storm was coming," Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti said.

"In effect, their inaction resulted in the deaths of these patients," Foti said.

Salvador A. Mangano and his wife, Mable, surrendered and were jailed on 34 counts of negligent homicide. They posted bond of $50,000 each later Tuesday. Each count carries up to five years in prison.

The attorney general said he is also investigating the discovery of more than 40 corpses at flooded-out Memorial Medical Center, in New Orleans' Uptown section.

The Manganos' attorney, Jim Cobb, said his Tuesday night that his clients are innocent, and he blamed St. Bernard Parish officials for not ensuring an evacuation plan was proceeding.

The nursing home owners had to make a difficult decision between evacuating the patients, many of them elderly and on feeding tubes, or keeping them at the home and weathering the storm, Cobb said.

"If you pull that trigger too soon those people are going to die," he said. Three people from another nursing home had died during the evacuation ahead of the hurricane.

The Manganos had an evacuation plan as required under state law, both their attorney and the attorney general said.

But Foti said the nursing home had a contract with an ambulance service to evacuate the patients, but the owners didn't call the company. They also turned down an offer from St. Bernard Parish officials who asked if the nursing home wanted help evacuating, he said.

The victims at St. Rita's died Aug. 29, the day the hurricane hit, and on Sept. 6, at least 14 unrecognizable bodies were still inside the nursing home, the New York Times reported last week.

St. Bernard Parish Councilman Ricky Melerine said the water rose 3 feet in 15 minutes that morning and then even faster, the Times said.

Several men tried to rescue the nursing home's residents by floating them out on mattresses, and others were able to walk to a school, the Times said. In all, the home had about 60 residents.

There were apparent efforts to fight the incoming water inside St. Rita's. A table was nailed against a window and a couch was pushed up against a door, the Times said. There was also evidence that water had reached the roof.

Tom Rodrigue, whose mother died in the nursing home, was angry Tuesday and near tears.

"She deserved the chance, you know, to be rescued instead of having to drown like a rat," he told CNN.

Foti said the bodies have not all been identified and he was not sure how many of the victims were patients or staff.

"They had a duty and a standard of care to people who could not care for themselves," Foti said of the owners. "If you or I decided we are going to stay, we do it of our own free will. ... The people at the nursing home don't have that choice."

Louisiana Charges Nursing Home Owners With Negligent Homicide (KRT)

By Chris Gray, Brandon Bailey And Scott Dodd

Knight Ridder, September 14, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. - Hurricane Katrina killed them, but the Louisiana attorney general said Tuesday that he's also holding the owners of a nursing home responsible for the deaths of 34 victims, mostly elderly, found after the storm.

People in St. Rita's Nursing Home, in a small town southeast of New Orleans, tried to fight the rising floodwaters by blocking windows and lashing themselves together with rope, but they lost their battle when water reached the roof.

Attorney General Charles Foti said Salvador and Mable Mangano, a married couple who owned the facility, turned themselves in to authorities on Tuesday and have been charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide.

The nursing home had a contract with an ambulance company to evacuate residents, Foti said, but it didn't call for help. It also turned down offers from St. Bernard Parish to send buses.

"Their inaction resulted in the death of those people," Foti said. "They did not die of natural causes. They drowned."

In Washington, President Bush accepted responsibility for the federal government's failures in the aftermath of Katrina, as the death toll along the Gulf Coast climbed to more than 600.

After more than a week of White House refusals to play "the blame game," Bush acknowledged that mistakes were made and that the government's halting, disorganized response raised questions about the country's ability to cope with a terrorist attack.

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government," Bush said in a midday White House news conference. "To the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility."

Facing the lowest approval ratings of his presidency - a Newsweek poll found just 38 percent of Americans say he's doing a good job - Bush planned a prime-time speech from the disaster area on Thursday night.

DOJ_NMG_0005125

"I want to know what went right and what went wrong," Bush said at a joint appearance Tuesday with the Iraqi president in Washington, "to answer that very question that you asked: Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm?"

Back in Baton Rouge, Foti said that some people at St. Rita's survived, including a man who got his elderly relative out of the facility by floating to safety on a mattress.

"Of all of this, that's the thing that hit the heart of most people," St. Bernard Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said of the nursing-home deaths. "I personally know two people who had their families in there and went to get them, and they were floating."

An attorney for the nursing home said the owners would fight the charges. "I can promise you there's another side of the story," lawyer Jim Cobb told CNN.

Dan Wagner came to the St. Bernard parish emergency operations center Tuesday looking for news about who was found in the nursing home. He couldn't find out what had happened to his 95-year-old grandmother, Mary Alma Wagner.

"They said they were going to evacuate her," he said. "We're just trying to find out if she's there. She's not on the list of the people brought out."

Foti said his office will also investigate other hospitals where bodies have been found, including Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans, to see if they died of anything other than natural causes.

About 45 bodies were removed from Memorial over the weekend. Hospital spokespeople said many elderly and sick people died at the flooded, powerless facility in the four days after the storm while doctors and nurses tried to keep them alive, waiting for rescuers who never came.

In the nation's capital, homeland security officials pledged a house cleaning of political appointees in top jobs who have little experience in disaster management, and more fingers were pointed in New Orleans over the snail's pace of retrieving bodies that litter the flood-ravaged city.

Meanwhile, the hard work of finding a place to live for thousands of now-homeless evacuees across the Gulf States promised to provide another major challenge for the government. The American Red Cross said thousands of people could be living in shelters for months.

State officials said the confirmed number of dead in Louisiana had reached 423, up from fewer than 200 last weekend. In Mississippi, emergency officials reported 218 deaths.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said workers haven't finished door-to-door searches for bodies in every sector of the city, so officials expect the death toll to rise. The grim job should be completed by week's end, he said.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld approved FEMA's request for the military to take over mortuary affairs in New Orleans. Nine mortuary affairs teams from the 54th Quartermaster Company at Fort Lee, Va., were preparing to go, and nine others are on alert.

Nagin said he's waiting for official results of an Environmental Protection Agency study of air and water quality. If the results are as good as he's heard, he hopes to open downtown New Orleans, the French Quarter and some neighborhoods to residents and businesses in the next few days.

In his first public statements, new acting FEMA chief R. David Paulison said he will focus on the hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast evacuees living in shelters, tents or their cars. He pledged to "get these people out of the shelters into some type of either semi-permanent or permanent housing."

The American Red Cross said nearly 7,000 people are housed at shelters in Mississippi, with 75,000 around the country. Most emergency shelters weren't meant to serve as homes for more than a night or two.

"We expect we'll be sheltering people for several months," said Red Cross spokesman Kevin Titus.

State and federal officials say they're scouring the Southeast for up to 300,000 trailers and mobile homes to serve as free or subsidized housing for as long as two years.

The government is also looking for spots to establish miniature "communities" of several thousand mobile homes, but locations with enough space and needed utilities are hard to come by.

"You've got to have a place to put `em," said Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour.

DOJ_NMG_0005126

Some of the first trailers were delivered to an RV park in Biloxi, Miss., where some local families were moving in Tuesday and unpacking the few belongings they were able to salvage from the hurricane.

"It's wonderful just to have a place to say is yours," said Peggy Nitcavic, 57. The home where she grew up and later raised two sons was destroyed by Katrina.

Nursing Home Owners Charged With Negligent Homicide (LAT)

By Ashley Powers And Nicholas Riccardi

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Parts of this hurricane-devastated city could reopen by Monday, an upbeat Mayor C. Ray Nagin said today as officials announced the first homicide charges connected to the Hurricane Katrina disaster.

State Atty. Gen. Charles C. Foti Jr. announced today that the owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home in St. Bernard Parish had been charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide after 34 bodies were recovered at the facility.

Mable B. Mangano, 62, and Salvador A. Mangano Sr., 56, were each charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide and lodged in the East Baton Rouge Parish prison.

Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years incarceration.

"Thirty-four people drowned in a nursing home that should have been evacuated," Foti said.

The attorney general alleged that the Manganos declined to accept the two buses authorities had offered to send, and did not call an ambulance company they had contracted.

Officials discovered the bodies after the hurricane. They have yet to be identified, and could include staff members or relatives of patients, Foti said.

Foti also said his office would investigate other nursing homes, hospitals and care facilities where bodies were found, including Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans, where 45 bodies were discovered.

The criminal charges came as officials grew optimistic more than two weeks after Katrina struck, killing at least hundreds, perhaps thousands, and causing tens of billions of dollars in damage.

Nagin held his first news conference in the city since the weekend and was noticeably upbeat.

"We are in a situation now where we are out of nuclear crisis mode and in regular crisis mode," he told reporters.

Both the airport and the port reopened today as crews continued to clean up the city that has been under floodwater since Katrina hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29. Waters still covered more than half of the city today.

But Nagin, cheered by a verbal report from federal Environmental Protection Agency officials, said some the driest and most famed parts of the city — the downtown business district, the French Quarter, Uptown and Algiers — will hopefully reopen to residents by Monday.

"We are bringing New Orleans back, we are bringing its culture back, we are bringing its music back," Nagin said. Glancing up at the military helicopters, he said: "I'm tired of hearing these helicopters. I want to hear some jazz."

He estimated that 100,000 to 150,000 residents could return to the four open districts, if air quality test results were good, but insisted that no one will be allowed to go to areas that are still wet. Nagin said he was sure the evacuees, scattered across the country, would want to return.

"I know New Orleanians, and once the beignets start cooking up again and the gumbo's in the pot, and the red beans and rice are being served on Monday, and not where they are, they'll be back," he said.

In the capital of Baton Rouge, the governor lashed out at the federal government, accusing the Federal Emergency Management Agency of moving too slowly to recover the bodies of those killed in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

At a speech this morning, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco expressed her "absolute frustration" with FEMA officials, whom she accused of moving too slowly.

"In death as in life, our people deserve more respect than they have received," Blanco said.

On an optimistic note, Blanco said she hoped to allow state buildings in seven parishes affected by Katrina to reopen next week.

Blanco said that the state would contract with Kenyon International of Houston to remove the bodies because Kenyon could not agree with FEMA on a contract.

"I have taken action today to resolve a matter that involves life, death and dignity," the governor said from a conference room at state police headquarters while surrounded by state elected officials.

"No one, even those at the highest level, seems to be able to break though the bureaucracy to get this important mission done.... I am angry and outranged," Blanco said.

Collecting bodies is the responsibility of the state with FEMA only in a supporting role, David Passey, a FEMA spokesman, said today of the delays in signing a contract. From the start, the state has been in charge of the effort to locate and transport the dead to morgues, he said.

"The collection of bodies is not normally a FEMA responsibility," Passey said.

The governor's press secretary, Denise Bottcher, said FEMA would need to approve the contract so that the state could be reimbursed, or the state would have to pay.

"What they're there for is to have someone with experience of a natural disaster or a terrorist attack," Bottcher said.

After observing a moment of silence for Hurricane Katrina's victims, the governor said that most New Orleans residents had heeded the call to evacuate because the death toll appeared to be in the hundreds, not thousands.

The official toll in Louisiana was 423, but was expected to rise.

Blanco announced that seven parishes would conditionally re-open Monday: Lafocorche, Livingston, St. Charles, St. John, St. Tammany, Tangipahoa and Washington. State offices there can be reopened.

Parishes still closed are Jefferson, Orleans, Plaquemines and St. Bernard.

With the cleanup of New Orleans continuing, Mayor Nagin said he will attempt to get Wal-Mart, Lowe's and Home Depot to open temporary retail areas near the convention center so returning residents can buy necessities. He warned that anyone trying to commit crimes would be dealt with harshly, noting that the streets were still full of military troops.

"This city is probably the safest it has been in many, many years," he said.

The mayor said the restoration would become easier now that what he called "the big daddy of all pumps," Pumping Station No. 6, came back online Monday.

Officials said only about 30 people were evacuated Monday and that all had previously been urged to leave by rescue workers. Because there were so few evacuees, there will no longer be airlifts from the city after today's flight departs.

There were two inbound flights from Memphis on Northwest and one Delta flight from Atlanta.

The airport, which until last night was a military bunkhouse filled with cots, looks like an airport again, but one filled with military personnel rather than passengers.

One passenger, Donna Brazile, a political science professor at Georgetown University, sat in a metal chair outside the Northwest terminal, waiting for a flight that would take her home to Washington DC.

Brazile came to New Orleans to help her family, who she said had lost everything in the storm. She said that her father had been evacuated to Texas and that she had gone after him, brought him back, and found him an apartment in the region.

She had been scheduled to fly out on one of the Northwest flights this morning, but was unable to get to the airport in time because of the military checkpoints along the road that slowed her down.

"I got lucky," she said. "Northwest put me on the next flight out. I'll get home, even though it will be late. I am not sure what I am going to do in the meantime. It's not like there are a lot of comfortable places to hang out in the airport right now."

Most shops in the airport remained closed, but one convenience type store was opened, anticipating that there would be passengers to serve.

The store was filled with dozens of military police, who browsed through clothing racks filled with pastel-colored New Orleans T-shirts. They stood around reading the first few pages of books designated New York Times bestsellers, and buying magazines that ranged from People and Vogue to Business Week. Most paid in cash, though the cashier said that the phone lines were up to take credit cards.

Pair Charged In 34 Deaths (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The owners of a nursing home where 34 residents are believed to have drowned during Hurricane Katrina were charged Tuesday with negligent homicide.

Before the storm arrived, St. Bernard Parish officials had asked the owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home — Salvadore Mangano Sr., 65, and his wife, Mabel, 62 — whether they wanted to move the residents, Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti said.

"They did not," Foti said. "They were warned repeatedly that this storm was coming. In effect, their inaction resulted in the deaths of these patients."

Neighbors described a horrible scene that unfolded on Aug. 29, the day Katrina hit. Floodwaters rose to the roof of the one-story nursing home in St. Bernard, outside New Orleans, trapping elderly and infirm residents inside. Neighbors came in boats and smashed a hole in the roof.

"We tried to get out as many as we could," said Steve Snyder, 29, an oil rig worker. "All we could go by was the hollering and screaming, 'Help, help!' "

"We got 25 to 27 people out alive," Snyder said. "And then we didn't hear anymore screaming, anymore people calling for help."

The Manganos surrendered to authorities Tuesday and were charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide. Each count carries a maximum five years in prison. The two were released on $50,000 bond each.

A lawyer for the Manganos said they were being scapegoated. "They are completely innocent," lawyer James Cobb said.

Cobb said the Manganos have a "spotless record" caring for the elderly and were presented with "a horrible choice" of risking the lives of patients on feeding tubes by evacuating them 70 miles away or keeping them at the facility. The Manganos contacted all relatives of the residents and told them of their plans to ride out the storm, he said. "To pick on these two people with the colossal failures of the federal, state and local government is out of bounds," Cobb said.

The father of Steve Galladore, a St. Bernard Parish firefighter, was among the dead. Galladore said he talked to the Manganos three days before the storm and was assured they would evacuate. But when he talked to Salvadore Mangano a second time, the nursing home owner had changed his mind, he said.

"He was sure the levees were going to hold, and if he put people on the bus, there was a good chance of losing two or three people on the ride to Lafayette," Galladore said.

Held Behind Walls In Katrina's Wake, They Also Serve (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

BOGALUSA, La. -- James Cox plunged his scarred, rough hands into the ice bucket to fish out two bottles of Gatorade and handed them to Tammey Duncan. A resident of devastated Washington Parish, she was waiting in line at the emergency-aid station in an industrial park here.

Mr. Cox, a prisoner for nearly 30 years, is serving time for armed robbery at the Washington Correctional Institute. In the past two weeks, though, he has also been a first responder, one of dozens of inmates in orange jumpsuits who have been driving forklifts, clearing debris and handing out food and water to people living here near the Mississippi line.

As Louisiana digs out from Hurricane Katrina, convicts have been opening roads with axes and chainsaws and doing other useful work. At Angola State Penitentiary, near Baton Rouge, inmates produced mattresses for shelters. Some prisoners have even donated money from what little they are paid so evacuees can buy postage stamps.

"I've been a thug since 1966, and this feels good," said Mr. Cox, a brawny, tattooed 53-year-old. "When people come up and you look into their faces and see all the sadness, and then they thank you like you are the one giving this stuff to them, it makes you tear up."

Opened in 1983 to house 500 inmates, the Washington Correctional Institute now holds 1,200 men, most here on drug charges, and it employs 418 people, making it one of the largest employers in the parish. Since Katrina struck, this medium-security prison 70 miles north of New Orleans has sent scores of inmates every day with corrections officers to work in the parish. The jobs don't pay well -- 20 cents an hour, at best. But unlike the vast majority of the 43,900 people of this parish, the prisoners go back at day's end to hot showers, warm meals and electric lighting.

All of the prisoners who have been helping are "trusties," men who are given special privileges -- like getting to leave the prison grounds under supervision -- because of their exemplary disciplinary records.

The hurricane has resulted in neither riots nor escapes. Because the prison is surrounded by dense, forbidding woods, running away isn't much of an option. Indeed, since Katrina hit, the Louisiana state prison system has been relatively peaceful despite moving 8,000 inmates from prisons damaged by the hurricane to 13 different facilities.

In large part, that's because some of the prison authorities, such as Warden James Miller here at the Washington Correctional Institute, were a lot better prepared for the hurricane than state and federal authorities were.

On Aug. 29, the morning Katrina's eye passed about 30 miles east of here, prisoners huddled in the dorms watching the horizontal rain, listening as the gravel on the roof whipped off and shattered windshields a half-mile away. Heating units were torn off the buildings. About that time, two 10-foot-high fences topped with razor wire were breached by the storm.

While most inmates were locked in their cells, one crew of officers and trusties rushed to turn off a leaking main gas line. Fifty others, standing in the rain and wind, raised and welded the downed fence that confines them. As the storm began to subside, Warden Miller, who lives on the prison grounds, sent six crews of inmates and corrections officers out. Their instructions were to clear one lane on all the main roads in the parish.

As the men made their way out among downed power lines and roads littered with fallen trees, a radio call came in asking for help clearing the road to the emergency management center in Bogalusa. Another team from the prison headed that way with their axes, hatchets and saws to cut and move the downed trees from the roadway.

Mr. Miller, 50 years old, had his own personal emergency management plan in place. He had backup generators with a stockpile of fuel. The prison was already equipped with one of the largest food-storage facilities in the parish. It was so well stocked there was no chance food would run out and the prison was able to help out the school system, which had food in danger of spoiling.

The warden's biggest concern was gasoline to power the generators. As soon as the storm passed, Mr. Miller pulled out the satellite phone he had reserved for such emergencies and called Richard Stalder, the state's corrections chief, to arrange for additional fuel supplies. Mr. Miller has been able to give each of his workers 10 gallons of gas every two days so they can drive to work. Others, including a few officers, stayed over at a makeshift shelter on the prison grounds. "This isn't the kind of place where you can just let everybody take off work -- I've got to have them here," Mr. Miller said.

It has been hard for many inmates to grasp what has been happening outside the prison. About 85% of the inmates here are from the New Orleans area, and they had no access to news reports until the warden videotaped a newscast and played it on the prison's television system.

The TV rooms were silent as inmates crowded in. Darrell Johnson, 49, who has been here nine months for a parole violation, was watching the screen when he saw his neighborhood, then recognized his street and family home, all underwater. "I'm just hoping everybody got out safe," he said of his two brothers and two sisters. "You can't call because of the phone situation here, and there's no sense in writing a letter. The mail ain't got nowhere to go. I have no idea what shelter they went to or even what city they might be in."

Pausing while he moved pallets of baby formula, Keshawn Patterson, 27, said, "We can't help our families … At least doing this, helping, it takes your mind off it for a while."

A challenge for the prison is finding the families of prisoners who are soon to be released. The institute has already located the families of 180 prisoners and will continue to make calls and to use the Red Cross and other means to try to find them. The state still needs to figure out how to keep track of inmates on parole or probation should they leave Louisiana -- and to coordinate with other states.

Meanwhile, to keep operations here normal, Mr. Miller hasn't canceled regular visiting days. And letters will go into the files of inmates who have helped out in the hurricane relief effort, intended to help the men when they come up for parole..

DeLay Declares 'Victory' In War On Budget Fat (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay said yesterday that Republicans have done so well in cutting spending that he declared an "ongoing victory," and said there is simply no fat left to cut in the federal budget.

Mr. DeLay was defending Republicans' choice to borrow money and add to this year's expected $331 billion deficit to pay for Hurricane Katrina relief. Some Republicans have said Congress should make cuts in other areas, but Mr. DeLay said that doesn't seem possible.

"My answer to those that want to offset the spending is sure, bring me the offsets, I'll be glad to do it. But nobody has been able to come up with any yet," the Texas Republican told reporters at his weekly briefing.

Asked if that meant the government was running at peak efficiency, Mr. DeLay said, "Yes, after 11 years of Republican majority we've pared it down pretty good."

Congress has passed two hurricane relief bills totaling $62.3 billion, all of which will be added to the deficit.

Republican leaders have been under pressure from conservative members and outside watchdog groups to find ways to pay for the Katrina relief. Some Republicans wanted to offer an amendment, including cuts, to pay for hurricane spending but were denied the chance under procedural rules.

"This is hardly a well-oiled machine," said Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican. "There's a lot of fat to trim. ... I wonder if we've been serving in the same Congress."

American Conservative Union Chairman David A. Keene said federal spending already was "spiraling out of control" before Katrina, and conservatives are "increasingly losing faith in the president and the Republican leadership in Congress."

"Excluding military and homeland security, American taxpayers have witnessed the largest spending increase under any preceding president and Congress since the Great Depression," he said.

Mr. Keene said annual nonmilitary and non-homeland security spending increased $303 billion between fiscal year 2001 and 2005; the acknowledged federal debt increased more than $2 trillion since fiscal year 2000; and the 2003 Medicare prescription drug bill is estimated to increase the government's unfunded obligations by $16 trillion.

Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste (CAGW), said if Mr. DeLay wants to know where to cut, "there are plenty of places to reduce."

His group soon will release a list of $2 trillion in suggested spending cuts over the next five years, and he said Congress also could cut the estimated $20 billion to $25 billion in pet projects that make their way into must-pass spending bills each year.

CAGW and the Heritage Foundation also suggest rescinding the 6,000-plus earmarked projects in the recently passed highway bill.

But Mr. DeLay said those projects are "important infrastructure" and eliminating them could undermine the economy as Congress tries to offer hurricane relief.

"It is right to borrow to pay for it," he said. "But it is not right to attack the very economy that will pay for it."

Mr. Schatz, though, said the highway bill included projects such as flowers for the Ronald Reagan freeway in California, which he said aren't essential spending.

Mr. DeLay said the budget this year was pared down and 100 programs or offices were eliminated in this year's spending bills. "We have been doing that for 11 years," he said. He said it's an "ongoing process" that will be more complete after this year's budget process, which calls for cuts to Medicaid and other entitlement programs.

DOJ_NMG_0005131

Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican, agreed that Republicans "have been more fiscally sound than the Democrats were in their decades in the House." He acknowledged that "we're still trying to improve," and noted Mr. DeLay is leading the fight to reform the budget process.

"We've had a good start, but many of us want to see the government be more fiscally sound and conservative in the future," Mr. McHenry said.

Aside From Roberts And Katrina, What Else Is New Lately? (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 14, 2005

In case anyone needed reminding of how consumed Congress is by just two issues at the moment, GOP senators left yesterday's policy lunch with matching talking point cards — one with a small graphic of the Supreme Court, the other with a photo of a hurricane.

Only five daring lawmakers convened hearings to compete with the morning appearance of chief justice nominee John Roberts before the Senate Judiciary Committee. And one of the four, Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), cleverly changed the focus of his pre-planned hearing, from nonprofit organizations to nonprofit organizations in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Santorum noted the fortunate coincidence that all three of his invited charity groups happened to be involved in the disaster relief effort, but turned skeptical at the suggestion that "Katrina-izing" the people's business was turning into a trend.

"In this case, the parallel is pretty obvious," Santorum said.

Sen. Joseph Biden's (D-Del.) immersion in Roberts was so complete that, heading for the policy lunch, he mistakenly referred to the judge as "Ginsburg" and volleyed away a ubiquitous Katrina question by explaining that preparing his confirmation questions had taken up the majority of his time. Still, Biden defended the chamber's ability to manage both hurricane reconstruction and the ongoing war in Iraq while dealing with Roberts.

"We ought to be able to walk and chew gum at the same time," Biden said.

For many on the Hill, the priority most in danger of slipping through the cracks is entitlement cuts mandated by the congressional budget resolution but put off to accommodate the response to Katrina. Democrats are strategizing on how to turn the month-long budget reconciliation delay into an indefinite one, with Republicans parrying that they can walk, chew gum and tighten penalties for sex offenders at the same time.

"This is something that can help bring the nation together" during a post-Katrina mourning period that has turned partisan, said Charlie Keller, spokesman for Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite (R-Fla.), whose sex-offender verification bill was folded into a broad package that House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) shepherded to a floor vote today.

"While the House is trying to continue its business of the things American people are looking for, I think cracking down on sex offenders definitely falls under that category," Keller said. House GOP leadership agreed, touting an appearance by Sensenbrenner and his cosponsors in addition to one from the House "Lawsuit Abuse and Voter Values Public Affairs Teams" cheerleading for Roberts's confirmation, on which they have no vote.

The Congressional Hispanic Caucus was kept busy by a three tasks, preparing for its institute's annual convention this week, releasing its first survey on corporate employment of Hispanic-Americans and using the hurricane to push for an abandonment of mandated cuts in food stamp funding.

"One of the methods we can use to get attention for that is to put out [word of] the importance of food stamps for those who have suffered because of Katrina," said Michael Levin, spokesman for CHC member Rep. Joe Baca (D-Calif.). As for the other major story at hand, "I was going to say 'who's John Roberts,' but I guess that wouldn't be a good answer," Levin joked.

Lest the public worry that Roberts and Katrina have intercepted integral deliberation, Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah) offered to set it straight.

"You're making too big a deal out of it," Bennett said. "Of course the Senate set aside other things to deal with emergencies. Yeah, we delayed the debate over Hawaiian statehood. We're carrying forward in a normal fashion and I think we'll be fine."

Normal Hill sights were in abundance, with crews of grassroots lobbyists visiting staffers to argue for their cherished causes. The National Association of Insurance and Financial Advisers (NAIFA) dispatched local representatives from as far away as Colorado to peer at Capitol maps and promote their call to make September "Life Insurance Awareness Month."

A cadre from environmental group American Rivers was also seen traipsing through the halls, although "River Lobby Day" had the perfect news peg lined up. "The Mississippi River and its tributaries are lined with countless miles of levees," said American Rivers president Rebecca Wodder in a Katrina response statement. "Each of these provides an unfounded sense of security for the communities behind them."

Katrina Gives Urgency To TV Transition (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, September 14, 2005

Last Friday, roughly 15 first responders came to Capitol Hill. Their visit, timed to coincide with the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, was designed to make an urgent call for a speedy transition from analog to digital television.

Television policy might seem like an odd rallying cry for fire and police officials. But there's a good reason for their interest: Once that transition takes place, first responders such as fire, rescue and police officers stand to benefit from a windfall of new frequencies that they can use to communicate with each other when handling emergencies. (The rest of the spectrum will be auctioned off, netting an estimated $10 billion for the government's coffers.)

What the group didn't plan on was that yet another tragedy, Hurricane Katrina, would occur in the interim — if anything, making their case stronger than ever. But the hurricane also has set their cause back, at least temporarily, as Congress' legislative course has been thrown into disarray.

Before Katrina, digital TV was supposed to move on a budget reconciliation package — by Congressional standards, a seemingly sure bet. But now that measure has been delayed. One GOP lobbyist put it this way: "It's delayed somewhere between a few weeks and never."

Alan Caldwell, a retired former fire chief in Fairfax County, Va., now serves as senior adviser of government relations for the International Association of Fire Chiefs. He took part in Friday's meetings with Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) as well as get-togethers with such Members as Reps. Eric Cantor (R-Va.) and Hilda Solis (D-Calif.) and Sen. George Allen (R-Va.).

"Right now, so much is in flux, I would hate to be a betting man on something like this," Caldwell said. "But what has changed ever so slightly is the absolute critical need. There are more needs for communication. Police chiefs and fire chiefs don't make any money off the spectrum. We just need it to do a better job for the people we're sworn to protect."

Burson Taylor, a spokeswoman for Blunt, said the first responders at the Friday meeting were "advocating for a hard deadline, and it was a good conversation. [Blunt] believes it's imperative to get the spectrum to the first responders just as soon as possible."

Taylor added that while reconciliation is on hold, there is no indication that the DTV measure won't be included when it moves. "Even with the delay," she said, "everything is still lined up for consideration."

Veronique Pluviose-Fenton, principal legislative counsel for the National League of Cities, said her association has joined with first-responder groups to urge Congress to free up spectrum ever since the Oklahoma City bombing in 1995.

During the Katrina aftermath, Pluviose-Fenton said, emergency workers were down to one channel. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) "himself witnessed it," she said. "People were using runners where a doctor says something and a young person runs it across to the other part of the airport to a nurse. Post 9/11, that is an embarrassment."

The independent commission that studied the 9/11 attacks put first-responder communications on its list of priorities.

Pluviose-Fenton added that as soon as a date is certain, local governments can begin investing their homeland security funds in new communications. "If we can talk, we can save lives," she said.

Bill Anaya, the senior director of legislative affairs for the electronics and communications giant Motorola, said he expects reconciliation to be delayed until next month. His company cares about the issue because it does business with first responders and because it manufactures boxes that can convert a digital signal for reception on an analog TV.

"That's all we know right now. No decisions have been made," Anaya said. "It's unclear whether they will go forward with reconciliation or not."

But, he added, "there is growing momentum that this public-safety spectrum piece must be taken care of. Do they get to use the vehicle of budget reconciliation or do they become part of a Katrina relief piece? That's the razor it's sitting on."

Anaya added: "I think if reconciliation happens, this is in it — it's just a question of whether reconciliation happens at all."

Wherever the DTV language might end up, the revenue stemming from the auction could be in high demand. "It brings with it $10 billion in a wheelbarrow. There are a lot of places where that kind of resource can be quite beneficial," he said.

The call for a "hard" date for the DTV transition has gained enough legislative traction that some proponents have indicated it could even go as a standalone measure.

Dennis Wharton, spokesman for the National Association of Broadcasters, said his group has abandoned its opposition to a hard date for the transition to digital.

"We accept the fact that Congress is going to set a hard date. We're not going to stand in the way or fight that," he said.

But what the broadcasters want is for cable carriers to carry all the channels that broadcasters send out over their digital stream, some of which offer 24-hour local weather programming. Wharton said NAB argues that such "multicasting" should be included in whatever final legislative package carries the DTV measure.

"We would make the case that broadcasters provide a critical role in times of crisis," Wharton said. "Countless lives are saved every year by emergency weather warnings. But that is not meant to diminish the efforts of public safety providers."

Pluviose-Fenton, like her colleagues, said no matter the vehicle, the DTV measure needs to pass.

"We want it to go on a legislation that is moving," she said. "We have technology that shouldn't force people to make a choice between television and public safety. Now is the time for Members to say what happened in Katrina matters, what happened on 9/11 matters. How many lessons learned do we have to go through?"

GOP Counterpunching On Ethics (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, September 14, 2005

Cognizant of how their effective portrayal of a Democratic Party drunk with power led to their historic takeover of the House in 1994, Republicans are moving quickly to ensure that Democrats do not get traction on the ethics issue for the 2006 elections.

For every Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee news release calling on Congressman So-and-So to return campaign contributions from indicted Republican ber-lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the National Republican Congressional Committee accuses Democratic leaders of hypocrisy — or worse.

When the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and the Montana Democratic Party made a television buy last month criticizing Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) for his Abramoff ties, the National Republican Senatorial Committee wasted no time quibbling with the ad's imprecise wording.

Democrats think the indictments of Abramoff and political allies of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) taint enough Republicans to make ethics a salient issue for them in next year's midterm elections.

But Republicans, in addition to counterpunching, maintain that Democrats are talking about ethics so much because they have nothing else to say.

"The fact that they are chasing this rabbit demonstrates they don't have issues to talk about and they don't have an agenda," NRSC spokesman Brian Nick said. "So what recourse do they have? Well let's go throw spaghetti at the wall and see if it sticks."

Democratic pollster Celinda Lake said Republicans have to move aggressively to counter ethics charges because the issue hits home.

"It's a huge issue," she said. "We've also tested the statistic that the number of lobbyists has doubled [recently] and what we've found in general is there is a strong belief that Washington is really out of touch and that can really resonate, so it's a good overall umbrella argument."

In the case of Burns, it's especially powerful because "you have two very clean Democratic candidates — one is a true outsider candidate" — who can draw clear distinctions between themselves and an "out of touch" Senator, Lake said.

Montana state Auditor John Morrison and state Senate President Jon Tester are competing for the Democratic nomination to take on Burns next year.

While individual Republican Members may be in exceptionally hot water, Democrats have a long way to go before they can truly nationalize the issue, warns Brad Coker, president of the independent Mason-Dixon polling firm.

"It's not registering on the Richter scale yet," Coker said.

At least at this early stage, voters are unhappy with lawmakers in general but Congressional Democrats are faring only a little better than Congressional Republicans in opinion polls.

A Gallup poll released Tuesday showed that only 36 percent of Americans approved of the job Congress is doing, while 58 percent disapproved. A Newsweek poll released earlier this week showed 50 percent of Americans preferring generic Democratic Congressional candidates compared to 38 percent who expressed a preference for Republicans.

Whether the GOP's low poll numbers, coupled with Democratic attacks on ethics, make the Republicans vulnerable in the long run is debatable.

"As long as there's been Congresses, there's been individual Members caught in ethical lapses," Coker said. "I'm not sure if [the Abramoff scandal] is seen as anything other than typical political rhetoric. It's hard to say" if the issue can really take root, because "more details need to come out but right now, Abramoff — he's not a household name."

Maybe so, but Democrats think they have enough time to hammer the point home so come November 2006, voters will know who he is — and seats that no one thought were competitive will be.

"We're going to keep talking about them," said Sarah Feinberg, spokeswoman for the DCCC. "The truth of the matter is they have several Members who are very much riddled with ethics matters and having to defend themselves each day."

Among others, Democrats are targeting DeLay, House Administration Chairman Bob Ney (R-Ohio), and the seat being vacated by embattled Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) — not traditionally favorable terrain — because they think questions about those Members' ethics can put their seats in play.

Feinberg said Republican attempts to counter each DCCC allegation is a sign of their "desperation."

"Every step of the way, those releases and those attempts to get press have been pretty see-through," she said, noting that when DeLay's political associates in Texas were indicted last week, the NRCC accused DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) of shady behavior.

"It's so obviously trying to change the subject," Feinberg said.

Ed Patru, a spokesman for the NRCC, said the only thing obvious is that Democrats are devoid of ideas.

"Republicans had a clear alternative that resonated with the public, the Contract with America," he said, dismissing the notion that 2006 could be like the Republicans' 1994. "There's no indication that Democrats have anything near that."

Patru also said Republicans have no fear of an election based on ethics.

"If they're seeking an ethics war, that's what they're going to get," he said. "Democrats are failing to nationalize the election around ethics because to the public, there is no difference between the parties on this issue."

Many of the recent ethical lapses have involved Republicans, but just as some Democrats think Cunningham's seat is winnable now because of his questionable dealings with a federal contractor, Democrats are not completely innocent, Mason-Dixon's Coker noted. For example, Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) had his home searched by the FBI not long after Cunningham's properties were raided.

Still, Coker said Democrats might be on to something.

"Over time, if there's a steady drumbeat and enough individual lapses come up to back it up" maybe voters will pay heed, he said. "But I don't think you got Watergate here."

DOJ_NMG_0005135

By Paul Nowell, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

WRIGHTSVILLE BEACH, N.C. -- Vulnerable islands were evacuated and mainland schools were closed Tuesday as Ophelia strengthened to a hurricane and wobbled closer to land with a threat of flooding rain.

The National Hurricane Center upgraded the storm's status Tuesday evening, saying maximum sustained winds had reached 75 mph, with higher gusts. The center said further strengthening was possible.

"I don't really want to mess with it," Bruce McIlvaine of Logan Township, N.J., said as he packed to leave the Outer Banks' Hatteras Island before his vacation ended. "You're on a spit of land a dozen miles into the ocean."

Others were nonchalant, following the lead of many longtime residents who were staying put.

Brenda and Rich Hooser, who moved to Nags Head from Winston-Salem three weeks ago, strolled hand-in-hand through the surf.

"All the locals _ none of them leave," Rich Hooser said. "If it's not over 125 (mph), they don't go anywhere."

A hurricane warning extended from the South Santee River in South Carolina north to Oregon Inlet at Pamlico Sound in North Carolina, meaning hurricane conditions were expected within 24 hours.

A hurricane watch and tropical storm warning were in effect from the Oregon Inlet north to the North Carolina-Virginia line and southward from the South Santee River to Edisto Beach in South Carolina.

After taunting coastal residents for days, the storm appeared ready to move ashore, as heavy rain battered South Carolina's northern coast and the beaches of southeastern North Carolina.

In Carolina Beach, south of Wrightsville Beach, officials reported a foot of water on one road due to heavy wind and a high tide.

Unlike Hurricane Katrina's devastating charge at the Gulf Coast, the week-old Ophelia had been following a meandering path, making predictions of its landfall difficult. The hurricane center's forecasts showed it running along the coast, then veering through Pamlico Sound, crossing the Outer Banks and heading back out to sea.

Its slow movement meant heavy rain could linger over land, possibly causing serious flooding. The hurricane center said up to 15 inches of rain was possible in eastern North Carolina.

At least six North Carolina counties ordered mandatory evacuations of some areas and eight others had voluntary evacuations.

Along the exposed Outer Banks chain, all residents and visitors were ordered to evacuate Hatteras Island on Tuesday, visitors had been ordered off Ocracoke Island and the National Park Service closed the Cape Hatteras lighthouse and the Wright Brothers National Memorial in Kill Devil Hills.

Schools were closed in several coastal counties in both North and South Carolina, while classes were canceled at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington and East Carolina University in Greenville.

North Carolina Gov. Mike Easley said coastal residents should be prepared to go without power for two to three days.

"The beaches we expect to take a real beating," Easley said. "The bottom line is we're definitely going to get flooding, not just on the coast but in low-lying areas as the rivers swell from the storm surge itself."

A surfer was missing along the South Carolina coast, and the search had been suspended because of the rough sea.

At 11 p.m. EDT, Ophelia was centered about 115 miles east of Charleston, S.C. The storm was stationary, but a gradual turn toward the north was expected Wednesday, the hurricane center said.

The storm's likely path across Pamlico Sound and the Outer Banks would mean the biggest flooding threat would come not from the Atlantic Ocean but from the sounds _ the bodies of water between the mainland and the barrier islands, said Jonathan Hobbs, a spokesman for the Dare County Joint Information Center.

Ophelia became a tropical storm Wednesday off the Florida coast and later strengthened to a hurricane. It is the 15th named storm and seventh hurricane in this year's busy Atlantic hurricane season, which began June 1 and ends Nov. 30.

Ophelia Poised To Swamp Coastal N.C. (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, September 14, 2005

Hurricane Ophelia is projected to move along the northeast coast of North Carolina today, dumping heavy rain, producing high wind and possibly spawning tornadoes.

Ophelia, the first hurricane to reach U.S. shores since Katrina hit the Gulf Coast Aug. 29, may take an entire day to cross land before spinning back out to sea.

The storm, moving at 4 mph Tuesday night, could inundate coastal communities and lash them with gusts up to 92 mph.

Katrina was a Category 4 monster, with 140 mph winds. Ophelia is only Category 1 (74 mph or more), but Ophelia's slow pace means "the effects will be more protracted," meteorologist Eric Blake of the National Hurricane Center said.

"The highest winds will last longer. Rainfall totals over a foot are possible. Coastal erosion will be a big problem," Blake said.

Two years ago this weekend, Hurricane Isabel tore into beaches on North Carolina's Outer Banks, a 120-mile tourist mecca of narrow islands. The hurricane center predicts "large and dangerous waves" today and a 5- to 7-foot storm surge, possibly 10 feet in inlets.

Rainfall could total 10 inches on South Carolina's northeast coast and 15 inches in eastern North Carolina.

Ophelia's track is so erratic that the eye of the hurricane may not reach land, said Steve Lyons, tropical weather expert for The Weather Channel. It will still feel like a direct hit, he said, because the storm's strongest wind bands reach out up to 60 miles from its center.

Hurricane warnings were posted from South Carolina to Virginia. Six North Carolina counties ordered mandatory evacuations. Eight others asked people to leave voluntarily.

Storm Increases Off The Carolinas (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

SALVO, N.C., Sept. 13 (Reuters) - Hurricane Ophelia strengthened slightly on Tuesday as it wobbled toward the coast and sent thousands of people packing from North Carolina's barrier islands.

The storm's center was 110 miles south of Wilmington, N.C. It was creeping north-northwest and was expected to turn north and hit the North Carolina coast on Wednesday night and Thursday, the forecasters said.

The storm has sat off the coasts of North and South Carolina for four days, alternately strengthening into a hurricane and weakening back to a tropical storm.

On Tuesday night it strengthened back into a minimal hurricane, with winds of 75 miles an hour.

Along the 100-mile chain of barrier islands known as the Outer Banks, mandatory evacuation orders were issued for all 20,000 people on Hatteras Island, a popular vacation spot that includes Cape Hatteras Lighthouse and the Cape Hatteras National Seashore.

Delta And Northwest Are Poised To File For Bankruptcy Protection (WSJ)

By Evan Perez and Susan Carey

The dire financial condition of Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines indicates that recent hopes for a slight recovery of the beleaguered airline industry may have been crushed by the surge in oil prices and the effects of Hurricane Katrina.

The carriers' boards are each scheduled to meet Wednesday to decide whether they'll file for bankruptcy protection. The filings themselves may come as soon as Wednesday, although Northwest is considering holding off to give its unions a last chance to make financial concessions. Indeed, some industry officials speculate that the carrier's surprise board meeting may itself be a gambit to pressure the unions.

Twin bankruptcies could further darken the skies for the industry at a time when prospects seemed to be brightening. Though fuel prices were burdening U.S. carriers even before Hurricane Katrina, many had eked more savings out of their operations and were benefiting from growing passenger traffic. Airlines were able to raise their fares somewhat this summer despite continued tough competition. Thanks in part to the summer surge in traffic, carriers like AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, the leading U.S. carrier in terms of traffic, and Continental Airlines posted second-quarter profit after several quarters of losses.

But bankruptcy filings by Northwest and Delta could make competition in the industry much tougher. Both would want to sharply reduce costs while under bankruptcy protection, which gives them greater ability to abrogate union contracts and make other radical moves.

The wave of bankruptcies in recent years has led to industry complaints that bankruptcy allows too many carriers to stay in the air, when the industry could benefit from less competition. Currently in Chapter 11 are US Airways Group Inc., UAL Corp.'s United Airlines, Aloha Airgroup Inc. and ATA Holdings Corp., parent of ATA Airlines. Hawaiian Airlines emerged from Chapter 11 this summer.

Bankruptcies rarely have much effect on passengers. The carriers continue to operate their route networks, although they often cut back some capacity and reduce their fleets, getting their commuter affiliates to assume more flying. Airlines maintain their frequent-flier plans as well, and sometimes they offer fare sales and mileage bonuses to keep customers who might be leaning toward switching carriers.

While Chapter 11 allows airlines to continue operating, it's a costly and cumbersome process. Carriers must pay bankruptcy lawyers and consultants, including the advisers to their creditors' committees. Dealing with these complex cases also takes up much of management's time. Companies must seek court approval for myriad standard expenditures and decisions, and all of their activities are an open book because filings, contracts and business decisions are outlined in public court filings.

US Airways, after shedding pension plans and getting concessions from its workers, hopes to emerge soon from Chapter 11 through a combination with America West Holdings Corp. The two carriers said the result would be one low-cost airline when the transaction is completed, perhaps in the next two weeks. United, which also shed pensions and won union concessions, last week filed its plan of reorganization after many months in bankruptcy protection. The country's No. 2 carrier in terms of traffic also hopes to emerge as a much-lower-cost airline.

Both No. 3 Delta and No. 4 Northwest have been warning for months about the possibility of seeking bankruptcy protection. The threat has grown more dire as Katrina disrupted flights to the Gulf Coast and crippled oil refineries, sending jet-fuel prices soaring. Delta has been further burdened by its inability to restructure its massive debt load and Northwest by a strike by mechanics.

At a meeting Wednesday, Delta executives and directors are expected to give final authorization for a Chapter 11 filing, capping a four-year financial dive brought on by a heavy debt load and high fuel costs that have overwhelmed restructuring efforts. Delta plans to make its filing after the close of financial markets in the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York, immediately following the directors' approval, according to people familiar with the situation.

In recent days, the company has wrapped up details of an approximately $1.7 billion financing package from creditors led by General Electric Co.'s commercial lending unit. The so-called debtor-in-possession agreement is meant to help the airline continue its operations while under court protection. The financing pact includes as much as $650 million in new financing, according to documents reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. The rest of the financing will go to pay off the approximately $1 billion outstanding on a loan made last fall, also from a group led by GE, that helped Delta avoid bankruptcy at that time.

To obtain the financing, Delta will have to encumber essentially every one of its unencumbered assets, including aircraft, spare parts, its Comair regional feeder unit and AirElite private-jet operation, airport gates and even its routes to Tokyo and London, according to the documents reviewed by the Journal. The assets have an estimated value of $3 billion.

Delta reported more than $20 billion in debt at the end of June and said its cash cushion stood at $1.7 billion. But the carrier warned that it was likely to violate certain debt agreements later this year that require it to maintain at least $1 billion in cash. Among its liabilities due by year end, Delta said, were $470 million in maturing debt, $550 million in interest payments, $460 million due for operating leases and $135 million in pension payments.

As Delta's troubles have worsened, the value of its outstanding shares has fallen to below $125 million, less than even the $930 million market value of low-cost Atlanta rival AirTran Holdings Inc., which operates AirTran Airways, a carrier a fraction of Delta's size.

Delta officials are dispatching teams of supervisors to meet with employees Thursday and Friday to explain the likely impact of the filing on their wages, benefits and pensions.

The company has, along with Northwest, pushed for federal legislation that would give airlines more time to catch up with pension payments. Delta's pensions are underfunded by $5.3 billion. The legislation is making progress, but Delta officials now believe the bill in its current form, offering 14 years to catch up, may not be enough to help Delta preserve its pensions. Creditors are likely to make a move to force Delta into a distressed termination, which occurs when a company in bankruptcy is allowed to jettison its pensions onto the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp.

Last week, Delta met with representatives of the government pension insurer, people familiar with the matter said. No decisions have been made on whether to end the pensions. But such a move would add substantially to growing deficit of the PBGC, which already has assumed the pensions of US Airways and United.

Northwest officially said Tuesday it had made no decision about a bankruptcy filing. But a person familiar with the matter said directors meeting Wednesday are expected to weigh whether to file at once or hold off for a few weeks to give the airline's unions a deadline for making concessions the carrier says it needs.

On Monday, the St. Paul, Minn., airline defaulted on an $18.7 million payment it owed one of its commuter affiliates, and faces a payment due Thursday of $65 million to its underfunded pension plans. Northwest has a grace period that ends next Tuesday to pay MAIR Holdings Inc., owner of Mesaba Airlines, but enjoys no such latitude on the pension obligation.

In a Securities and Exchange Commission filing late Tuesday, Northwest confirmed that it missed the semi-monthly payment to Mesaba. It also said it decided not to make $23 million in payments due last weekend and Monday on aircraft financings. Those agreements give the carrier grace periods of five to 10 business days. The SEC filing also said if Northwest fails to make Thursday's pension payment, a lien would arise against its assets unless it had previously sought bankruptcy protection.

While Northwest has managed to stay aloft through the mechanics strike, helped by temporary replacement workers it may take on full-time, its future without major labor concessions and legislative relief from its pension problems is in doubt. The carrier said its cash cushion, which was $2.46 billion at the end of last year, had fallen to $1.7 billion at the end of August, and the airline is burning through $4 million in cash a day. Still, the $1.7 billion is enough cash that Northwest doesn't necessarily need a debtor-in-possession loan, said a person with knowledge of the matter.

Another person familiar with Northwest's situation said the carrier could arrange such a loan later, but it might not be so easy. The carrier's long-term debt and capital-lease obligations stand at $8.1 billion, and its pension plans are underfunded by $3.8 billion. Since the industry downturn began in 2001, Northwest has produced nearly $3 billion in operating losses. Its liabilities and shareholders deficit total $14.4 billion.

Based on its closing price of $1.57 a share Tuesday, Northwest has a market capitalization of about $136 million.

Northwest's cash cushion has made it hard for the airline to convince unions it needed $950 million in annual savings. Northwest raised the target to $1.1 billion this year and is now telling workers it needs $1.4 billion, according to the striking Aircraft Mechanics Fraternal Association. So far, the pilots are the only unionized group that has granted wage concessions, and recently they agreed to talk about a second round of savings. Negotiations with other unions continue, but the mechanics struck over Northwest's last contract offer, made last month, and further talks this the weekend failed.

Northwest's board, which currently has 13 members, has three directors who represent labor. It's expected that they might press management to set a firm deadline for labor to give concessions, giving the unions notice that they must act now or face a bankruptcy filing, said one person familiar with the situation.

Douglas Runte, who covers airline debt and equity for Morgan Stanley, said Tuesday night that he believes Northwest "is a company that can successfully restructure out of court," adding that the airline hasn't yet pursued all avenues that could keep it out of Chapter 11.

Bankruptcy filings give management more leverage over labor because the company can ask a judge to abrogate current labor agreements and let new terms be imposed. In addition, pension plans can be terminated in Chapter 11 and transferred to the PBGC, resulting in smaller payments to some workers.

Other directors might feel the unions have had plenty of time to reflect on Northwest's precarious situation and want to file now to avoid making Thursday's pension payment and another financing payment due in early October, one person said. In the SEC filing late Tuesday, Northwest said it is engaged in an analysis of its debt, lease and other obligations to determine which "should be targeted for restructuring." The payments it missed in recent days "are among those that the company has identified that it would seek to restructure as part of a transformation plan."

How long Delta or Northwest might be in Chapter 11 depends. US Airways was in and out in eight months on its first filing in 2002-03, and it is just about to emerge from its second filing after 12 months. UAL, on the other hand will hit the three-year mark in court protection in early December. If Northwest doesn't wind up filing until the bankruptcy laws change on Oct. 17, it would have to be quicker about it because the new law doesn't allow the debtor company to continue indefinitely having exclusive rights to field its reorganization plan.

Source: Delta Plans To File For Bankruptcy (FINDLAW/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Ap Business Writer

Find Law, September 14, 2005

(AP) - ATLANTA-Delta Air Lines Inc., the nation's third-largest carrier, plans to file for bankruptcy protection in New York as early as Wednesday, according to an industry consultant who has been informed of the company's plans.

The consultant, who was not authorized to disclose the information and thus spoke on condition of anonymity, said Delta is working with GE Commercial Finance and other creditors to arrange roughly $2 billion in debtor-in-possession financing. The money would allow the airline to operate in bankruptcy.

Delta, which has lost nearly $10 billion since January 2001, likely will pledge the few remaining assets not already pledged as collateral for loans as part of the bankruptcy financing agreement, the consultant said. "There is nothing unencumbered after this," according to this consultant.

The consultant said the filing was expected to come Wednesday afternoon but could be pushed to Thursday depending on when the bankruptcy financing is completed.

A Delta spokeswoman declined to comment, saying no decision about bankruptcy has been made. Two spokesmen for GE Commercial Finance also declined to immediately comment. Reached at his Connecticut home Monday, Delta director Edward H. Budd said, "Anything that's going to be talked about at Delta is going to come from Delta." Calls to the homes of four other company directors were not answered.

The bankruptcy filing would come as Atlanta-based Delta has been unable to right itself amid persistently high fuel costs and heavy debt and pension obligations.

The filing would make Delta the third major U.S. carrier to enter Chapter 11 since the 2001 terrorist attacks, joining Elk Grove Village, Ill.-based UAL Corp., parent of United Airlines, and Arlington, Va.-based US Airways Group, Inc., which has filed twice in the last three years.

Some smaller carriers, including Honolulu-based Hawaiian Airlines and Indianapolis-based ATA Airlines Inc., also have filed for bankruptcy in recent years.

If it follows the pattern of most big airline bankruptcies, Delta's existing shares would eventually become worthless and portions of the airline's existing debt would be exchanged for equity in a reorganized Delta. One major question is whether Delta would go the route of UAL and US Airways and seek to turn over its pilot and other employee pension plans to the federal government.

Delta's total debt is roughly $20.5 billion, and it listed $21.6 billion in assets as of June 30. The asset figure would make Delta's bankruptcy the ninth-largest in U.S. history, according to bankruptcy tracker New Generation Research, Inc.

Delta has announced up to 24,000 job cuts over the last four years. In September 2004, it also said it would shed its Dallas hub as part of a sweeping turnaround plan aimed at saving the airline. The plan was hampered, however, by soaring fuel costs.

Fort Worth, Texas-based AMR Corp., the parent of American Airlines, the nation's biggest carrier, teetered on the verge of bankruptcy before winning deep concessions from its employees.

The other legacy carriers, those with a large presence in multiple regions prior to deregulation in 1978, are Eagan, Minn.-based Northwest Airlines Corp. and Houston-based Continental Airlines Inc.

Northwest has also been said to be close to bankruptcy.

Two Major Airlines Seen Near Filing For Bankruptcy (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

Two of the nation's biggest and most troubled airlines, Northwest and Delta, appeared likely to file for bankruptcy protection as soon as today, people briefed on the airlines' plans said yesterday.

Both airlines have been hit hard by the spike in jet fuel prices this month and by the relentless competition in the industry.

Filings by Northwest and Delta would mean that four of the seven major airlines would be operating under court protection, with the others being United and US Airways. Also, when several smaller bankrupt carriers are included, half the seats available on flights in the United States would be operated by bankrupt airlines, according to an estimate by Standard & Poor's Ratings Services.

Court protection would have little immediate impact on either airline's routes and flights, and frequent-flier programs would remain in place. But consumers may eventually see reduced service to some cities, as the airlines shift their focus to destinations where they can make money.

And if the experience at the other major airlines in bankruptcy is a guide, workers at Northwest and Delta can expect significant job cuts, reductions in wages and benefits and termination of their traditional pension plans as the companies streamline their operations.

Both companies were completing bankruptcy plans yesterday. Officials at each airline said a final decision had not been made to seek Chapter 11 protection.

A filing by Northwest would need the approval of its board, which is set to meet today, its pilots' union said in a statement yesterday. The union has a representative on Northwest's board. Delta's board met last Friday.

Any filing by either airline would be made in United States Bankruptcy Court in New York. Delta's filing has been anticipated for weeks, but any Northwest move was not expected for several more weeks as it continued to try to win the $1.4 billion in concessions from its labor unions that it said it needed to avoid a court filing.

But the jump in fuel prices in the wake of Hurricane Katrina moved the company's timetable forward, people with direct knowledge of Northwest's position said last night. Still, a lively debate was expected at the board meeting over whether to file now or wait, these people said.

Bankruptcy filings give companies a chance to overhaul their operations and negotiate lower payments to creditors as well as streamline in ways they could not accomplish outside of court protection.

But for these airlines, bankruptcy would not eliminate the challenge posed by low-fare carriers, like Southwest and JetBlue, which now carry one-third of passengers on flights within the United States.

They can charge less for tickets because they operate at much lower costs than their major competitors, employing fewer workers for each airplane and having much quicker turnaround times at airports. That, in turn, allows them to make more flights a day than big airlines.

The low-fare airlines' growing presence, up from just 6 percent of passengers in 1990, has kept the big airlines from passing along the punishing rise in the price of jet fuel.

The airlines use 19 billion gallons of fuel a year, and,

even before Hurricane Katrina, they were paying 50 percent more for it than in 2004. Prices jumped 25 percent in the days after the storm, although they have since moderated slightly.

Northwest and Delta, like most of their competitors, have no financial protection to shield them from the higher fuel prices, meaning they must immediately pay more in cash when prices go up.

The struggles of inefficient airlines and the rise of low-fare carriers are exactly what was envisioned when President Jimmy Carter ordered the deregulation of the industry in 1978, freeing the airlines from government controls on routes and fares, said Alfred E. Kahn, chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board at the time.

"This is the continued working out of the restructuring that deregulation promised and made inescapable," Mr. Kahn said yesterday. He added, "I don't know where it is going to end."

At Northwest and Delta, at least, a way of life is coming to an end for employees.

United, which set off the biggest default in the history of the federal pension agency this year when it scrapped its traditional retirement plans, has obtained two deep rounds of cuts from its workers under bankruptcy protection, and it eliminated 25,000 jobs.

US Airways, which had 46,500 workers before the September 2001 terrorist attacks led to deep declines in travel, now has just 22,000. Its workers took three rounds of cuts in its two bankruptcies.

"For American workers, it's an unrelentingly grim scenario," David Gregory, a professor of labor law at St. John's University, said yesterday.

But even though both companies warned repeatedly that they might have to seek bankruptcy protection, workers at each have resisted cutbacks, especially those at Northwest, which has lost $3.6 billion since 2001.

It has been trying for three years to win concessions from its pilots, flight attendants, baggage handlers and other employees, raising its demand for cuts from $900 million to $1.4 billion in that time.

But only Northwest's pilots have agreed to cuts, and the airline is in the third week of a strike by 4,430 members of its mechanics' union, who walked out Aug. 20 over the airline's request for $176 million in concessions.

Northwest has kept operating with 1,900 supervisors, contractors and replacement workers. Yesterday, it began offering permanent jobs to some replacement workers. If the strike is settled, Northwest will not have to rehire workers it permanently replaced.

Northwest shares lost half their value yesterday, after The New York Times reported on its Web site that the company was considering filing for bankruptcy protection today. Northwest shares fell $1.74, or 52 percent, to $1.57.

Delta shares, meanwhile, fell 7 cents, to 78 cents. Delta asked its pilots yesterday for another round of deep cuts, on top of the $1 billion in concessions obtained a year ago, when Delta was on the verge of seeking bankruptcy protection.

Delta and its regional airlines operate about 3,000 daily flights. The airline, based in Atlanta, has about 52,000 employees. Northwest and its regional carriers operate 1,500 daily flights. Northwest, based in Eagan, Minn., has about 40,000 employees.

Leaders of the Air Line Pilots Association, Delta's only unionized group, said they would start a three-day meeting next Monday to decide whether to negotiate with the company.

But by then, Delta may be in bankruptcy, a fate that its chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, has tried desperately to avoid. Mr. Grinstein, 72, took charge of the airline 20 months ago, and has since tried to cut $5 billion in costs under a restructuring plan that included the elimination of 7,000 jobs.

Last week, Delta, which has lost nearly $10 billion since 2001, sold Atlantic Southeast Airlines, one of its commuter airlines, to SkyWest for $450 million. And Delta has been arranging the financing it will need to operate in bankruptcy, believed to be about $1.7 billion, with lenders like GE Corporate Financing.

This week, however, came signs that the airline was running out of time. As it was seeking more cuts from the pilots, Delta did not make an interest payment on its corporate debt, taking advantage of a grace period that gives it more time.

A Delta spokeswoman, Chris E. Kelly, said the airline believed that the move was "a prudent step to take" while it decided whether to seek bankruptcy protection. Delta faces another debt payment on Monday.

Meanwhile, Northwest disclosed in a regulatory filing yesterday that it must make a $65 million pension payment tomorrow, which it cannot skip unless it has filed for bankruptcy protection. Yesterday, the Treasury Department rejected a request by Northwest to delay the payment, saying it was limiting relief to corporations in the gulf region.

Northwest also disclosed that it had delayed $42 million in debt payments. These, and the pension payment, would diminish Northwest's cash, which dwindled to $1.7 billion this month from $2.1 billion at the end of June.

But even that smaller amount could be enough to finance the airline's operations in the first months of bankruptcy protection, serving as the equivalent of debtor-in-possession financing, said Philip A. Baggaley, an airline analyst at S.& P. That would explain why the airline has apparently not sought outside financing as Delta has done.

One advantage for Northwest is that many of its senior executives have experience with airline bankruptcies, particularly its chief executive, Douglas M. Steenland, 53, a lawyer who took part in cases involving Continental Airlines and Eastern Air Lines.

And because Mr. Steenland is said to believe that his airline's bankruptcy case may take more than 18 months, that is probably one reason Northwest as well as Delta may file today.

Federal bankruptcy laws change on Oct. 17; after that management will have only 18 months to draft a restructuring plan.

Companies that file before Oct. 17 can have more time if they can persuade a judge to grant it. United, for example, has been operating under bankruptcy protection for nearly three years, and does not expect to emerge until February.

Ron Adams, a member of the mechanics' union at Northwest, said he was not surprised to hear the airline was contemplating a bankruptcy filing. But he said that did not make him any more willing to accept the cuts.

"I want to keep my job, but if they want to replace me, more power to them," Mr. Adams said yesterday while walking the picket line at Detroit Metropolitan Airport, one of the airline's hubs.

Delta, Northwest On Brink Of Chapter 11 (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 14, 2005

Delta Air Lines, the third-largest US carrier by revenues, is expected to file for bankruptcy protection on Wednesday, as the board of Northwest, its smaller rival, meets to examine strategic options ahead of its own possible filing.

Delta has lined up debtor-in-possession financing, allowing it to restructure operations and repair its balance sheet.

Although Northwest has been weighing a filing, its efforts to secure funding had been thought to be less advanced as management grapples with a three-week strike by maintenance workers.

However, the Minneapolis-based airline is understood to have lined up backing from US Bank, which operates its frequent flyer credit card programme. Airbus, which has financed a large part of the Northwest fleet, is also expected to participate.

The two airlines have sought additional concessions from employees in a bid to cope with rising fuel prices and the weak revenue environment created by intensifying competition from lower-cost rivals such as Southwest, AirTran and JetBlue.

The reorganisation plans are likely to see both airlines shrink domestic operations in favour of more profitable international routes, though analysts cautioned this would still leave the US industry with overcapacity. Independence Air, a Washington-based airline, is also understood to be close to a filing though industry sources suggested this would lead to its liquidation.

Both carriers on Tuesday declined to comment on the timing of any filing under Chapter 11 of the US bankruptcy code, though have repeatedly warned they may need to seek protection. Analysts have pointed to a window of opportunity for filing between the Labor Day holiday and October 17, when new bankruptcy legislation is due to be enacted.

United Airlines, the second-largest carrier after American, has been in Chapter 11 since December 2002, but hopes to emerge early next year. US Airways hopes to emerge later this month following its planned merger with smaller rival America West, whose shareholders on Tuesday approved the combination.

Delta, based in Atlanta, was seen as weaker because of its larger exposure to domestic routes, more onerous pension obligations and the cash drain of renegotiating a deal with its credit card vendors. However, credit analysts on Tuesday noted that Northwest had on Monday defaulted on an $18.7m payment to Mesaba, a regional feeder airline, and saw this as a signal that it was also close to filing.

Airline restructuring experts have warned that filings by Delta and Northwest would increase pressure on American Airlines and Continental Airlines to consider restructuring through the bankruptcy courts. Both carriers have a better cash position ahead of the slacker winter travel season, and have not indicated any plans to seek protection.

Delta lost $5.2bn last year and is targeting $5bn of cost cuts by the end of 2006 through changing its network and securing at least $1bn in cuts from pilots. It has held fresh talks with pilots in an effort to increase the savings. Northwest on Tuesday began hiring permanent replacements for its 4,400 striking mechanics, who walked off the job on August 20 after rejecting the airline's calls for steep job and pay cuts. The airline has raised its targeted annual savings from $1.1bn to $1.4bn.

President Revisits Foreign Policy (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 13 -- After nearly two weeks consumed by Hurricane Katrina, President Bush turned his attention back to the rest of the world Tuesday and confronted again the vexing challenges of an intractable war in Iraq, disputes with Iran and North Korea, and fitful relations with the United Nations.

Bush played host to Iraq's first democratically selected president at the White House in the morning and persuaded him to abandon talk of imminent U.S. troop pullouts. Bush then flew to New York in the afternoon to attend a division-plagued U.N. summit and to solicit Chinese help in pressuring Pyongyang and Tehran to abandon nuclear weapons ambitions.

The full day of diplomacy marked the first time that Bush has resumed a normal schedule since clearing his calendar after the devastation wrought by Katrina along the Gulf Coast. Among other events, Bush canceled a pomp-filled visit by Chinese President Hu Jintao last week to concentrate on getting relief to storm-ravaged areas. But Bush began to make it up to Hu by meeting with him here Tuesday evening, one of the first sit-down sessions with another world leader since the crisis.

The rest of the week is jammed with other foreign policy events, including meetings Wednesday with the prime ministers of Britain and Israel, a U.N. gathering of 170 world leaders and a White House summit Friday with Russian President Vladimir Putin. But aides insisted Bush would keep his attention on the afflicted region, scheduling a fourth trip there for Thursday capped by a prime-time national address.

In perhaps the most sensitive meeting of the day, Bush spent an hour with Hu. Bush gave him a list of human rights cases that the United States is concerned about, a list that a senior U.S. official said is topped by the longtime imprisonment of a researcher for the New York Times on accusations of disclosing state secrets.

During a public appearance, Hu promised "to step up" efforts on North Korea "so that we can facilitate fresh progress" in multilateral talks scheduled to resume in Beijing. During their private session, the U.S. side said Hu was supportive of efforts to curtail Iran's nuclear ambitions as well, but offered no support for Bush's bid to refer Tehran to the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions.

Bush's meeting with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani came a day after he departed from White House talking points and broached the prospect of large-scale withdrawal of U.S. forces from his country. In an interview with The Washington Post on Monday, Talabani said "at least from 40,000 to 50,000 American troops can be [withdrawn] by the end of this year."

After meeting with Bush on Tuesday morning, Talabani joined the president in the East Room to deliver a different message. "We will set no timetable for withdrawal, Mr. President," Talabani said at a joint media availability. "A timetable will help the terrorists, will encourage them [to think] that they could defeat a superpower of the world and the Iraqi people."

Still, Talabani added that he hoped enough Iraqi security forces would be trained by the end of 2006 to take " responsibility from many American troops with complete agreement with Americans."

A longtime Kurdish leader who resisted Saddam Hussein's rule, Talabani effusively thanked Bush for liberating Iraqis from the "worst kind of dictatorship" and praised him as "a visionary, great statesman." Smiling broadly, Talabani said, "We will never forget what you have done for our people."

Bush, in turn, praised the new constitution drafted by Iraqi negotiators as "an historic milestone" that protects fundamental rights and makes all Iraqis equal before the law. In private, though, aides said Bush used the opportunity to urge Talabani to be flexible in considering changes to the constitution, which was written by Shiite and Kurdish leaders but rejected by leaders of the Sunni minority.

The president also delivered a sharp warning to Syria for not doing more to stop foreign fighters from crossing its border with Iraq to fight U.S. forces. "The Syrian leader must understand we take his lack of action seriously," Bush said, adding that he plans to speak with allies about pressuring Damascus.

Bush similarly said he would bring up Iran with Hu and Putin in hopes of forging a consensus approach to blocking any nuclear weapons development by the theocratic state. Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who will be in New York for his first U.S. visit since winning election, has insisted that his country wants to develop only civilian nuclear power.

"Some of us are wondering why they need civilian nuclear power, anyway," Bush said. "They're awash with hydrocarbons. Nevertheless, it's a right of a government to want to have a civilian nuclear program."

That comment caused a stir because the U.S. government has adamantly rejected North Korea's aspirations for civilian nuclear power. Aides later insisted Bush was not trying to signal a policy change toward Pyongyang. "I can guarantee you that's not what he intended to indicate," said National Security Council spokesman Frederick L. Jones II.

Arriving in New York later in the day, Bush met with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan in preparation for Wednesday's summit. Negotiators agreed on a plan to restructure the United Nations and follow up pledges to combat world poverty.

During his subsequent joint appearance with Hu, the Chinese leader acknowledged "some frictions" as trade grows and promised that Beijing will "take effective measures" to address trade imbalances and "step up its efforts to protect intellectual properties." Hu urged the United States to oppose "so-called Taiwan independence."

Bush, who will visit China in November, emphasized the strength of the relationship. "I will bring up human rights," the president said. "But most importantly, I view this visit as an opportunity to continue a dialogue in dealing with a very important relationship for the United States and the world."

Bush Puts Iraq, China And Iran On Agenda (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

For the first time since the Hurricane Katrina crisis, President Bush returned yesterday to dealing with festering global problems, trying to bolster Iraq's president at the White House and then flying to New York to urge President Hu Jintao of China to join him in trying to stop nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea.

Mr. Bush's meeting with Mr. Hu was delayed a week by the hurricane, and was the first in a series planned for coming months, including a trip by Mr. Bush to China in November.

When the session finally took place yesterday at the Waldorf-Astoria, Mr. Bush was lobbying hard to persuade Mr. Hu - who has nurtured a close relationship with Iran - not to block action by the International Atomic Energy Agency next week to refer Iran's work on uranium enrichment to the Security Council.

"We didn't come away with a clear commitment," Michael J. Green, the top official for Asia in the National Security Council, said yesterday evening. But he added that Mr. Hu had agreed to urge Iran to follow the mandates of the I.A.E.A.

Nuclear issues, trade and Taiwan dominated the meeting at the Waldorf, before Mr. Bush held a reception for more than 170 world leaders who have gathered for the opening of the United Nations General Assembly and a meeting on global poverty.

Mr. Bush's aides also turned over to Mr. Hu a list of human rights cases that particularly concern the United States, Mr. Green said. While they declined to describe most of those cases, Mr. Green said one involved Zhao Yan, a researcher for The New York Times in Beijing, who has been accused of leaking state secrets to the newspaper. Mr. Zhao and The Times have denied the accusation, and Mr. Zhao has had no court hearing or any public explanation of why he was arrested.

Earlier yesterday, at a news conference in Washington with President Jalal Talabani of Iraq, Mr. Bush expressed some impatience with Iran's defiance of an agreement it reached last year with three European nations.

"Some of us are wondering why they need civilian nuclear power anyway," Mr. Bush said. "They're awash with hydrocarbons. Nevertheless, it's a right of a government to want to have a civilian nuclear program."

DOJ_NMG_0005145

Mr. Bush's aides insisted later in the day that the president was not, with that last statement, signaling a greater willingness to allow either Iran or North Korea to acquire what both have said is their right: control over the complete nuclear fuel cycle, the path to making fuel for either civilian reactors or weapons. Mr. Bush explicitly said Iran's nuclear program should develop "in such a way that they don't gain the expertise necessary to be able to enrich."

But his comments were far milder than they were three years ago, when Mr. Bush first called Iran and North Korea part of an "axis of evil."

Instead, Mr. Green said, Mr. Hu and Mr. Bush talked about ways to pressure North Korea to make what Mr. Green called "a strategic decision" to give up its weapons programs.

Talks on North Korea resumed in Beijing yesterday, with North Korea repeating, as Iran has, that it has a right to develop its own civilian nuclear programs.

While Mr. Hu and Mr. Bush carefully chose words to show their agreement on the issue - "We have always stood for a nuclear-weapon-free Korean Peninsula," Mr. Hu said - some administration officials say they are increasingly concerned that the United States and Tokyo are pursuing one approach, and Beijing and South Korea are pursuing another.

The United States has made full disarmament of North Korea its priority. But both the Chinese and the South Koreans have spoken of the need to assure "stability" in North Korea, a code word for making sure that the North Korean government does not collapse.

At moments, the meeting with the Chinese had echoes of the kind of meetings Mr. Bush's father used to hold with Japan in the late 1980's when he was trying to lower a fast-widening trade deficit with Japan and used to travel to Tokyo to urge Japan, when its economy seemed to be growing without limit, to pay heed to the damage being done to American workers.

Mr. Hu was ready for that.

"What I would like to express here is that China does not pursue a huge trade surplus in its trade with the United States," he said. "And we are willing to work with the United States to take effective measures to increase China's imports from the United States."

The last statement was especially significant, because Mr. Hu steered clear of committing to any restraints in exports to the United States.

The issue may become even more heated if Hurricane Katrina leads to a downturn in American economic growth. Some of the affected industries in the south compete with Chinese companies, and were already calling for greater government protection.

The earlier meeting with Mr. Talabani was notable for the Iraqi leader's change of tone on an issue important to Mr. Bush: setting any parameters for the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq.

On Friday in Washington, Mr. Talabani said he believed that American troops would be required for two years. The Washington Post reported Monday that he had said he thought 40,000 to 50,000 American troops could be withdrawn by the end of the year. But yesterday, he recited the White House talking points: that it was impossible, and unwise, to set a deadline. "We will set no timetable for withdrawal, Mr. President," he said to Mr. Bush.

Bush Packs In Busy Day Of Diplomacy (AJC/AP)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

NEW YORK — President Bush won a pledge from Chinese President Hu Jintao to step up pressure on North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons, but the two leaders remained apart Tuesday over whether to seek international sanctions against Iran.

The two leaders met here as talks resumed in Beijing aimed at persuading North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons.

Bush said his discussions with Hu ranged from how to prevent an avian flu pandemic to economic matters and feared nuclear proliferation in North Korea and Iran. He seemed pleased when Hu said, "We stand ready to step up our communication and cooperation" to gain fresh progress in negotiations with North Korea.

While offering help on North Korea, Hu did not embrace a U.S. proposal to bring Iran before the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions for its suspected nuclear weapons program. "No, we didn't come away with a clear commitment on the tactics," Mike Green, the National Security Council's senior director for Asia, said at a briefing on the Bush-Hu meeting.

"China thinks we all need to step up the diplomatic efforts," Green said. He said Bush did not ask for a commitment on sanctions, but the Chinese side "understands, I think, exactly where we're coming from."

Bush, at a news conference earlier in Washington, appeared to give Iran a green light to have a peaceful nuclear program. But the United States has a different view about North Korea. "North Korea needs to get out, completely out, of the nuclear business," Green said.

Consumed by Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts for two weeks, Bush pivoted to foreign policy for a meeting of more than 160 presidents, prime ministers and kings at a summit on combating poverty and reforming the United Nations. Bush is to address the General Assembly on Wednesday.

Bush has had a testy relationship with the U.N., portraying it as a bloated bureaucracy slow to address global problems. Criticism of the United States is common, particularly over the war in Iraq and Bush's refusal to sign the Kyoto treaty on global warming. Bush arrived here with the lowest approval ratings of his presidency and the perception that his administration had mishandled hurricane relief. He said he took responsibility for whatever had gone wrong.

Bush met privately in a hotel suite with Hu, who is making his first visit to the United States as his country's leader. The White House is concerned about China's growing economic and military might and its voracious thirst for oil — a factor in rising U.S. gasoline prices.

The president broadly raised human rights concerns with Hu, and the administration presented China's delegation with a list of specific cases that the United States regards as particularly important. Green declined to identify the cases or say how many were on the list, saying the goal was to try to resolve them quietly.

Bush accepted an invitation to visit China in November after a summit in South Korea with Asian leaders. The president also is expected to stop in Japan.

For his part, Hu acknowledged tensions with Washington about China's huge trade surplus and said that "it is inevitable that we may have some frictions."

Bush met with Hu at the end of a busy day of diplomacy stretching from the White House to the United Nations. In Washington, the president issued a stern warning to Syria about alleged involvement in Iraq and vowed the United States will not waver from its commitment in Iraq.

The Bush administration is seeking the support of China, Russia and India to bring Iran before the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions for its suspected nuclear weapons program. Iran suspended uranium conversion and enrichment activities last year but resumed them last month. Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, warned of serious consequences if the Security Council considers sanctions.

Bush questioned why Iran needs a civilian nuclear power program, given Tehran's huge oil reserves. "Nevertheless, it's a right of a government to want to have a civilian nuclear program," Bush said. But he went on to say there must be guidelines and "one such guideline would be in such a way that they don't gain the expertise necessary to be able to enrich."

China has a massive surplus in trade with the United States. Last year's U.S.-China deficit hit a record $162 billion, the largest imbalance ever recorded with a single country.

Hu promised to "work hard" to address the trade imbalance and said China will protect the intellectual property rights of American companies — a major concern of U.S. firms.

"What I would like to stress here is that China does not pursue a huge trade surplus in trade with the United States," Hu said.

Bush began the day at the White House, meeting with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani. Once again, the two leaders refused to set a deadline for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Hu Tells Bush China Will Work On U.S. Concerns (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0005147

NEW YORK -- Chinese President Hu Jintao told President Bush that his government was prepared to take "effective measures" to ease the soaring U.S. trade deficit with China while also moving to crack down on rampant piracy problems at home.

The two leaders met on the margins of a United Nations summit here at a time of varied tensions between the two countries and a week after Hurricane Katrina postponed a long-anticipated White House visit by Mr. Hu. In remarks before the two met in private, Mr. Hu said China "does not pursue a huge trade surplus" with the U.S. and was willing to take steps to increase U.S. imports to China, mainly by strengthening piracy rules and increasing purchases of big-ticket items.

The U.S. last year imported $162 billion more from China than it exported to China. U.S. officials said that Mr. Hu's remarks on intellectual-property protection were particularly important, and among the strongest assurances on that front that any Chinese leader has ever offered. Mr. Hu said that on the whole, relations between the two countries were "developing quite well," although he conceded that the rapid growth in bilateral trade had created "some frictions" between the two economic powers.

The U.S. and China in recent months have tussled over issues from China's restrictive monetary policy and intellectual-property problems to the desire among Chinese energy companies such as Cnooc Ltd. to acquire corporate assets in the U.S. and elsewhere.

Mike Green, President Bush's top Asia adviser, said Mr. Bush used the hourlong session to press Mr. Hu to use China's clout in international efforts to halt nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea. On Iran, Mr. Hu told the president that China wanted to see Tehran live up to its international obligations, but he didn't offer explicit support for any moves to take the matter to the U.N. Security Council.

Mr. Bush also urged the two countries to coordinate efforts to avoid a potential avian-flu pandemic through aggressive containment, and a strengthened early-warning system. Mr. Hu went on at some length during the private discussion to emphasize that China was intent on "peaceful development," Mr. Green said.

On the issue of China's exchange rate, Mr. Bush applauded Beijing's move this summer to allow the yuan to float slightly against other currencies, but urged Mr. Hu to take additional steps to adopt a fully flexible exchange rate. Mr. Bush also agreed to visit Beijing in late November.

Bush Heads To U.N. Summit With Global Views Of U.S. Altered (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS - President Bush joins in the largest-ever gathering of world leaders here Wednesday at a moment when his government's botched response to Hurricane Katrina has changed views of America both at home and abroad.

Opinion columns around the world expressed incredulity that the world's wealthiest country could fail to take care of its own. The hurricane aftermath threw a light on America's class and racial divides.

At home, polls show, Americans want more attention on domestic concerns and less on the war on terrorism.

The president and his top aides have given no sign they intend to change the course from their foreign policy priorities: the promotion of democracy around the world and the war in Iraq. Still, public opinion at home and abroad will pose challenges for this agenda, according to diplomats and other foreign policy observers.

The images of poor, mostly black Americans waiting days for help and rescue collide with Bush's goal of improving the United States' image overseas, an effort headed by his long-time aide Karen Hughes.

"If Katrina has any redeeming impact, it must be to cause us to see ourselves as others see us. I regret to say the picture cannot be a pretty one," Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., said in a Senate floor speech. "The perception of the United States in these troubled times should be a cause of major concern for everyone who holds public office."

Hughes, the undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, vigorously disputed charges, heard at home and abroad, that the Bush administration reacted slowly because Katrina's victims were mostly poor and black.

The world has also seen evidence of Americans' overwhelming generosity in times of need, Hughes said. "The story is, Americans care about our fellow Americans."

But the world also has seen vivid examples of poverty and racial division in the disaster zone.

The U.N.'s 2005 Human Development Report, a look at how the world is doing meeting targets set five years ago at reducing human suffering, examines, among many other things, inequality in the United States.

"U.S. public health indicators are marred by deep inequalities linked to income, health insurance coverage, race, ethnicity, geography and - critically - access to health care," the authors of the report wrote.

Fifty years of declines in the U.S. infant mortality rate are now being reversed, the report states. It added: "The Indian state of Kerala has an urban infant death rate lower than that for African Americans in Washington, D.C."

After briefly hesitating, Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice agreed to accept assistance from around the globe to help deal with the hurricane's aftermath. Aid, from cash for the American Red Cross to blankets and search and rescue teams, has flowed from dozens of countries.

Some diplomats hope the global solidarity will help heal ties with the United States, which were badly damaged by divisions over the Iraq war and other issues.

Canadians were simmering over a long-standing trade dispute with Washington over softwood lumber - until Katrina hit.

"After all we've gone through on Iraq and war and peace, this is a wonderful opportunity," said Wolfgang Ischinger, Germany's ambassador to the United States. Germany has sent three planeloads of military-style meals, or "meals ready to eat," as well as half a dozen airplanes with water purification experts and equipment.

Ischinger said that from his daily talks with top Bush officials, "They know that accepting these offers ... is not something that will be humiliating. ... It will actually have positive effects on America's relationships with these particular countries."

But Josef Joffe, publisher-editor of the prestigious German weekly Die Zeit, said the United States is unlikely to act more humbly in international affairs as a result.

"The U.S. doesn't need assistance, and help rarely buys compliance. Otherwise so many nations that are beneficiaries of U.S. largesse would do its bidding," Joffe said.

Katrina's main impact on foreign policy could be to simply divert the Bush administration's focus more toward domestic concerns.

Bush's visit to the United Nations is sandwiched between two trips to the Gulf Coast.

He and Rice have been bombarded with questions about Katrina and race issues. And diplomats from the Middle East and elsewhere say they are beginning to worry about sustained U.S. attention to their region.

A poll released last week by the Pew Research Center found that for the first time since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, more Americans felt it was important to focus on domestic issues rather than the war on terrorism, by a margin of 56 percent to 25 percent.

"I think this is really something to watch," said Carroll Doherty, the center's associate director. "You have a clear majority saying domestic policy is important."

The president will gather here with 170 fellow world leaders to sign a document on reducing poverty, raising development levels and reforming the United Nations. The document has been significantly watered down because of deep disagreements among U.N. members.

Bush also planned a series of meetings with other leaders, starting with a Tuesday afternoon meeting with Chinese President Hu Jintao, who expressed sympathy for the hurricane losses.

U.S. Shares Data With China, India To Build Iran Case (WSJ)

By Carla Anne Robbins

WASHINGTON -- As the U.S. and Europe prepare to face off with Iran at the United Nations, the Bush administration dispatched intelligence experts to China and India last week to brief them on Tehran's alleged efforts to develop a missile capable of delivering a nuclear warhead.

The decision to share the highly classified intelligence is a measure of the resistance the U.S. is meeting as it pushes, along with the Europeans, for Iran's nuclear activities to be referred to the U.N. Security Council.

Even after Tehran resumed some sensitive nuclear activities last month and ended negotiations with the Europeans, the U.S. and its allies face a challenge persuading China, Russia and other key nations that the situation is grave enough -- or Iran's weapons program advanced enough -- for international reprisals.

The failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq has damaged U.S. credibility, making it even harder to press the case against Iran.

The missile intelligence, which U.S. officials acquired covertly last year, documents Iran's efforts from 2001 to 2003 to adapt its Shahab-3 missile to deliver a "black box" that experts at U.S. nuclear-weapons laboratories believe almost certainly is a nuclear warhead. The data, which include tens of thousands of pages of Farsi-language computer files, diagrams and missile test results, don't include a nuclear-warhead design. But according to several officials who have been briefed on the intelligence, the specifications for size, shape, weight and detonation don't vary and make no sense for conventional weapons.

The U.S. has already shared the intelligence with Britain, which supported the Iraq war, and with France and Germany, which opposed it, as well as top officials at the International Atomic Energy Agency. Intelligence officials in all three European countries have been impressed with the depth and apparent authenticity of the finding, according to European officials.

The U.S. has also offered to brief Russia on the missile data and may share the findings with other countries in coming days, officials said.

The confrontation with Iran will be a central topic at this week's U.N. summit in New York and at next week's IAEA board meeting in Vienna. Iran's new hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is expected to try to deflect Western pressure when he speaks to the U.N. today and later in the week. U.S. and European officials said he might call for wider negotiations -- possibly bringing in China, Russia and India -- after failing to persuade Europe and the U.S. that his country's nuclear program is solely for generating power.

President Bush speaks to the world body today . Officials last night were discussing what, if anything, he would say about Iran at a meeting that is focused on alleviating poverty and U.N. overhauls. Mindful of the ill will created by the Iraq war, the U.S. has left much of the public lobbying until now to the Europeans.

Recognizing the pivotal role China and Russia will play as veto-wielding members of the Security Council, Mr. Bush said he planned to "speak candidly about Iran" in private meetings with Chinese President Hu Jintao and Russian President Vladimir Putin. "It is very important for the world to understand that Iran with nuclear weapons will be incredibly destabilizing," he said. After Mr. Bush's meeting with the Chinese leader last night, White House Asia expert Michael Green told reporters that Mr. Hu told the President that he would press Iran to live up to its IAEA obligations but didn't commit to supporting a Security Council referral. (See related article on page A8.)

In recent days, Russia and India, among others, have said publicly that they would oppose a Security Council referral.

Iran insists that it has a right to pursue a peaceful nuclear program -- an argument that resonates around the world, especially when backed by Iran's considerable oil wealth. Mr. Bush yesterday acknowledged that right but said constraints need to be imposed to ensure that Iran also doesn't "gain the expertise" to produce nuclear weapons.

U.N. nuclear monitors have repeatedly cited Tehran for concealing and lying about its nuclear efforts. But without solid proof of a weapons program, many members of the IAEA board have resisted a showdown. Some are fearful that a referral could be a first step toward a military confrontation. Other countries have more mercantilist interests, which Iran has deftly played upon. With energy-hungry China and India, in particular, Tehran has emphasized its oil supply; with Moscow its willingness to buy nuclear technology,

In August, Iran restarted its uranium conversion plant, an important first step toward the production of enriched uranium either for nuclear fuel or a nuclear weapon. While the Europeans repeatedly warned Tehran that such a move would provoke a swift referral to the Security Council, neither they nor the Americans have been able to win over a large block of the IAEA's 35-member board, which usually acts on consensus.

U.S. officials said yesterday that it is too early to rate their chances for a referral next week and that much will depend on how conciliatory or confrontational the Iranian leader chooses to be during his meetings in New York.

Some U.S. officials have begun arguing that a simple majority of the board would be enough to go ahead, and that those votes are there. In recent days, the U.S. has come down especially hard on the Indians -- who have status among the nonaligned

-- warning that a White House offer to sell it civilian technology could be scuttled if the U.S. Congress believes New Delhi is too supportive of Iran.

But without the support of Beijing and Moscow a referral would likely stall once it got to the U.N.

In a conversation with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice earlier this week, IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei suggested the U.S. and Europe might seek a resolution that gives Iran a few more weeks to suspend uranium conversion and provide more access to agency monitors or face a referral.

U.S. Deploys Slide Show To Press Case Against Iran (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 13 -- With an hour-long slide show that blends satellite imagery with disquieting assumptions about Iran's nuclear energy program, Bush administration officials have been trying to convince allies that Tehran is on a fast track toward nuclear weapons.

The PowerPoint briefing, titled "A History of Concealment and Deception," has been presented to diplomats from more than a dozen countries. Several diplomats said the presentation, intended to win allies for increasing pressure on the Iranian government, dismisses ambiguities in the evidence about Iran's intentions and omits alternative explanations under debate among intelligence analysts.

The presenters argue that the evidence leads solidly to a conclusion that Iran's nuclear program is aimed at producing weapons, according to diplomats who have attended the briefings and U.S. officials who helped to assemble the slide show. But even U.S. intelligence estimates acknowledge that other possibilities are plausible, though unverified.

The problem, acknowledged one U.S. official, is that the evidence is not definitive. Briefers "say you can't draw any other conclusion, and of course you can draw other conclusions," said the official, who would discuss the closed-door sessions only on condition of anonymity.

The briefings were conducted in Vienna over the past month in advance of a gathering of world leaders this week at the United Nations. President Bush, who is to address the annual General Assembly gathering Wednesday, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, plan to use the meeting to press for agreement to threaten international sanctions against Iran.

The president's direct involvement marks an escalation of a two-year effort to bring Iran before the U.N. Security Council, which has the power to impose sanctions, unless Tehran gives up technology capable of enriching uranium for a bomb. U.S. officials have acknowledged that it has been an uphill campaign, with opposition from key allies who fear a prelude to a military campaign.

Several diplomats said the slide show reminded them of the flawed presentation on Iraq's weapons programs made by then-secretary of state Colin L. Powell to the U.N. Security Council in February 2003. "I don't think they'll lose any support, but it isn't going to win anyone either," said one European diplomat who attended the recent briefing and whose country backs the U.S. position on Iran.

Robert G. Joseph, undersecretary of state for arms control and international security, acknowledged last week that despite European support, the Bush administration has traveled a tough road in persuading others that Iran should face consequences for a nuclear program it built in secret.

"There's a great deal of resistance . . . on the part of many governments who don't seem to place, quite frankly, nonproliferation and Iran, a nuclear-armed Iran, at the top of their priority list," he told a congressional panel last week.

Several influential nations such as India, Russia, China, South Africa and Brazil share U.S. suspicions about Iran's intentions. But they maintain profound differences with the Bush administration over how to respond, and are apprehensive about the goals of a U.S. president who has said "all options are on the table," in dealing with Tehran.

Three years ago, the White House used the same annual gathering to put both Iraq, and the world community on notice. In a toughly-worded speech, delivered six months before the U.S. invasion of Iraq, Bush warned that the United States would deal alone, if necessary, with a dictator bent on launching nuclear weapons.

The U.S. intelligence community no longer believes Iraq was trying to reconstitute a nuclear program, as the president said. Those and other U.S. intelligence failures have remained fresh in the minds of international decision-makers now being asked to weigh the case of Iran.

The Iraq experience has had a "sobering effect" on Iran discussions, said President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan, a close ally of the Bush administration. In an interview, he refused to speculate on whether Iran, whose program was secretly aided by Pakistan's top nuclear scientist, had been designed for weapons production. But he said he feels confident Iran's aims are now peaceful and there was no need for Security Council action.

Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who is also attending the U.N. summit, has his own meetings scheduled in New York, and Iranian officials said he would use the gathering to mount forceful counterarguments. Iranian diplomats have been in close contact with countries such as Japan, which relies heavily on Iranian oil.

The outcome of both sides' efforts will be tested on Sept. 19, when diplomats from 35 countries meet at the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna to decide whether to report Iran's case to the Security Council.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns last night suggested the administration may not be able to press for a successful vote and was exploring other options. He said the administration was working "with lots of other governments to devise an international coalition that will call upon Iran to return to the talks," it walked away from this summer with European negotiators. "There is a consensus that Iran has got to return to the talks."

Iran insists its nuclear efforts are aimed at producing nuclear energy, not bombs. The Bush administration contends that the energy program, built in secret and exposed in 2002, is just a cover. "They cannot be allowed to develop nuclear weapons under the guise of a civilian nuclear program, which is what they're trying to do," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said earlier this month.

A recent U.S. intelligence estimate found that Iran, mostly through its energy program, is acquiring and mastering technologies that could also be used for bomb-making. But there is no proof that such diversion has occurred, the estimate said, and the intelligence community is uncertain as to whether Iran's ruling clerics have made a decision to go forward with a nuclear weapons program.

The estimate judged Iran to be as much as a decade away from being able to manufacture the fissile material necessary for a nuclear explosion. A report issued last week by the International Institute for Security Studies, a London-based research group, found Iran was 10 to 15 years from the technical know-how to build a bomb.

Both reports are based in large part on the findings of U.N. nuclear inspectors, now in their third year of investigating Iran's program. While no proof of a weapons program has been found, serious questions about Tehran's past work on centrifuge designs and experiments with plutonium -- a key ingredient for a nuclear weapon -- have yet to be adequately addressed and have furthered suspicions that the country is hiding information.

With little new information from the probe, the Bush administration put together its own presentation of Iran's program for diplomats in Vienna who are weighing whether to report Iran to the Security Council.

The presentation has not been vetted through standard U.S. intelligence channels because it does not include secret material. One U.S. official involved in the briefing said the intelligence community had nothing to do with the presentation and "probably would have disavowed some of it because it draws conclusions that aren't strictly supported by the facts."

The presentation, conducted in a conference room at the U.S. mission in Vienna, includes a pictorial comparison of Iranian facilities and missiles with photos of similar-looking items in North Korea and Pakistan, according to a copy of the slides handed out to diplomats. Pakistan largely supplied Iran with its nuclear infrastructure but, as a key U.S. ally, it is identified in the presentation only as "another country."

Corey Hinderstein, a nuclear analyst with the Institute for Science and International Security, said the presence of a weapons program could not be established through such comparisons. She noted that North Korea's missile wasn't designed for nuclear weapons so comparing it to an Iranian missile that also wasn't designed to carry a nuclear payload "doesn't make sense."

Decision Time On Iran (NYT)

Brussels

In November 2003, Iran averted a crisis when it agreed to suspend activities that could one day give it the capacity to produce weapons-grade nuclear material. The International Atomic Energy Agency had discovered an 18-year pattern of noncompliance by Iran with its obligations to report all its nuclear activities, during which time international inspectors could not verify that they were solely for peaceful purposes. Because Iran suspended its most sensitive activities, the agency's board agreed to hold off reporting Iran to the United Nations Security Council. This was understood, in effect, as a quid pro quo: suspension of uranium-enrichment-related and reprocessing activities in return for not being reported to the Security Council.

Last November, Iran agreed with Britain, France and Germany to extend its suspension to include "all tests or production at any uranium-conversion installation." Iran also agreed that "sustaining the suspension, while negotiations on a long-term agreement are under way, will be essential for the continuation of the overall process."

But last month, the day before Britain, France and Germany gave Iran a proposal for a long-term agreement that offered economic assistance in exchange for ending its nuclear fuel cycle activities (but not its electrical nuclear program), Tehran announced that it would resume uranium conversion activities in Isfahan, which it did.

The agency's board of governors will meet in Vienna next Monday to decide how to respond. At the moment there is no consensus or even a majority that agrees with Washington, Berlin, London and Paris that Iran's noncompliance should be reported to the Security Council. Iran is vigorously lobbying its fellow developing countries on the board. While the agency's statute makes clear that it should report Iran's noncompliance to the Security Council, many board members are reluctant to do so, fearing a repeat of the dynamic that led to the war in Iraq.

It is important to remember that under the agency's statute, there is no deadline or expiration date after which noncompliance becomes moot. Thus, Iran is still accountable for its past breaches. And Iran's resumption of work related to uranium conversion eliminates the only reason for the three European countries not to report Iran to the Security Council.

A failure by the board to make such a report would considerably weaken the agency and the global nonproliferation regime. It would reveal that the world is unwilling to hold rule-breakers to account, inviting proliferation by other countries.

And it should be made clear that the purpose of reporting Iran to the Security Council is not to seek sanctions. Rather, the Security Council's authority should be invoked to press Iran to give the agency's inspectors the information and access they need to clear up quickly the many remaining uncertainties about what Iran has been doing and why.

Iran has been asked to do this repeatedly. Yet, two and a half years after its noncompliance was discovered, Iran is still holding back both information and full cooperation. Iran has not provided the requested evidence on why its leadership decided in 1985, in the middle of the war against Iraq, to pursue a uranium enrichment program when there was no short or medium-term need to fuel any electrical nuclear power plant. Inspectors are still unable to specify the origin of all enriched uranium particles found in Iran. And they cannot assure the truth of Iran's claims that after receiving more advanced centrifuge designs in 1995, it did nothing with them until 2002. Nor can inspectors rule out the possible involvement of Iran's military in nuclear-related activities.

It is time for the International Atomic Energy Agency to get the authority it needs from the Security Council to complete the verification that Iran's nuclear program is and has been, as claimed, exclusively for peaceful purposes. This is in everyone's interest, including Iran's, unless it still has something to hide. The Iranian people deserve better than a confrontation with the world.

North Korea Talks Resume At Logjam (WSJ)

By gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

BEIJING -- Talks aimed at persuading North Korea to give up its nuclear ambitions resumed with no public sign of progress toward a compromise between Washington and Pyongyang on a central issue: whether the North should be allowed to develop atomic energy.

North Korea's chief delegate to the talks, Kim Kye Gwan, insisted that his country won't give up its right to nuclear power, despite American demands that Pyongyang dismantle all of its atomic programs, military and civilian.

"We have this right, and the more important thing is that we should use this right," Mr. Kim said before flying to Beijing, according to China's Xinhua news agency. "We utterly cannot accept" any U.S.-imposed limits on civilian nuclear programs, he said.

Differences over the North's exercise of atomic-energy rights came into sharp focus during two weeks of negotiations that broke off in August. Other issues also remain, including a U.S. demand that North Korea pledge not to export weapons of mass destruction.

"Nothing is agreed unless everything is agreed," said the top U.S. envoy to the talks, Christopher Hill. "The fundamental question is whether [North Korea] is ready to abandon its nuclear programs."

If the talks again fail to reach an agreement, it could seriously erode support for continued negotiations. But it isn't clear that the administration of President Bush, focused on hurricane relief as well as Iraq and Iran, is prepared to quickly take other steps, such as seeking United Nations Security Council action.

Mr. Hill said it would become clear within "days, not weeks," whether an agreement could be struck laying down guidelines for an eventual resolution of the nuclear standoff. A senior South Korean diplomat concurred, saying: "Having longer meetings may not help if no one changes positions."

During the talks that ended in August, Pyongyang not only asserted its right to nuclear power but demanded that the U.S. and others provide it with reactors to generate electricity as part of any deal to abandon its atomic-weapons programs. In recent weeks, the North has reaffirmed its stance.

Washington, which says North Korea can't be trusted not to turn peaceful nuclear activities to military uses, opposes Pyongyang's demand for reactors. The demand appears to have little support among other participants at the talks. The other countries involved in the negotiations -- China, Japan, Russia and South Korea -- however, have expressed sympathy for the North's position that it must be able to retain its right to develop atomic energy.

A U.S.-led consortium started construction on two so-called light-water reactors for the North as part of a 1994 disarmament deal. That project was put on hold after the U.S. said it had evidence North Korea violated that agreement by starting a covert effort to develop nuclear weapons using uranium. U.S. officials have said the project won't be revived.

Six-Nation N. Korea Nuke Talks Resume (AJC/AP)

By Burt Herman, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

BEIJING — North Korea insisted Tuesday it will not give up its right to civilian nuclear programs, raising questions about the possibility of a breakthrough as six-nation talks aimed at persuading Pyongyang to abandon its atomic weapons resumed after a five-week recess.

Envoys from China, Japan, Russia, the United States and the two Koreas clasped hands together at a state guesthouse in Beijing before continuing the fourth round of talks since 2003 that have so far failed to resolve the standoff.

In New York on Tuesday, Chinese President Hu Jintao told President Bush that China was ready to "step up" pressure on Pyongyang for progress in the negotiations.

"We stand ready to step up our communication and cooperation" to gain fresh progress in negotiations aimed at halting North Korea's nuclear program, he said.

Mike Green, the National Security Council's senior director for Asia, said the Bush administration rejects the notion of North Korea retaining a civilian nuclear program. "North Korea needs to get out, completely out, of the nuclear business," Green said.

Last month, negotiators took a break after a record 13 days of meetings ended without agreement. The main U.S. negotiator said it would likely be shorter than last time.

"We should be able to wrap this up in a matter of days, not weeks," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Tuesday evening.

DOJ_NMG_0005154

South Korea's head negotiator Song Min-soon agreed, saying talks would continue until Friday at least and then all parties would consult on a possible closing date, according to official Xinhua News Agency.

The issue of the North's peaceful nuclear program will be raised at the talks but Hill emphasized the focus is on ridding the North of atomic weapons.

"The fundamental question is whether (North Korea) is prepared to abandon its nuclear programs," he said, noting those programs are involved in production of materials for nuclear weapons.

Hill saw the North Korean delegation briefly Tuesday and said he planned a full one-on-one session with them Wednesday where their views would be made known.

Contacts between U.S. and North Korean diplomats in New York in the past month failed to make any progress, Hill said earlier. But he said "their position does seem to be evolving a little," without elaborating.

Chief North Korean negotiator Kim Kye Gwan said before he left for Beijing that his country will not tolerate any obstruction to its right to a peaceful nuclear program, China's official Xinhua News Agency reported.

"This right is neither awarded nor needs to be approved by others," Kim said in Pyongyang, adding that the country would "utterly not accept" if Washington tries to block that right.

Still, Kim said the North would attend the talks with a sincere and flexible attitude, according to Xinhua.

The Chinese hosts also acknowledged the impasse over the North's demand to keep its civilian nuclear program.

"There is a major difference between the parties, that is the DPRK's (North Korea's) peaceful use of nuclear energy," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said.

The South Korea negotiator urged envoys to be open-minded at the talks.

"If each party can be a little more flexible in its position, there will be good results, but if they stick to their current position, good results will be hard to expect," Song said as he arrived in Beijing.

The two Koreas also began high-level talks Tuesday in Pyongyang separate from the nuclear forum, where the South proposed discussions on how to ease military tension and bring permanent peace to the divided peninsula. The Korean War ended in a 1953 cease-fire, leaving the two countries still at war. But reconciliation efforts have flourished since the first-and-only summit of their leaders in 2000.

The latest nuclear standoff was sparked in late 2002 after U.S. officials accused North Korea of running a secret uranium enrichment program in violation of an earlier deal, in which the North had agreed to stop weapons development in exchange for energy aid and other incentives.

The North has since denied having a uranium enrichment program, which would provide a way to create radioactive material for bombs other than its publicly acknowledged plutonium program.

On Tuesday, the North again called the uranium allegations "a sheer fabrication" in a commentary by the North's main Rodong Sinmun newspaper carried by the country's official Korean Central News Agency.

Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf told The New York Times in an interview released late Monday that he believed North Korea had obtained "probably a dozen" centrifuges — equipment needed to enrich uranium — from a network headed by the father of Pakistan's nuclear weapons program.

N. Korea Insists On Nuclear Energy As Talks Resume (WP)

By Edward Cody

BEIJING, Sept. 13 -- Standing firm on a key disagreement, North Korea declared Tuesday it would not relinquish peaceful nuclear energy as diplomats from six nations opened another round of stalemated negotiations on its nuclear weapons program.

"The DPRK has the right to peaceful nuclear activity," said the chief North Korean negotiator, Vice Foreign Minister Kim Gye Gwan, using the initials for his country's formal name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. "This right is neither awarded nor needs to be approved by others."

Kim's declaration, made to the official New China News Agency as he flew to Beijing, suggested continued difficulties in the talks despite renewed pledges from all participants to show flexibility and goodwill. The talks among China, North and South

Korea, Japan, Russia and the United States are aimed at the stated goal of achieving a nuclear-free Korean Peninsula. The issue of peaceful nuclear energy was a major reason the last round was suspended Aug. 7, after 13 days of intense bargaining.

The recess was supposed to be a time of reconsideration in the six nations' capitals, particularly in Pyongyang, U.S. officials said. But Kim's statement indicated that, from North Korea's point of view, the dispute over the production of nuclear energy for electricity remains unchanged.

"If the United States tries to lay down obstacles to the DPRK's using this right, we utterly cannot accept that," the North Korean envoy stated.

President Bush, speaking to reporters in Washington about Iran, which has also declared its intent to generate nuclear power, said, "It's a right of a government to want to have a civilian nuclear program," adding that "there ought to be guidelines" for such programs.

But the Bush administration remains adamant that North Korea must abandon its nuclear weapons programs and forgo nuclear energy production. The reason, the chief U.S. negotiator said in a briefing Friday in Washington, is that North Korea in the 1990s transformed a research reactor at Yongbyon into a source of weapons-grade plutonium.

"What North Korea needs to do is get out of the nuclear business," the U.S. negotiator, Christopher Hill, said. They have "had trouble keeping peaceful programs peaceful."

The chief Japanese negotiator, Kenichiro Sasae, said North Korea's position on peaceful nuclear energy would be key to determining whether the six-party talks could move forward.

Despite Kim's apparently clear-cut declaration, Hill expressed hope that North Korea may have found a way to alter its position on that and other points since August. "We know precisely what the issues are," he told reporters here Tuesday. "I hope the DPRK delegation has also done its homework."

Chinese diplomats met with Hill and other delegations Tuesday, beginning open-ended discussions on a Chinese-drafted proposal for "agreed principles" to govern North Korea's nuclear disarmament. China has sponsored the six-party talks since they began in August 2003. The search for broad principles was launched at the last round of talks as a way to find a lowest common denominator of agreement, on which more specific accords could then be built. The idea, Hill explained, was to avoid the swift deadlock that had developed in three previous rounds by first finding agreement on broader goals.

But the fourth round bogged down in fundamental discord over peaceful nuclear energy, the timing of recognition and aid that North Korea would receive in return for giving up nuclear weapons and North Korea's desire to address the nuclear protection it says is implicit in the U.S.-South Korean alliance.

Nuclear Talks Restart On Pessimistic Note (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

SEOUL -- Six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons ambitions resumed in Beijing yesterday with Washington and Pyongyang publicly restating opposing positions that had forced a five-week recess.

Separately, South Korean Unification Minister Chung Dong-young arrived in North Korea yesterday for four days of Cabinet-level discussions.

Mr. Chung told reporters in Seoul that he was carrying a confidential message for the North's leadership from Washington.

The nuclear talks -- which were suspended Aug. 7 after 13 days of negotiations ended in stalemate -- resumed on a sour note after the North's chief negotiator, Kim Gye-gwan, told Xinhua News Agency that Pyongyang "has a right to peaceful nuclear activity."

Washington's chief negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, branded Mr. Kim's position "wrong" in comments to reporters in Beijing.

Pyongyang's demand to have a peaceful nuclear energy program has become a major sticking point.

"What the North needs to do is get out of the nuclear business," Mr. Hill said before arriving in Beijing.

North Korea has reiterated that it will not dismantle its atomic program "without getting any proposal compensating for the loss of nuclear energy."

The South has offered to meet the North's power needs from its own grid, but North Korea has not officially responded to the offer.

The U.S. position is complicated by Chinese and South Korean support for civil atomic energy use by North Korea on the condition that it abandon nuclear weapons.

China and South Korea are North Korea's No. 1 and No. 2 trade partners, respectively. They would be expected to resist U.S. efforts to impose sanctions should the talks collapse.

Another point of friction is Pyongyang's human rights abuses, with North Korea criticizing the recent appointment of a U.S. special envoy on the issue.

North Korea also has demanded the removal of U.S. nuclear weapons from South Korea -- weapons Washington insists do not exist -- and repeatedly has demanded an end to what it calls hostile American policy.

There is no deadline to complete the current round of talks. The best that delegates can hope for from the negotiations is a joint agreement on principles for the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula. The meeting yesterday focused on procedural issues.

Analysts saw few grounds for optimism.

"I think we are closer to breakdown than breakthrough," said Peter Beck, the Seoul-based northeast Asia project director of the International Crisis Group.

"The North has been harsh in its public statements, and the U.S. is not going to bend on the peaceful use of nuclear energy."

The talks involve the United States, the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia.

N. Korea, Iran Say They Will Continue Nuclear Efforts (CSM)

By Tom Regan

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2005

In an announcement likely to set up a collision with the United States, North Korea announced Monday that it will continue to demand the right to "peaceful" use of atomic energy. CNN reports that the six-nation talks – which also include China, Japan, Russia, and South Korea – resumed Tuesday in Beijing. AFXNews reports that the North Korea statement is the same demand that broke up the talks five weeks ago. (North Korea) has a right on peaceful nuclear activity. This right is neither awarded nor needs to be approved by others,' the country's chief envoy to the talks, Kim Gye-gwan, told the official Xinhua news agency at Pyongyang airport.

'We have this right, and the more important thing is that we should use this right. If the United States tries to set obstacles to the DPRK's (North Korea) using this right, we can utterly not accept that.'

Bloomberg News reports that the US rejected North Korea's stance. US chief negotiator Christopher Hill said Monday in Beijing that North Korea's position "does seem to be wrong." Still, US negotiators said they will renew efforts to convince North Korea to give up its civilian reactors at the talks. 'I hope the Democratic People's Republic of Korea delegation has done some homework,' Hill said. 'We had more than four weeks to look at the text of the proposed agreement.'

The talks will last 'as long as necessary and will not have a deadline,' China's Foreign Ministry said in a statement. Meanwhile, Reuters reports that Iran is "working hard to gather allies" to defeat a US-European attempt to "refer Tehran to the UN Security Council because of their fears it may be developing nuclear weapons." EU diplomats said Iran was focusing its lobbying efforts on key International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) board members such as China, Russia, India, Pakistan, South Africa and other non-aligned developing states, which have a good deal of sympathy for Tehran's arguments. In the past two weeks, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, visited Pakistan and India. While successfully negotiating a deal to allow Iranian natural gas to pass through Pakistan to India, Xinhua reports he also persuaded both countries to publicly support Tehran's position for "a peaceful resolution of Iran's nuclear issue and Iran's right to the peaceful use of nuclear energy in accordance with related international conventions."

Iran is continuing its diplomatic offensive this week. Mikhail Zygar and Dmitry Sidorov write in a column for MosNews that Iranian Vice-President Gholamreza Aghazadeh is in Moscow to discuss next week's IAEA meeting, where Iran's nuclear program will be the main topic. Russia has indicated that it will support Iran, and fight to keep it from being referred to the UN Security Council, where it would probably face sanctions. Mr. Zygar and Mr. Sidorov say this is "an extremely important victory for the Iranians," and a move likely to "cause the Kremlin a lot of problems." Russian authorities are relying on the fact that the world community will not want to punish Iran too severely and that the Europeans will not vote to transfer the dossier to the UN Security Council. Ariel Cohen, an expert with the Heritage Foundation, who participated in a meeting with Putin, Ivanov and Lavrov in Moscow, told [MosNews] that 'on the Iran subject they were telling mutually exclusive things: from one side — the Russian position is close to the Europeans', but from the other side — the Kremlin is against passing the dossier to the UN Security Council.'

According to Cohen's opinion, 'Russia does not want to spoil its relationship with Iran, because it sees Tehran as a member of a multi-polar coalition, which also includes China, and plays a role of the counter-balance for the US.' Russia has been a nuclear partner with Iran for some years. Russian engineers are currently building a nuclear plant at Bushehr, in southern Iran.

The US, however, is not taking the Iranian initiative lightly. The New York Times reported last Friday that both President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will speak with the leaders of these countries during this week's UN summit in New York in an effort to change their minds on the issue. But experts say their task will not be an easy one. Lacking a consensus, the United States and its European allies have shifted strategy and are now trying to get the matter referred to the Security Council by a simple majority of the agency's board, a step that officials in Vienna say is without precedent. North Korea was referred to the United Nations, for example, by consensus.

By Guy de Jonquières and Anna Fifield

Financial Times, September 14, 2005

US and South Korean officials are holding preparatory talks on a bilateral trade agreement, potentially paving the way for President George W. Bush to launch formal negotiations when he visits the country in November.

A deal with Asia's third biggest economy would give the US an important economic bridgehead into the region at a time of growing concern in Washington that the recent wave of regional trade initiatives in Asia could jeopardise US commercial interests there.

An agreement could pose a dilemma for the European Union, whose 25 members have been discussing for a year whether to seek a trade deal with Seoul. Brussels fears that if Washington forged an agreement first, it could guarantee US companies preferential access to South Korea's market for exports such as commercial aircraft and financial services. Rob Portman, the US trade representative, and Kim Hyun-chong, South Korea's trade minister, are understood already to have discussed the proposed deal at several meetings.

"We are working on it," a South Korean official said. "Whether this will actually materialise by the time Bush gets here is still uncertain."

US trade officials said no decision had yet been taken to launch negotiations with South Korea.

The preliminary discussions between Washington and Seoul are intended to iron out some of their differences on trade to simplify the eventual negotiations process and improve chances of agreement, according to people familiar with the talks.

South Korea is the seventh largest US trade partner, and the countries' bilateral trade exceeded $70bn last year.

Obstacles to a deal include South Korea's cinema quotas which stipulate that 40 per cent of films shown in cinemas are domestic and Korean restrictions on US beef, imposed after the mad cow scare. Korean officials hope the beef curbs can be removed later this year.

Washington also argues that Korea's pharmaceuticals pricing policy does not provide enough rewards for research-intensive drugs and its system of basing car taxes on engine capacity puts US carmakers at a disadvantage.

South Korea hopes a deal would cut industrial tariffs on many of its exports and lead Washington to exercise greater restraint over antidumping actions, of which Korean products have frequently been targets. A deal could also make it easier to resolve bilateral trade problems, such as a recent dispute over subsidies to Hynix, the Korean chipmaker.

Singapore and Vietnam are the only east Asian countries with which the US has so far concluded trade agreements. Mr Bush will visit the South Korean port city of Busan in November for the annual summit of the Asia Pacific Economic Co-operation forum.

U.N. Adopts Modest Goals On Reforms And Poverty (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 13 - The General Assembly unanimously approved a scaled-down statement of goals on Tuesday that Secretary General Kofi Annan said would still give world leaders gathering Wednesday a basis for recommendations to reform the organization and combat poverty.

Loud cheers from the delegates, however, could not disguise widespread disappointment at the weakening of the 35-page document.

When Mr. Annan first proposed the statement, it represented an ambitious blueprint for trying to balance the concerns of great powers over security, human rights and management efficiency with the developing world's needs for increased assistance and measures to cut poverty. In the end, virtually every section underwent severe cutbacks.

"Obviously, we didn't get everything we wanted," Mr. Annan said. "With 191 member states, it's not easy to get an agreement. But we can build on it." He noted that it represented progress in setting up a human rights council to replace the discredited Human Rights Commission and a new peace-building commission. He also singled out language on how to fight terrorism and establish means for international intervention when countries failed to protect their citizens from genocide.

He complained pointedly, however, about the elimination in the final version of language covering nuclear nonproliferation and disarmament, labeling the exclusion a "disgrace" at a time when the world feared a spread of unconventional weapons.

John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, said the United States was satisfied with the outcome, which he said matched the limited hopes he had had for the document.

"It would be wrong to claim more than is realistic and accurate about what these reforms are," he said. "They represent steps forward, but this is not the alpha and omega, and we never thought it would be."

The General Assembly vote ended three weeks of tense talks at which regional rivalries and national ambitions succeeded in scuttling attempts by a majority of nations to act in the broader United Nations interest. The continuing debate exposed in high profile the kind of indecisiveness that the document was supposed to address.

"There were governments that were not willing to make the concessions necessary," Mr. Annan said. "There were spoilers also in the group, let's be quite honest about that."

In his discussions with member states, he said, "I've tried to get them to understand that in our interconnected world, we need to look at issues in much broader terms rather than narrow national interests."

In answer to a question, he said he wished voting procedures could be changed so that a small minority of nations could not block the will of a large majority, as has occurred during recent weeks.

Mr. Bolton, a vocal critic of the organization's practices, seized on the events to say: "This is the way the U.N. operates. And it goes to the question, which is a much longer term question, as to whether the culture of decision-making at the U.N. is the most effective for the organization, and that's something that's not going to be resolved today or tomorrow."

The three-day meeting is expected to attract more than 170 presidents and prime ministers. The document they will be asked to approve does create a human rights council, but it leaves out any mention of its size and duties and drops language proposing that membership be subject to a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly. That was meant to insure that notorious rights offenders would not become members. While it condemns terrorism "in all forms," language saying that making targets of civilians is unjustified was deleted in exchange for dropping language exempting movements to resist occupation.

Management reform does not include strengthening the Secretary General's office, which is considered essential if the office is to have the flexibility to act decisively. In this case, a small group of developing countries blocked action out of fear of seeing power taken away from the General Assembly, where their voices are heard but where real decision-taking is discouraged.

U.N. Reform Bid Exposes Its Woes (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. World Summit on poverty and reform that opens today was supposed to be a watershed moment that breathed new life into the troubled world body and shored up its beleaguered leader, Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

But as diplomats approved the summit's centerpiece document Tuesday after weeks of bitter negotiations that eviscerated many of Annan's boldest reform proposals, many delegates expressed dismay that the meeting was highlighting the U.N.'s core problems rather than solving them.

Though U.N. officials tried to put the best face on the watered-down package of goals and structural changes concerning issues including human rights and terrorism, even Annan called the deletion of a section on nuclear disarmament "a disgrace" and an example of how the United Nations had failed.

How Annan's ambitious plan nearly collapsed and why says much about the way the U.N. works, and doesn't.

The secretary-general is treated more like an employee of the member nations than their leader, which made it difficult for him to guide the process. A culture of consensus allowed a handful of nations with entrenched interests to shape the outcome.

Though the final product retained little of the sweep and aspirations embodied in his original proposal, Annan framed it as a solid beginning for long-term reform.

"It would be wrong to describe this process as a failure. It is in the nature of the organization — when you have 191 member states you do not always get what you want," he said. "But the process is not over. As I said some years ago, reform is a process, not an event."

Annan began the reform process in earnest two years ago, seeking to restore the U.N.'s credibility after the U.S. and Britain invaded Iraq without the world body's blessing. He told the General Assembly that the U.N. had come to "a fork in the road" and must reinvent itself or fade into irrelevance.

In 2004, after a yearlong study, a panel of international experts recommended radical changes to help the organization better meet the challenges of the 21st century, including preemptive war, nuclear proliferation, terrorism, poverty and disease.

In March, Annan built on the panel's report to propose an ambitious plan that said the U.N. was built on four pillars — peace, security, development and human rights — and that the world was safer if countries acted together. Recognizing that nations would act first to protect their own interests, Annan urged them to not cherry-pick the package, but consider it as a whole and give something to gain something.

But in the following months, talks were distracted by the most contentious issue, Security Council expansion, and stalled by a few nations that believed they were better served by no change than the sweeping reforms Annan proposed. Meanwhile, Annan's ability to push the reforms behind the scenes was undermined by the revelations of corruption and abuse in the U.N.-run oil-for-food program for Iraq.

"Kofi was doing it out of the noblest of motives, but didn't have the moral authority to carry it out," said Stephen Schlesinger, author of "Acts of Creation," about the 1945 founding of the United Nations. "He needed to do the political groundwork first, but he just threw the reforms out there, thinking the moral imperative would be enough."

Parochial interests quickly surfaced. Nations including Pakistan and China objected to Security Council expansion because their regional rivals, India and Japan, respectively, aspired to new permanent seats as part of it.

Egypt wanted the struggle against foreign occupation to be excluded from any definition of terrorism. Cuba and others dug in their heels over the creation of a human rights body that would make it tougher for accused violators to be on the panel.

The U.S. said it would rather delete sections related to its key priorities — disarmament, a new human rights body, management reform and financing of development — than to sign on to something "half-baked."

As a result, diplomats had still not agreed on a reform document the day before world leaders began to arrive to endorse it. In the middle of the night, U.N. experts unilaterally created a new document they hoped everyone could agree on and later Tuesday told negotiators to take it or leave it. They accepted it.

Cuban Ambassador Orlando Gual said it took a last-ditch, undemocratic, nontransparent act to bolster the U.N.'s aspirations toward democracy, transparency and efficiency. "It's a Frankenstein," he said. "That's the best we could do?"

Nevertheless, diplomats pointed to a few achievements. For the first time, U.N. members formally embraced the notion that the international community has a responsibility to intervene to protect populations from genocide or war crimes when a national government is unwilling to do so, a proposal known as the "Responsibility to Protect." When Annan first proposed it in 1999, it provoked intense opposition by nations that said it would violate their sovereignty.

The document also creates a Peacebuilding Commission to help nations recovering from conflict, and establishes a new Human Rights Council to replace the current, discredited body. The U.N. Secretariat pried a bit of power away from the General Assembly to make decisions on hiring, budget and oversight, a partial win for the U.S.

But there were many more disappointments than successes, diplomats said. Developing nations wanted stronger commitments to break down trade barriers and to oblige wealthy nations to pledge more money for foreign aid. The U.S. was unhappy to not win clear criteria for the new human rights council, or a clear definition of terrorism.

But Annan said the most significant gap in the document was the absence of any mention of nuclear disarmament and nonproliferation, an omission made at Washington's insistence.

"This is a real disgrace," Annan said. "We have failed twice this year: We failed at the NPT [Nonproliferation Treaty Conference], and we failed now…. So I will appeal to the leaders who are coming here in the next few days to really step up to the plate and accept the challenge and show leadership on this issue."

Annan also said that the U.N.'s culture of consensus caused the most problems, allowing "spoilers" with special interests to hold the whole process hostage.

He suggested that the General Assembly should make more decisions by vote.

"There is unwillingness to do that," Annan said, "and as long as you do not want to do that, you are either going to be negotiated down to the lowest common denominator or you don't get a decision at all."

U.N. Scales Back Plan Of Action (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Glenn Kessler

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 13 -- The U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday adopted a declaration on the need to combat world poverty, promote human rights and strengthen management of the organization, but only after negotiators scaled back the document because of intractable disagreements among nations on sensitive issues.

The 35-page declaration will be endorsed by an estimated 170 world leaders at a three-day summit on U.N. reform that is to begin Wednesday, and delegates expressed disappointment that it had fallen short of Secretary General Kofi Annan's aspirations for a broad reorganization of the 60-year-old organization.

Still, they voiced relief that the entire process had not collapsed, which would have left the summit with no tangible result, and they highlighted relatively modest achievements in the document. Those included provisions that call for an increase in foreign aid, condemn terrorism and underscore the obligation of states to halt genocide and ethnic cleansing. Only Cuba and Venezuela voiced reservations about Tuesday's agreement.

The negotiators were forced to put off action on some of the thorniest and most ambitious goals, including proposals to expand the U.N. Security Council, to create an independent auditing board to scrutinize U.N. spending, and to impose basic membership standards for a new Human Rights Council so that chronic rights abusers will not be able to join.

Various proposals for expanding membership in the Security Council, for example, had been opposed by countries that felt they would lose out in the deal. And some developing countries fought proposals for changes in U.N. management practices, which they felt would shift authority from the General Assembly to the secretary general's office.

Negotiators also failed to agree on provisions calling on governments to halt the transfer of weapons of mass destruction to terrorists and urging nuclear weapons states to abide by their commitments to dismantle their atomic arms.

Annan said that the members' inability to adopt these measures on disarmament and nonproliferation constituted "a real disgrace" and that he hoped world leaders would see this as "a real signal to pick up the ashes and show leadership."

"There were governments that were not willing to make the concessions necessary," Annan told reporters after the declaration was adopted by the General Assembly. "There were spoilers, let's be quite honest about that."

Still, Annan said he was pleased that the declaration reiterated the U.N. commitment to meet targets for slashing rates of poverty, disease and child mortality and that it called for creation of the new human rights council and a peace-building commission to oversee postwar recoveries. "I would have wanted more, all of us would have wanted more, but it's an important step forward," he said. "I think we can work with what we've been given."

The negotiations provided the first test of American diplomacy at the United Nations since President Bush bypassed congressional confirmation to install John R. Bolton as U.S. ambassador for 17 months.

Bolton on Tuesday demonstrated sufficient flexibility to reach agreements on some issues, while fending off provisions that might have restricted U.S. prerogatives and the freedom to use force unilaterally. Bolton, who led efforts to block the disarmament provision, succeeded in eliminating language that would have urged countries to support a host of international treaties or organizations, including the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and the International Criminal Court, which the United States opposes.

But Bolton failed to secure support for a number of key U.S. priorities, including the provision urging states to halt the transfer of the world's deadliest weapons to terrorists and measures intended to expand Annan's authority over hiring and to strengthen the oversight of U.N. finances.

Bolton said that while he would have preferred stronger provisions to ensure greater accountability in the U.N. bureaucracy, Tuesday's agreement would lead to a "somewhat improved U.N."

"But it would be wrong to claim more than is realistic and accurate about what these reforms are," he said. "They represent steps forward, but this is not the alpha and the omega, and we never thought it would be."

"This is not the end of the reform effort," added Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns. "It really is the beginning of a permanent reform effort that must be underway at the United Nations."

Despite setbacks, Burns said that Tuesday's agreement would eliminate the discredited U.N. Human Rights Commission, which includes Zimbabwe, Sudan and other human rights violators. But he acknowledged that "it is going to be a difficult exercise" to win the votes in the General Assembly to create a human rights council that reflects the wishes of the United States.

Burns said that although the United States and other governments had failed to include a clear condemnation of the deliberate targeting and killing of civilians, they had succeeded in extracting an Arab-backed provision that would have excluded so-called national liberation movements that target civilians from being labeled terrorists.

"We have broken the back of this ideological debate here about what constitutes terrorism," Burns said, noting that "sometimes in diplomacy defeating negative measures is very important." U.N. delegates, however, said Arab governments would insist on protections for armed groups fighting foreign occupation in an international convention on terrorism that is being negotiated by U.N. members.

Human rights and development advocates said the membership had squandered a rare opportunity to improve the organization, but praised the negotiators for endorsing the creation of an international obligation to halt attempted genocide.

"There is very little to celebrate," said Nicola Reindorp of Oxfam International. But governments "are showing that they can act boldly, by endorsing their responsibility to protect civilians from genocide, ethnic cleansing, war crimes and crimes against humanity."

General Assembly OKs Compromise Document (AJC/AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday adopted a watered-down document on poverty, human rights, terrorism and reform for world leaders to approve at a U.N. summit, shedding many of Secretary-General Kofi Annan's most ambitious goals after weeks of bitter debate.

The compromise 35-page document is supposed to launch a major reform of the United Nations itself and galvanize efforts to ease global poverty. But to reach a consensus, most of the text's details were gutted in favor of abstract language.

A definition of terrorism and details on how to replace the discredited U.N. Commission on Human Rights will not be included. U.S.-led efforts to overhaul U.N. management have been diluted, while nuclear nonproliferation isn't mentioned at all.

"Obviously we didn't get everything we wanted and with 191 member states it's not easy to get an agreement," Annan said. "All of us would have wanted more but we can work with what we have been given, and it's a step forward."

Diplomats called the document a breakthrough after so much debate. Several were pleased with the creation of a peacebuilding commission and a long section on development. That includes a mention of the desire by "many developed countries" to spend 0.7 percent of their gross national product on development.

"Don't expect Rome to be built in a day, it wasn't," Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones-Parry said. "Against the difficulty of this negotiation, it's complexity, this is a very substantial gain."

The compromise document came after weeks of debate stretched into several days of marathon negotiation. Some diplomats had feared that negotiations would continue into the summit of world leaders that begins on Wednesday.

The outgoing president of the General Assembly, Gabon's Jean Ping, presented the compromise Tuesday afternoon in hopes of bridging the deepest divides and moving away from bitter line-by-line negotiations that had bogged down the debate.

"It would be wrong to claim more than is realistic and accurate about what these reforms are," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said. "They represent steps forward, but this is not the alpha and the omega, and we never thought it would be."

Though Annan said he was pleased, the document was a significant step backward for him. In March, when he had unveiled his proposals, Annan had urged world leaders to expand the size of the Security Council, come up with a definition of terrorism and accept that they have a "responsibility to protect" those being killed, which requires collective action.

And last week, a committee investigating the scandal-tainted U.N. oil-for-food program had called for wide-ranging management reforms. The committee, led by former U.S. Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, said that the United Nations would need a complete overhaul to tackle programs like oil-for-food in the future.

But efforts to expand the council were abandoned because of longtime national differences. "Responsibility to protect" was whittled down to nations' obligations to protect their own citizens. The document says nations should "make all efforts" toward a convention against terrorism but doesn't try to define it.

Diplomats said it had become clear during the negotiations that they had tried to tackle too much at once, and had to lower their expectations from the document.

"I think we tried to have a full plate and we were unable to eat so much in a single gulp," Costa Rica's U.N. Ambassador Bruno Stagno said earlier Tuesday.

The failure of world leaders to adopt an ambitious plan for development and reform disappointed some non-governmental organizations.

They fear that leaving the tough decisions to the 191-member General Assembly, where even seemingly innocuous initiatives can stall for years, is the quickest way to sink Annan's agenda.

"If world leaders do nothing more than adopt a broad, vague text that defers all substantive decisions to the General Assembly, they will have squandered a historic opportunity," Yvonne Terlingen, Amnesty International's U.N. representative, said in a statement.

Several nations were angry with the way the document was pushed through the General Assembly before it was translated from English into the five other official U.N. languages, a violation of U.N. protocol. That gave ambassadors little time to review it.

"This process is a clear violation of the most basic elements governing democratic processes," Venezuela's Foreign Minister Ali Rodriguez said from the floor after the vote.

The debate over the summit has led some to question if the United Nations can be reformed at all, especially when such decisions have to be accepted by all member states .

Security Council reform, for example, has bedeviled the United Nations for more than a decade. Each time the issue surfaces, diplomats say they believe the will is there for change, and each time they fail.

"I'm very pragmatic in relation to the United Nations," Australia's Prime Minister John Howard said Tuesday. "One cannot ignore the fact that we still live in a world of nation states."

Negotiators Seek Deal On Reforming U.N. (KCS)

By Edith M. Lederer

The Kansas City Star, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS - With the U.N. summit a day away, negotiators tried to agree Tuesday on a watered-down plan for reforming the United Nations, having abandoned many of the sweeping changes recommended by Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

More than 160 presidents, prime ministers, kings and their entourages are descending on New York for Wednesday's summit opening. But it appeared less likely that the 191 U.N. member states would reach consensus on a document enabling the world body to tackle the major global issues of the 21st century.

Annan's chief of staff, Mark Malloch Brown, said negotiations seemed more favorable than a few days ago because "deadlines are starting to loosen minds and positions."

"There's a threshold where we always knew we wouldn't get the full loaf," Malloch Brown said. "We've got to start counting slices. Half or more will do at this stage."

Many countries blame the United States for proposing hundreds of amendments just a few weeks ago to a document they believed was nearing agreement. The major organizations of developing countries, including the Group of 77 and the Nonaligned Movement, then responded with dozens of their own.

Russia and other countries also offered many amendments.

The United States also has pushed for strong language on its top priorities of management reform and a new Human Rights Council with greater authority.

Germany's U.N. Ambassador Gunter Pleuger said Monday that achieving "great reform" was not possible at this late date with major divisions remaining. Instead, he expects either "a watered-down" or shorter text.

A meeting of the 32 countries in a "core" group trying to negotiate the final text was delayed Tuesday morning.

Incoming General Assembly President Jan Eliasson, who is scheduled to be installed Tuesday, said he did not know what the finished product would be yet, "but I hope it will contain the substance we all want it to have."

The seven issues that negotiators have been focusing on are terrorism; a Human Rights Council with more authority to replace the discredited Human Rights Commission; a new Peacebuilding Commission to help nations emerging from conflict; new responsibility for governments to protect civilians at risk from genocide and war crimes; disarmament and nonproliferation; overhauling U.N. management; and steps to promote development.

Akram said a group of about 15 countries had agreed to language on terrorism, the Peacebuilding Commission and on human rights, though some other countries were trying to reopen that issue.

Negotiators also were close to agreeing on the responsibility to protect civilians, but differences remained on management reforms, trade and climate change, he said.

Pakistan's U.N. Ambassador Munir Akram said he expected a "core" group to decide Tuesday whether the entire text was balanced enough for consideration by all members.

Many of the agreements in the text, however, were reached by leaving the most contentious issues for further negotiations - primarily in the General Assembly.

For example, the United States and many European countries want the Human Rights Council to become a permanent body, with a country's membership requiring approval by two-thirds of U.N. nations. Richard Grenell, spokesman for the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, said Egypt and China opposed that Monday, and other diplomats said Russia did as well.

Egyptian Ambassador Maged Abdelaziz said his country favored a rights council that would be a subsidiary of the General Assembly, which should decide on the criteria for membership.

"Let us give it a chance to function, and then we will review it," he said.

Last year, Annan urged world leaders to take bold action to promote development and reform the United Nations so it can tackle global challenges ranging from conflicts and terrorism to poverty and human rights abuses.

"We have reached a fork in the road," Annan warned member states. "If you, the political leaders of the world's nations, cannot reach agreement on the way forward, history will take the decisions for you, and the interests of your peoples may go by default."

Pleuger said that in hindsight, member states underestimated the amount of preparatory work needed to reach consensus.

U.N. OKs Pared-down Declaration (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

NEW YORK -- The U.N. World Summit opens today with a hard-fought but watered-down declaration that fails to include many reforms sought by the United States, including a replacement for the discredited Human Rights Commission.

"It would be wrong to claim more than is realistic and accurate about what these reforms are," U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton said of the 35-page declaration that is to be endorsed by 150 world leaders at the conclusion of the three-day event

"They represent steps forward, but this is not the alpha and the omega, and we never thought it would be," Mr. Bolton told reporters several hours before the final document was completed.

The document calls for the creation of a peacebuilding commission and a democracy fund, financed by voluntary contributions, to help conflict-riven countries make the transition to stability and good governance.

The text also commits nations to provide free primary education to all children, including girls, and for their leaders to take responsibility for their nations' development by pursuing sound economic policies.

Mr. Bolton, who has worked on little else since arriving here in early August, acknowledged, "I would have liked to have seen a broader discussion much earlier about fundamental changes in management and governance."

Some nations and private organizations were bitterly disappointed with the outcome, saying that it fell far short of ideals on human rights, nuclear weapons, women's rights and other issues.

Development specialists praised the outcome of the final declaration, noting that the passages were mostly strong and encouraging.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan had sought a declaration that would show that development and security are two sides of the same coin.

"The big item missing is nonproliferation and disarmament. This a real disgrace," Mr. Annan told a press conference, urging the leaders to take up the issue this week.

While acknowledging its shortcomings, he insisted the document was "an important step forward." The final document went through a tortuous negotiation process.

That opened the process to line-by-line discussion, in which governments were free to advocate for their pet issues.

For nearly two weeks, the document grew longer instead of shorter, as more provisions were added and then countered.

With the process deadlocked at 1 a.m. yesterday, outgoing General Assembly President Jean Ping made a number of executive decisions on the text, including tossing out all language related to nuclear disarmament and nonproliferation.

When delegations yesterday evening formally closed the 59th session of the General Assembly one day late, they gave Mr. Ping an almost unheard-of standing ovation for his work.

Jan Eliasson, Sweden's former ambassador to Washington and the president of the General Assembly for the upcoming year, praised the declaration and said it should be assessed compared with historic reform measures, not to recent reform proposals.

"We will get a new political energy from the leaders gathering here," he said.

Discussions to strengthen the United Nations and make it more responsive and credible have been under way for nearly two years, when Mr. Annan commissioned a panel to come up with suggestions to restore luster to the world body, which celebrates its 60th anniversary this year.

The United Nations' Missed Opportunity (FT)

By Nancy Soderberg

DOJ_NMG_0005165

On Wednesday in New York, most of the world's leaders will gather at the United Nations "World Summit" for what was supposed to be a strong endorsement of a visionary plan for global governance in the 21st century. But the ideological clash between the US and much of the developing world has brought the meeting to the brink of failure.

Weary diplomats have been scrambling to come up with face-saving compromises, still being fought over as this is written. But it is already clear that while the summit will make some progress on the development and security goals set last March by Kofi Annan, UN secretary-general, the final document will fail to chart the bold course he urged.

This summit has been years in the making. In the aftermath of the international community's grave failures in the Balkans and Rwanda in the 1990s, Mr Annan set up several commissions to address the issue of protecting civilians when governments fail to do so, and to look at ways to meet the developing world's urgent needs.

After the Iraq war in 2003, he recognised the gap in perceptions of threat between the developing and the developed worlds. For the US, that threat was primarily terrorism and weapons of mass destruction; for the developing world, it was the threat of underdevelopment, poverty, debt, HIV/Aids and other infectious diseases.

Mr Annan offered sensible proposals in his March report, calling for the developed world to commit 0.7 per cent of gross national product to development, ease trade barriers and slash debt in exchange for a commitment by the developing world to implement good governance and get serious about ending support for terrorists and -weapons proliferation. Such steps were part of the effort to reach the UN's Millennium Development Goals by 2015.

All summer, diplomats whittled away at draft after draft, making scant progress. Throughout the process, much of the developing world has seemed stuck in the 1960s, arguing for the legitimacy of terrorism in liberation struggles, undermining the urgent need for UN management reform and pathetically unable to agree on how to expand the Security Council. The strongest opposition to the text has been led by a collection of retrogade states including Pakistan and Algeria, and increasingly, Russia and China which have opposed any perceived intrustion on state sovereignty.

The US is also blocking progress. It is fighting against its own ideological hot buttons, such as the Kyoto protocol on climate change, the International Criminal Court, specific levels of development aid, disarmament and non- proliferation, and abortion rights. Washington only began to engage seriously in mid-August when John Bolton, as the new US permanent representative to the UN, sought initially to restart the process from scratch.

The result of so many pressures from so many sides was a convoluted draft with pages of disputed texts in brackets that diplomats were still arguing over as their leaders arrived in New York.

The end result will be mixed. The US has now agreed that the specific targets for development assistance can be mentioned, but not specifically en-dorsed. The discredited Commission on Human Rights, hijacked over the past decade by Syria, Cuba, Libya, Sudan and others in the club of the repressive, will be replaced by a new Human Rights Council but of still uncertain composition. Argument remains about how much more authority and flexibility to give the UN secretary-general to manage the institution, despite the urgent call for this in the recent Volcker report's recommendations on UN reform.

On the brighter side, diplomats have, after much wrangling, agreed to -recognise the world's responsibility to protect civilians and improve peacekeeping operations. A new Peacebuilding Commission will focus on the needs of nations in, and emerging from, conflict. While important, these achievements are far from sufficient for preparing the UN, and the world, for the 21st century. They fail to address the toughest peace and security issues: terrorism, use of force, non-proliferation and Security Council reform. Even after September 11 2001, a hard-core group continues to block any definition of terrorism, agreeing only to address the issue later in the year.

Facing opposition from the US, -coupled with scepticism from the developing world, the proposals regarding disarmament and non-proliferation, and criteria for the use of force, are essentially dead. So, too, is any change in the makeup of the Security Council. Four Security Council aspirants – Japan, India, Brazil and Germany – failed in their efforts to create six new permanent seats including two African ones. Africa rejected the proposal.

World leaders will put on their game faces for the summit but the depressing truth is they have failed to take up the secretary-general's challenge. His proposals offer the right way forward for the 21st century but they will have to wait for the world to catch up with his vision. Until then, the world will remain the worse for it.

The Lost U.N. Summit Meeting (NYT)

A once-in-a-generation opportunity to reform and revive the United Nations has been squandered even before the opening gavel comes down this morning for the largest assemblage of world leaders ever brought together in a single location. The responsibility for this failure is widely shared. But the United States, as the host nation and the U.N.'s most indispensable and influential member, bears a disproportionate share.

There are several casualties of this failure of leadership, including the need to reform the United Nations and to strengthen its role as a monitor of human rights. But the most tragic loss is a genuine opportunity to help the one billion people around the world who each live on less than $1 a day.

Last month, President Bush used a recess appointment to send his notoriously undiplomatic, and Congressionally unacceptable, choice for ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, to New York. He contended that contrary to all appearances and to common sense, Mr. Bolton was just the man to achieve the reforms the United Nations needed. Almost immediately, Mr. Bolton began proving Mr. Bush wrong by insisting on a very long list of unilateral demands. The predictable effect was to transform what had been a painful and difficult search for workable diplomatic compromises into a competitive exercise in political posturing.

With Washington jealously protecting the prerogatives of the Security Council, where it holds a veto, others chose to be equally jealous in protecting the prerogatives of the General Assembly, where the influence of poorer and weaker countries is greatest. And when Washington challenged the right of the secretary general to set specific development goals, others then contested his right to set standards for management or human rights. And so on.

That extinguished the idea that international security issues and international development issues are vitally linked, and can be most effectively tackled in tandem. By the time Washington retreated to a more realistic position, it was too late to retrieve much of the bold original agenda, as set out in earlier United Nations summit meetings on development, in the thoughtful recommendations of several high-level panels and in the constructive proposals of Secretary General Kofi Annan. The failure is even more poignant because the United States is clearly on the right side of some important arguments.

Washington, for example, strongly supported the idea of replacing the discredited United Nations Commission on Human Rights, on which nations like Sudan, Libya and Cuba regularly sit, with a new, reformed body that would exclude such notorious rights violators. The final document dilutes this crucial provision to the point of meaninglessness.

On this and other issues, the document offers little more than a fudge of feel-good phrases and pious wishes for future action that leave everyone off the hook from taking entirely practical actions that are needed right now.

This week's summit meeting should have strengthened international commitments to reach broadly accepted development benchmarks over the next decade that could avert tens of thousands of needless deaths from extreme poverty. It should have given the secretary general the power to bypass patronage and rely on merit in choosing and retaining senior officials, creating a crucial institutional safeguard against a replay of the oil-for-food fiasco. It should have reinforced vital international commitments and understandings on nuclear nonproliferation, including those that Mr. Bolton, in his previous job, did so much to undercut.

Although the ceremonial speeches by national leaders are just beginning, the serious negotiations over this summit meeting's outcome are now over. Every one of the more than 170 national leaders attending, starting with President Bush, should be embarrassed about letting this rare opportunity slip away.

IMF Must Redefine To Stay Relevant (FT)

By Rodrigo de Rato

Financial Times, September 14, 2005

Globalisation has brought enormous benefits in growth and efficiency. Yet this same force has brought cross-border financial crises and heightened the imperative to bring into the mainstream those who are being left behind.

Shortly after becoming International Monetary Fund managing director in 2004, I initiated a strategic review aimed at determining whether the fund is fully prepared to meet the challenges and crises of today and the future. When the review is released next week it will call for adjustments that will give greater focus to the fund's work and ensure the IMF can help all member countries face the challenge of integrating into the global economy.

The review suggests that some of the IMF's activities be scaled back, specifically through: streamlined work on standards and codes and financial sector assessments, a more focused approach to its role in low income countries, closer collaboration with the World Bank and spending less time on procedures and documentation. The new proposals also include an effort to deepen the analysis of globalisation, to broaden our research into the dynamics of capital account liberalisation and assess how best to achieve the UN -Millennium Development Goals.

Redefining the fund's mission is inseparable from reassessing IMF governance. The fund's legitimacy as a global organisation rests on fair representation for all members. The current allocation of quotas – capital shares in the IMF on which voting rights are based – puts this legitimacy at risk in many regions, including in Africa, where the fund is heavily engaged, and in Asia, whose place in the world economy has grown far more than its role in the fund. The issue touches on the interests of many stakeholders but it must be addressed. The reallocation of quotas is not a zero sum game if it results in an IMF with widely held legitimacy and ownership.

Over the past decade the fund has been pulled in new directions: devising and overseeing complex crisis prevention initiatives, contributing to the effort to combat the financing of terrorism and money laundering, and playing a role in poverty-reduction strategies. This accretion of new mandates occurred as old mandates remained unchanged. But many of the initiatives of the past decade have evolved into diffuse, resource-intensive operations.

The strategic review aims at preparing for key, yet unpredictable, challenges. The fund has already taken the lead in calling for concerted action to address global current account imbalances. In future, the nature of the imbalances may change but the IMF must stand ready to help its members anticipate them and respond quickly.

Thus, work analysing and advising on global trends and developments in individual countries must be strengthened and reoriented. More resources will be devoted to global and regional issues, even as our regular country work is refocused on the most pressing macroeconomic issues. More attention will be paid to the cross-border implications of country policies and long-term trends such as ageing and energy demand. Country work will be more closely aligned with analysis of capital markets and financial systems. Even greater progress on transparency is essential, not least for the promotion of strong institutions in all countries.

The IMF's lending has to take account of the evolving needs of the membership. For the emerging market countries, there is an unmet demand for insurance against large and volatile capital flows; this will require careful examination by the whole international community. Meanwhile, the needs of low income countries are becoming more differentiated: some require debt relief, others concessional financing, and others just policy advice and support. More must be done to meet these needs effectively. However, the IMF's work in low income countries is overloaded with procedures that absorb substantial resources yet yield questionable gains. This work must be streamlined to ensure the needs of poverty reduction are met.

The IMF's mandate has evolved considerably since it was set up after the second world war and the great depression. This evolution has been guided by the needs of an international community committed to multilateral co-operation. As we address the challenges of our rapidly globalising world, change is essential if the fund is to remain relevant. There are difficult choices to make but with the commitment of our membership it should be possible to agree on a common vision. The IMF stands ready to remain an adviser and a close partner with member countries.

U.N. Vs. Poverty: Seeking A Focus, Quarreling Over The Vision (NYT)

The United Nations General Assembly meeting today was to have been a rare moment when the quest to relieve the crushing poverty of a billion people took center stage. But so far that goal has been overshadowed by Katrina, the oil-for-food scandal and squabbling over reform of the United Nations itself.

Even the debate about the world's common agenda on global poverty began on an unexpectedly sour note, centered around the goals for healing the world's deepest poverty that were to be in the meeting's final document.

The American ambassador, John R. Bolton, initially proposed expunging any reference to specific goals for reducing poverty, hunger and child mortality and combating pandemics of AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria.

Known as the millennium development goals, they emerged from a United Nations conference five years ago. He favored instead citing the broad declaration from which the goals were drawn.

"The thing that shocked me personally was that they're trying to shift and change goal posts," said Charity Kaluki Ngilu, the Kenyan health minister, who is in New York for the meeting. "If this is the case, we African leaders might as well go home and find other methods of developing ourselves."

Mrs. Ngilu, who said she was stunned by the Bush administration's initial position, added that nonetheless, she credits Mr. Bush's anti-AIDS program with helping Kenya to increase the number of people being treated for the disease to 45,000, from 2,000.

Administration officials say Mr. Bush has a vision and a record to offer on development. But as of yesterday, with presidents and prime ministers from more than 170 nations converging on New York, he had yet to put his personal stamp on the debate.

He will undoubtedly address the challenges of fighting global poverty when he speaks today at the United Nations.

But some say he has missed an opportunity to take the lead on poverty - an issue of looming concern in much of the world - even when America itself is preoccupied by terrorism, the war in Iraq and the aftermath of the hurricane.

"It's a failure of the tactical and policy process inside the administration, perhaps because of distractions," said Nancy Birdsall, the founding president of the Center for Global Development in Washington. "It suggests these development issues aren't that high on the agenda. The administration hasn't seized the moment."

Bush administration officials disagree. They say the United States is taking a strong lead. They noted that Laura Bush will be attending an event today in New York to highlight American support to African countries fighting malaria.

John A. Simon, senior director for development at the National Security Council, said the administration's priority had been the substance of the summit meeting, not perceptions.

Officials want to be sure that the final document reflects the president's view that development is about more than the amount of aid rich countries provide to poor ones, but also about good government, sound economic policies and private sector growth.

They also wanted to make it plain that the administration, while agreeing on the need for increased aid, has not and will not promise to give 70 cents of every $100 of national income, as European nations have recently done, with timetables for achieving that level of aid.

"If we do the right things from a policy perspective, the results will speak for themselves," Mr. Simon said yesterday in an e-mail message.

But advocates of the target insist that the United States had already committed to moving toward it in 2002, when Mr. Bush supported a declaration at a summit meeting in Monterrey, Mexico, saying rich countries would "make concrete efforts" to give 0.7 percent of national income in aid.

The United States, the world's largest donor in terms of value, is next to last among richer nations in giving as a share of national income.

In the current negotiations, Mr. Bolton first proposed dropping all references to the target, but later said it could be restored.

The administration's approach and the haggling over the final document contrasts with the way Prime Minister Tony Blair pushed his agenda to alleviate poverty in Africa before the July meeting of the Group of 8 major industrial nations.

Mr. Blair lobbied each leader beforehand. He collaborated with Sir Bob Geldof, the former Boomtown Rats singer, to build public support.

And when the terror bombings in London struck during the Group of 8 talks, Mr. Blair kept them focused on Africa.

He emerged with a commitment from the eight nations to double aid to Africa, to $50 billion a year, by 2010.

It is not clear that much new will emerge at the United Nations. World leaders are likely to affirm their commitment to push forward with the millennium goals to halve extreme poverty and hunger, cut child mortality by two-thirds and ensure the basic education of each child by 2015, among other things.

Those are the same broad goals agreed to five years ago.

Whatever the verdict on Mr. Bush's role, others are seizing the initiative. Former president Bill Clinton will sponsor a three-day conference in New York beginning tomorrow that will focus on poverty and governing, climate change and conflict.

Jeffrey D. Sachs, an economist who headed the United Nation's Millennium Project and is the author of "The End of Poverty," is developing a new organization called Millennium Promise to test his antipoverty ideas in 100 African villages. MTV will broadcast a documentary today, "The Diary of Angelina Jolie and Dr. Jeffrey Sachs in Africa," that recounts their trip to one such village in Kenya.

At a screening on Monday evening at the Museum of Television and Radio, Professor Sachs said of the coming United Nations meeting, "Maybe what we've got to do is lead by action, and the government will follow along." Ms. Jolie, looking every inch the movie star in a figure-hugging black dress, said, "Europe has stepped up, but America should take the lead, or at least more of a lead."

By Jeffrey Sachs

Tuesday, September 13

While the governments negotiate to find a least common denominator on which they can agree, the 2005 World Summit is being flanked by an impressive number of commitments from businesses and private philanthropists to take action on their own, indeed to lead their own governments in the fight against extreme poverty. The call for individual responsibility in the fight against global poverty - in which private citizens, businesses, foundations, and scientists act even when their governments don't - is catching on. And like other great movements of the past, including the fight against slavery and the fight for civil rights, it may very well prove to be the case that governments are the last to act, following the lead of private trailblazers.

The Clinton Global Initiative is surely the most visible of these efforts, drawing upon former President Bill Clinton's ability to mobilize friends from in and out of government and industry. Clinton seems intent on achieving practical actions, following the path set by America's great former President, Jimmy Carter, who has proved what post-Presidential leadership can mean in the fight against disease, hunger, and tyranny. If President Clinton takes a page from President Carter's playbook, the results could be spectacular.

President Carter himself has teamed up with a group of universities, private philanthropists, and celebrity-activists in a new effort, serving as Honorary Co-Chairman of Millennium Promise, a new initiative launched yesterday on the occasion of the Summit. This effort, which teams up with the UN Millennium Project, which I direct, will be a broad-based partnership of universities, non-governmental organizations, and private individuals, to spur private action on the Millennium Development Goals. President Carter and I are joined on the Board of Millennium Promise by corporate leaders, heads of major Universities and foundations, and leading voices in the fight against poverty including Angelina Jolie.

The centerpiece of the effort will be the Millennium Village concept, in which communities of around 5,000 people in rural Africa and Asia are encouraged and enabled to take the lead in fighting poverty, through an integrated strategy that focuses on agriculture, health, education, and infrastructure. The early examples of such integrated efforts are remarkable. A Millennium Village in western Kenya was able to quadruple food production this past year by helping farmers in the community to get access to improved seed varieties and fertilizers. This help came at a cost of a few dollars per capita, with benefits in higher food yields that are multiples of that. The village has also been able to build a clinic, step up the fight against malaria, and provide school meals for all of the children in the community.

Other business meetingsaround the Summit are seeing leading companies pledging to make their technologies available on a mass basis to impoverished regions. It's often the case that the marginal cost of supplying these cutting-edge technologies is very low compared to patent-protected prices in rich-country markets. The market prices of drugs, software, and communications technologies are often much higher than cost, with the margin reflecting the returns to earlier research and development. It often costs just pennies (or less) for a company to provide its software and medicines to impoverished communities for products that sell for tens or hundreds of dollars in the rich-country markets. The companies know that they recoup their R&D outlays in the rich-country markets.

Much of the attention in the fight against poverty has been directed at what rich and poor-country governments will or won't do. The answer, too often, is that they won't do much, or not enough. Despite all odds, the fight against extreme poverty is transforming itself from an official aid effort to a broader-based movement. Government remains critical - particularly to providing the large-scale financing that is needed. But in much of the world private initiatives are likely now to lead the way, in terms of innovation, proof of concept, and mobilization of public awareness and support.

The negotiations on the draft declaration for the World Summit - which opens on Tuesday - have been nothing short of bizarre. The United States government has fought a relentless battle to dissociate itself from specific obligations regarding international development, and has tried repeatedly to the quash obligations that it has taken on the past. All of this has been taking place at a time when the US itself has become an aid recipient, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

The opening salvo a couple of weeks ago was the remarkable assertion by the United States government that the Millennium Development Goals do not even exist, so that the phrase itself should be expunged from the document. This was news to the rest of the world, who were gathering at the Summit first and foremost to find ways to reinforce the Millennium Development Goals. The US claimed that it had signed the Millennium Declaration but not the Millennium Development Goals.

The argument was not very impressive. All 18 of the targets of the Millennium Development Goals - to halve hunger, fight disease, reduce maternal mortality, ensure access to safe drinking water, and more - are explicitly part of the Millennium Declaration. With 190 countries standing in opposition to the US position, the US relented.

The longer battle has ensued around official development assistance and the target of 0.7 percent of GNP in official development aid. It seems at times that all US foreign policy regarding economic development revolves around the US insistence to pay almost nothing to help the poorest countries.

US official aid levels are 0.16 percent of GNP, an increase from 0.10 percent when President Bush took office but still the lowest or second lowest of all donors (vying with Italy for the bottom slot). US aid levels for Africa are 0.03 percent of GNP, meaning that the US gives Africa just 3 cents in aid for every $100 of US GNP. Much of the rest of US aid still goes to "strategic" countries such as Pakistan, Turkey, and Egypt, or to US consultant salaries.

Why the US government is so dead-set against doing more to help impoverished and dying people is one of the great mysteries of our time. It's not as if the poorest countries are asking for an open checkbook or an unconstrained line of credit. They are asking for rich countries to honor a modest commitment, a mere 0.7 percent of GNP, roughly one seventh of what the US is spending this year on the military and one third of what the US has spent on tax cuts in the first Bush term.

Just as with the Millennium Development Goals, the US government has worked overtime to huff and puff that it never signed the 0.7 target, and thus should not be bound by it. Even if it were true that the U.S. had never signed on, the sight of the world's richest country denying a long-standing international target in this manner is stunning. The US signed on to the 0.7 target in the Monterrey Conference on Financing for Development in March 2002. It has since bobbed and weaved to evade the implications of that agreement.

In paragraph 42 of the Monterrey Consensus, the US and other signatories declared that they "urge developed countries that have not done so to make concrete efforts toward the target of 0.7 percent of GNP in official development assistance."

The European Union took up its pledge, and has defined "concrete efforts" as a new timetable to reach 0.56 percent of GNP in official aid by 2010 and 0.7 percent of GNP by 2015. The US on its side has simply been claiming that the target does not exist, and telling some in the corridors that signing the Monterrey pledge had been a mistake.

This aggressive position has continued down to the details. The US has fought commitments to a "Quick Win" against malaria through the mass distribution of insecticide-treated bed nets and effective medications. It has resisted commitments to quick wins in other areas as well. In the end, every specific target and timetable to help the world's poorest of the poor has come under US fire.

The US fight against the fight against poverty would be bizarre at any moment (remember John Kennedy pledging "to those peoples in the huts and villages across the globe struggling to break the bonds of mass misery, we pledge our best efforts to help them help themselves, for whatever period is required") but it has been especially shocking in the face of Hurricane Katrina. The US is accepting aid from UN agencies, Mexico, Europe, and others, at the very moment it is working overtime to avoid or evade commitments to the poorest of the poor, who are dying by the millions each year due to insufficient assistance from the donor countries.

There is a silver lining in all of this, believe it or not. The American people have been aghast at the failures of Washington to prepare for, and then address, the hurricane. They have been shocked that President Bush could declare that "I don't think anyone anticipated the breach of the levees [in New Orleans]" when that risk was notorious and had been discussed for decades.

Similarly, whenever they have gotten a glimpse of the UN negotiations, they have been shocked. Though the American people know little about the Millennium Development Goals (since President Bush has perhaps never even uttered the phrase), editorial writers around the country, in both liberal and conservative regions, were dismayed that the US delegation was working in America's name to undercut the world's measurable and monitorable poverty alleviation targets that provide a clear framework for accountable results.

Perhaps the most notable bottom line this week will be that the voices of the poor are finally piercing the deep layers of indifference and misdirection.

Palestinian Leader Vows To Restore Order In Gaza (USAT)

By Martin Patience

USA Today, September 14, 2005

JERUSALEM — Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas said Tuesday that he would impose law and order in Gaza in response to the chaos that followed the pullout of Israeli troops from the territory a day earlier.

In a televised speech, Abbas promised, "We are not going to hesitate to put an end to all the negative signs and violations of law and order. … We are not going to tolerate chaos after today."

Earlier, the Palestinian Authority president's chief of staff, Rafiq Husseini, said Abbas would begin disarming small militant groups soon. After parliamentary elections in January, he said, Abbas would insist that big militant groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad disarm in accordance with steps in the U.S.-mediated "road map" to establish a Palestinian state.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, speaking as he traveled to New York for a United Nations General Assembly meeting, called on the Palestinian Authority to put an end to riots in Gaza. "This rioting — even they understand they have to control this," he said.

Palestinian euphoria and celebration were mixed with lawlessness the day after Israel ended its 38-year presence in the territory. Israel withdrew about 8,500 settlers last month and pulled out the last of its troops early Monday. With Israel gone, Abbas is under pressure to restore order. There was more widespread looting in the abandoned Gaza settlements on Tuesday. Thousands of Palestinians also crossed the border from Gaza into Egypt, despite the official closing of the Rafah crossing.

Abbas' attempt to disarm militants could be the toughest test of his eight-month presidency. As he spoke Tuesday, a convoy of hundreds of Hamas gunmen drove through a Gaza refugee camp to celebrate the Israeli withdrawal.

"This convoy is the size of our joy," Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar said in the Jebaliya refugee camp. Hamas, which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, is the largest Palestinian militant group.

Husseini, the president's chief of staff, said Hamas would face a choice: "Hamas can't mix between being a political party and having armed militias." A top Hamas military commander, Ahmed al-Jabari, insisted Monday that the group would "sever any hand" that tries to stop its resistance.

Michael Tarazi, a Palestinian Authority spokesman, played down the fires and vandalism at the former settlements. "For 38 years we were under the gun of a foreign occupation," he said. "Just like the fall of the Berlin Wall and the statue of Saddam Hussein being toppled during the Iraqi war, people are euphoric about a modicum of new-found liberty."

The celebrations hit Gaza's economy. Tuesday, Palestinians looted dozens of the more than 3,000 greenhouses that American Jewish donors had bought from Gaza settlers for $14 million last month. The greenhouses were given to the Palestinian Authority to provide jobs.

A Gaza Holiday: Looting, Chaos And Bargains In Egypt (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

GAZA, Sept. 13 - Palestinians continued to celebrate a new sense of freedom on Tuesday, pouring across the temporarily open border with Egypt and through the abandoned Israeli settlements.

President Mahmoud Abbas, in a televised speech on Tuesday evening, urged Palestinians to "create a model and civilized Gaza," but also vowed to restore order, beginning with small militant groups aligned with his own Fatah movement. "We are not going to tolerate chaos after today," he pledged.

But on Tuesday there was chaos aplenty, with thousands of Palestinians rushing across the border to Egypt to shop, while thousands of others continued their active salvaging of saleable or usable materials from the 21 former Israeli settlements. In some places, Palestinians looted the greenhouses that were bought for their use by American philanthropists, taking nylon tarpaulins, irrigation hoses and electrical equipment.

Palestinian security forces deployed around the greenhouses said they were hopelessly outnumbered by the looters. "We need at least another 70 soldiers. This is just a joke," Taysir Haddad, one of 22 security guards assigned to Neve Dekalim, told The Associated Press. "We've tried to stop as many people as we can, but they're like locusts."

He said about 80 percent of the greenhouses were still intact, but looters walked off with lighting fixtures, cables and wires despite the police presence.

Ahmed Qurei, the Palestinian prime minister, toured Neve Dekalim and implored Palestinians to leave the greenhouses alone. "These greenhouses are for the Palestinian people," he said. "We don't want anyone to touch or harm anything that can be useful for our people."

For a second day, Egyptian border guards looked the other way as Palestinians crossed the fences into Egypt through the Philadelphi route, which had been patrolled by the Israeli Army until early Monday.

Egypt had promised to keep the border secure, but instead has allowed Palestinians a kind of holiday, to last until Thursday or Friday, to visit. Thousands of Palestinians crossed to visit friends in Cairo and El Arish, 24 miles from the border, to buy cheaper cigarettes, food, gasoline and medicines, while hundreds of Egyptians came to Gaza.

The Palestinians, who have been able to leave Gaza only with great difficulty in the past, visited seaside restaurants, looked for relatives and stocked up on household items. One man even bought two sheep, saying they were half the price of the sheep in Gaza. Taxi fares from Rafah to El Arish nearly doubled during the day, to about $70.

Some Israeli officials criticized the Egyptians and said the lax border controls boded badly for Israel's future security, given the ease of smuggling weapons and ammunition, and for compromise on issues like the Rafah crossing, which Israel is being pressed to leave in the hands of the Egyptians and Palestinians, with European monitoring. Mark Regev, the spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, said that Israel "has expressed concerns about the situation to the government of Egypt, and we've been assured the current situation is temporary."

Another Israeli official noted that the Rafah crossing will be shut for six months, a period that would allow Israel and the world to better gauge how Mr. Abbas is running Gaza. In the meantime, traffic in southern Gaza will be diverted to the crossing point at Kerem Shalom, where Egypt, Israel and Gaza converge.

Mr. Abbas spoke on Palestinian television on Tuesday both to celebrate the withdrawal and to describe millions of dollars of job creation and infrastructure projects, including the rebuilding of the central road artery through Gaza, numerous housing complexes, improvements to sewerage and a seaport.

He also promised quick moves to restore the rule of law, which most Palestinians complain is lacking, and aides hinted he would start with small militant groups associated with Fatah. "After today, we are not going to hesitate to put an end to all the negative signs and violations of law and order," Mr. Abbas said. "We have one law for everyone, and no one is above the law."

In the former settlement of Netzarim, however, militants from Islamic Jihad said the group would not give up its weapons. "We will respect the rule of law, but the weapons are not negotiable," Muhammad Sheik Khalil, head of the group's military wing, said at a celebration rally. Dozens of masked gunmen - many holding Kalashnikov rifles and grenade launchers - joined the rally.

The larger militant group, Hamas, had its own celebratory rally, larger and noisier, on Tuesday night in Gaza City, with its leaders hailing the Israeli withdrawal, which they credit to the resistance of Palestinians like themselves, not to negotiations. But there was no visible display of weapons.

"There is an element of hatred for the occupation and revenge," he said. "Few Palestinian homes have escaped some form of Israeli oppression."

The jubilation is necessary and important, he said. "But soon Palestinians will realize that this improvement may not make a major difference in their lives or in the prospect of an independent Palestinian state," Mr. Amr said. "Then the situation will look gloomier."

New Legal Standing Of Gaza Stirs Debate (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

TEL AVIV -- With the final Israeli soldiers gone from the sands of Gaza, a debate over the coastal strip's new legal standing is taking a shape that is likely to have political ramifications for the future of Israeli-Palestinian relations.

Although Gazans are celebrating a liberation of sorts, the territory isn't a sovereign state, and many Palestinians don't consider Israel's occupation over. Israel, for its part, wants international recognition of the end of its military rule and the beginning of full Palestinian "jurisdiction" over the Gaza Strip.

At stake is whether Israel will be able to fully absolve itself of responsibility for Gaza's anarchy and economic blight, as well as the degree of force that the Jewish state would be able to use in retaliation for cross-border attacks.

The argument over the Gaza pullout will come to the fore this coming week, when Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas attend the United Nations General Assembly's 60th anniversary in New York.

In a speech scheduled for tomorrow, Mr. Sharon is expected to announce that the termination of Israel's military rule in Gaza marks the transfer of responsibility to the Palestinians, Ha'aretz newspaper reported.

"From our point of view, with our pullout from Gaza, Gaza becomes Palestinian jurisdiction," said Foreign Ministry spokesman Ron Prosor. "We urge the Palestinian people to step up to the plate and start an urgent and vital process of nation building. It's all-important that we all see the development of good government."

Israel's government refused to describe the territories conquered in the 1967 Arab-Israeli conflict as occupied, saying there was never an internationally recognized sovereign power there. And Mr. Sharon wants to free Israel from its obligations in Gaza as an occupying power, analysts said.

But Israel will retain control of Gaza's airspace, its territorial waters and, for the near future, the border crossing to Egypt. Palestinians argue that those trappings of military occupation still qualify Israel as responsible for the situation inside Gaza.

"It's still occupied. You don't need to have settlements or troops for [Gaza] to be occupied," said Diana Bhuttu, an aide to Palestinian Civil Affairs Minister Mohammad Dahlan. "The legal test is whether you can still maintain control over the area."

The Palestinians also say Gaza's economic, cultural and political links to occupied West Bank mean that the strip remains dominated by Israel. Indeed, under the 1993 Oslo peace accords, the two territories are considered one political unit.

Israel's unilateral withdrawal gives Gazans the greatest degree of self-determination yet, but it is not clear whether the international community will recognize the occupation as over.

"This is a big question which should fall in the hands of international lawyers," said Ron Pundak, a director of the Peres Center for Peace who helped start negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians in the early 1990s. "Can one declare an end to occupation when you are controlling the contours?"

No-Frills Candidate Aims For Germany's Top Spot (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

OSNABRUECK, Germany -- The woman who wants to rule Germany stepped to a microphone on the packed main square of this industrial city and reminded the crowd of the nation's woes. The jobless rate is the highest since the end of World War II, she noted bleakly, economic growth is the weakest in Europe, the national mood gripped by doubt.

So what would Angela Merkel do about it? "Now, I don't expect to hear loud applause," she warned at the recent campaign event, before describing how she would raise the national sales tax -- already 16 percent for most items -- to pay for her party's job-creation program.

Moans and grumbles rose from the audience of about 8,000 people. But Merkel didn't back down. "You can decide," she said. "We can continue as we have been, with promises of blue skies. But promises already have been made and promises have been broken. That needs to change."

Unsmiling, unstylish and uncharismatic, Merkel, 51, is bidding to become Germany's first female chancellor, as well as the first to have grown up behind the Iron Curtain, in the former East Germany. Polls show that her party, the Christian Democratic Union, holds a lead, albeit a narrowing one, in a national election scheduled for Sunday and that she stands a very good chance of sitting at the chancellor's desk in Berlin.

The vote comes at a pivotal moment for Germany, the biggest country in Europe and the world's third-largest economy. Despite spending more than $1.5 trillion over the past 15 years to reunify the nation, Germany has failed to heal many divisions between east and west. It is also grappling with the competitive challenges of globalization, as German companies move jobs to lower-wage countries.

Although Merkel's party leads in the polls, for many Germans she remains a remote figure. The former physicist rarely talks about her personal life, her upbringing under communism or how she became involved in politics. She often appears dour and uncomfortable. On her latest campaign poster, she looks like she's clenching her teeth as she forces a grin.

"Typical German," said Kai Sausmikat, 41, a voter who came to hear Merkel at the Osnabrueck rally, pulling down the corners of his mouth into a clown-like frown.

Merkel's rivals, inside and outside her party, show little regard for her political skills. In July, when the Parliament voted to hold early elections, Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer told Merkel to her face that her campaign would collapse. "Mrs. Merkel, at this moment with your opinion polls, you appear like a magnificent-looking souffle in the oven," Fischer said. "We'll see what's really left after the voters prick into it. I can't wait."

If the election were a personality contest, surveys suggest Merkel would lose by a wide margin to the telegenic incumbent, Gerhard Schroeder. But in Germany's political system, national leaders are chosen by party, and the Christian Democrats lead the polls.

Merkel has run a simple campaign that makes no attempt to capitalize on her sex. She has focused on a plan to generate jobs by cutting payroll taxes and making it easier for companies to hire or fire workers. She has also called for an overhaul of Germany's notoriously complicated tax code.

A victory for her party would likely mean closer relations with Washington. Merkel has strongly criticized Schroeder for alienating the United States, Germany's closest postwar ally, in disputes over Iraq, although she does not support sending troops to that country.Early Years Under Communism

Merkel was born in 1954 in Hamburg, a port city in West Germany, the first child of a Protestant pastor and an English teacher. When she was an infant, her father moved the family to the East German state of Brandenburg, crossing a border that had not yet hardened but was already marked by an exodus of Germans heading in the opposite direction.

Her father, Horst Kasner, sympathized with the utopian goals of the Communist government there. But his precise relationship with it is difficult to untangle.

As a preacher in a society that discouraged religion, Kasner was considered politically suspect. His wife, Herlind, was not allowed to teach school because of her husband's profession. But the family was granted privileges not afforded to most citizens, including two cars and permission to travel to the West.

When Angela entered elementary school in Templin, a town of about 11,000 people north of Berlin, her parents decided not to enroll her in the Young Pioneers, a Communist Party youth group. They changed their minds a year later after her teachers made clear she would suffer academically if she didn't join, according to interviews in her home town.

"Her parents, especially her mother, were very interested in making sure Angela wasn't stuck in the corner as a pastor's daughter," said Hans-Ulrich Beeskow, a middle-school math teacher who recalled Merkel as an especially gifted student. "It wasn't political engagement by any means. It was important to her mother to make sure no stones were thrown in her path."

Merkel excelled at math, Russian and English, and was rewarded with a coveted university slot in Leipzig. She studied physics and remained active in Communist youth groups, a prerequisite for university students.

In 1977, she married a fellow physics student, Ulrich Merkel. They divorced five years later.

In an interview with Evelyn Roll, a German journalist and biographer, Merkel said she was vigilant about suppressing any political opinions that might have attracted attention. "It was a real advantage from those times that you learned to keep quiet," she said. "That was one of the survival strategies."

In the late 1970s, she has said, she was approached by two men who asked her to serve as an informant for the East German intelligence agency, the Stasi. Merkel said she balked, arguing that she would be a poor spy because she was bad at keeping secrets.

She ended up in East Berlin, where she earned a doctorate in physics and worked as a researcher at the Academy of Science.

As a politician on the stump, Merkel has shied away from discussing life under communism, even when addressing East German audiences.

On Sunday, she visited her home town of Templin for the first time during the campaign. About 600 people, including her mother, heard her speak outside a beer garden. Rather than wax nostalgic, Merkel merely acknowledged that the region "is what you call home" and recited her standard speech.

Such detachment has alienated many eastern Germans, who had hoped she would stand up for a region some westerners view as backward. In Templin, for instance, there are no visible reminders that the hometown girl is running for chancellor, aside from a few stock campaign posters.

"If you walk through Templin and ask ordinary citizens, they don't want her to be chancellor," said Ulrich Schoeneich, the Templin mayor, a Social Democrat who is friends with Merkel's mother. "In part, she has forgotten where she came from."A Climb to Party Leadership

Merkel was late to the East German political revolution in 1989. She avoided early public protests against the Communists, focusing instead on her job. On the chaotic evening when the Berlin Wall was breached, she joined thousands of others in crossing to the other side, biographers have recounted, but returned home a few hours later because she had to get up early the next morning to go to work.

Gradually, she lost some of her caution and became involved in politics. Six weeks after the fall of the wall, she joined a new party, Democratic Awakening, and found a fresh calling as a press secretary.

"She had a chance to get involved and make a change, and she took advantage of the situation," said Rainer Eppelmann, a former leader of Democratic Awakening and now a member of Parliament.

In 1990, she was named deputy spokeswoman for the first -- and last -- democratically elected government in East Germany. After unification that year, she joined the Christian Democrats, who promptly named her as a candidate for Parliament.

She won the spot and attracted the interest of Chancellor Helmut Kohl, who was looking for easterners to fill leadership jobs in his government. All of a sudden she found herself a member of Kohl's cabinet, with the title of minister for family and women.

At the time, Merkel was unmarried but living with a former academic adviser, Joachim Sauer. The couple married in 1998, but only after the archbishop of Cologne chided Merkel to formalize the relationship.

Merkel continued her climb into the upper ranks of the Christian Democrats through a combination of good timing and political savvy, political analysts say. In 1998, she took over as head of the party after Kohl, her mentor, became ensnared in a campaign finance scandal. Since then, she has eased out rivals and pressured competitors to stand aside so she could seek the chancellorship.

Merkel, who is childless, has built a wall around her private life and rarely appears with her husband in public. But that hasn't stopped opponents from taking personal shots. In an interview published last month, Schroeder's wife, Doris Schroeder-Koepf, highlighted Merkel's lack of children by calling her insensitive to the needs of working mothers.

The German mass media have also made sport of her personal appearance. After ignoring such critiques, she began a gradual makeover two years ago, visiting a celebrity hairstylist in Berlin who also counts Schroeder as a client.

The commentary has generated sympathy for Merkel, especially among women who see the attacks as sexist.

"She grew up in East Germany and is a natural scientist -- that means she was exposed to less pressure for so-called 'female' behavior than we western women were," said Alice Schwarzer, Germany's best-known feminist, in an e-mailed response to questions. "My advice: Stay true to herself. Stay authentic! Everything else would seem false."

Genocide, One Year On (WP)

A year ago, then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell declared that the violence in the Darfur region of Sudan justified the term "genocide." That was the first time since the adoption of the U.N. Genocide Convention in 1948 that a government had accused a sitting counterpart of this worst of all humanitarian crimes, and Mr. Powell chose his words carefully. His language was based on a survey of Darfurian refugees commissioned by the State Department: Of 1,136 civilians interviewed, a third had heard racial epithets while being attacked, suggesting that the mass killings and evictions in Darfur constituted genocide. The survey also found that three in four refugees had seen government insignia on the uniforms of their attackers, leaving no doubt as to the guilt of Sudan's government.

Since that finding, the United States has led an international effort to end the genocide. The effort has not been as quick or decisive as the genocide finding warranted: The Bush administration's attempt to pressure Sudan's government with U.N. sanctions was feckless, and it made no effort to deploy a robust NATO peacekeeping force. But, little by little, American diplomacy has made headway. For now, the horror has abated.

The first success of Western diplomacy was to improve access to Darfur for humanitarian workers and supplies, ending the government's policy of systematically denying visas to aid officials and bottling up their equipment in customs. Next, Sudan's rulers were persuaded to accept the deployment of 7,700 African Union troops in Darfur, up from the handful who were there a year ago. Partly thanks to the presence of these troops, violence between government forces and rebels, and between government and civilians, has greatly diminished.

But the progress is incomplete and reversible. Fully 3.2 million people have been affected by the war, half of Darfur's population. Many of these subsist in crowded camps for displaced people, where they depend on Western charity. Although humanitarian access has improved since last year, it remains imperfect. In the Kalma camp, which is home to something like 160,000 displaced people, the government has refused to extend a Norwegian group's authority to coordinate the distribution of relief supplies and has imposed an economic blockade. Meanwhile low-level violence continues. Although the government has authorized the deployment of 7,700 A.U. troops, only 5,800 are in place so far -- a failure both of the African governments that had promised troops and of the Western governments that promised to support them logistically.

The progress over the past year demonstrates that the United States and its allies do have the power to save lives by the tens of thousands. It also suggests that, if the Bush administration had pushed harder and earlier, it could have saved many more people. This lesson must be remembered over the coming weeks and months. Outsiders need to persist in their efforts to broker peace negotiations between Sudan's government and Darfur's rebels; they must complete the deployment of the African Union force and continue to pressure the government for humanitarian access. The past year demonstrates that, if the United States and its allies pursue these goals with determination, they can get what they want. But if they lose interest in Darfur, violence may resume and humanitarian access may dry up. With so much of the population already displaced and weakened, Darfur's death rate could easily return to the horrific levels of a year ago.

Something has gone terribly awry when a 5-year-old joins a riot started by a paramilitary army. Yet last weekend in Belfast, a child just that age was seized for throwing stones at the police and returned to his parents.

Violence erupted in Northern Ireland once again as authorities prevented the Orange Order, the largest Protestant organization in the province, from parading past a Catholic neighborhood. From Saturday to Tuesday morning, furious battles between young Protestant men and the police took place on the streets of Belfast. According to police reports, two paramilitary groups, the Ulster Defense Assn. and the Ulster Volunteer Force, have fired shots at the more than 1,000 police officers and 1,000 soldiers deployed in the area.

Nobody ever said it would be easy to make peace in Northern Ireland. But nearly a month ago, the democratic process in that troubled region got a boost when the Irish Republican Army ordered its troops to surrender their arms through a verifiable process. The British government began scaling back its military presence in Northern Ireland immediately after the IRA statement.

Although blame for the present violence rests mainly with the leadership of the Orange Order, the silence of at least two key Protestant political leaders who could have helped head off the clashes gives them a share of the responsibility. The Rev. Ian Paisley, head of the Democratic Unionist Party, and Reg Empey, the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party, should immediately denounce sectarian violence as unacceptable.

Every year, starting in April and finishing around September, hundreds of parades take place throughout Northern Ireland, mostly meant to celebrate centuries-old Protestant victories over Catholics. When these parades go past Catholic neighborhoods, they often amount to little more than open and pointless provocations.

To avoid the anger and resentment that have resulted in the past, a commission was granted legal authority in 1998 to set the rules and change the routes of the parades. This has produced some minor skirmishes in the intervening years but nothing like the recent riots.

Even acknowledging that most of these parades serve no good purpose, forbidding them seems to be unenforceable — such is the power of tradition, especially on a proud old island like Ireland. The only viable solution is to get political leaders to recognize equal rights for both communities, and to get Orange Order leaders to the table, negotiating directly with representatives of the communities through which it intends to march.

TERRORISM NEWS:

McCain Pushes For Detainee Amendment (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron and Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 14, 2005

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is threatening to attach an amendment to the defense appropriations bill defining acceptable treatment of military detainees if the defense authorization bill, to which it is currently attached, is not voted on this fall.

"I hate to do this," said McCain, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee's Airland Subcommittee.

When Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) shelved the defense authorization bill before the August recess, the treatment of detainees was one of two contentious issues. The other was a delay of the base realignment and closure (BRAC) process.

The president opposed amendments on both issues and said he would veto the bill unless they were stripped from it.

The dispute between the White House and McCain is their first high-profile disagreement since the November election.

Meanwhile, Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, remains "very supportive" of McCain's amendment, according to a committee spokesperson. And Warner also is committed to bringing the authorization bill to the floor this fall.

Warner told reporters yesterday that he and Frist are discussing bringing the bill back up after the president makes his recommendations on the BRAC list. The Base Closure and Realignment Commission submitted its recommendations to Bush last week. He has until Sept. 23 to decide whether to approve the list or change it.

Senate Defense Appropriations Subcommittee Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) has said that the defense appropriations bill will be considered after the defense authorization is voted on.

Sen. Thad Cochran(R-Miss.), chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said yesterday that appropriators are going to try to get the defense bill done the first week of October. The fiscal year 2006 starts Oct. 1.

18 Detainees Force-Fed At Guantanamo (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — A hunger strike at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has grown to 128 prisoners who are demanding that they be immediately released or granted access to a legal process to defend themselves against blanket allegations that they are terrorists.

The strike, begun more than five weeks ago, has forced military authorities to hospitalize 18 of the prisoners and to take extraordinary measures to force-feed them.

Some detainees have vowed to die if necessary, but the Pentagon insists that it will not let anyone starve to death.

"Everyone is stable," Sgt. Justin Behrens, a prison spokesman, said of those hospitalized. "We're going to take care of everyone."

More than a quarter of the 502 detainees have refused food and liquids at various times as the protest has gained momentum since it began Aug. 8.

Along with demanding that they be freed or put on trial, some detainees also are complaining of assaults by guards and continuing to allege that there has been desecration of Muslim religious items. Behrens denied that detainees were being abused.

"The guards here are professional and are using standard operating procedures," he said. "Officers are on the cellblocks all the time to make sure this never happens."

Nevertheless, some of the complaints from prisoners, natives of 40 different countries sent to the prison after it opened in 2002, are being disclosed by attorneys.

All 502 have been designated "enemy combatants." Four have been charged with specific crimes and are awaiting trial before military commissions.

Maj. Jane Boomer, a Pentagon spokeswoman assigned to the Office of Military Commissions, said that the military commissions were on hold, awaiting a decision on whether the Supreme Court would grant a challenge to the legality of the process.

"We are very, very patient here in Guantanamo," prisoner Binyam Mohammed wrote in an Aug. 11 letter to his lawyer, explaining why the hunger strike was begun. "But finally enough was enough."

He joined the hunger strike, vowing that "I do not plan to stop until I either die or we are respected."

Mohammed, a 27-year-old native of Ethiopia who was raised in England, is suspected of training in an Afghan paramilitary camp and of engaging in terrorist plots. After Sept. 11, he fled to Pakistan, where he was captured.

Another hunger striker, Hisham Sliti of Tunisia, told his lawyers that soldiers threw a chair and a mini-refrigerator at him in an effort to get him to talk.

The Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York legal advocacy group that has helped some of the prisoners, found in a new report that the protest followed several smaller hunger strikes, as well as a mass suicide attempt in which nearly two dozen prisoners tried to hang themselves in their cells two years ago.

The group said that frustration among prisoners was growing. The prisoners "need fair trials with proper legal representation," the center said in a report on the hunger strike.

The group quoted prisoner Shaker Aamer, a Saudi who later moved to London and was captured by allied forces in Afghanistan, as saying that the hunger strike was triggered when authorities placed some detainees who belonged to a "prisoners council" in isolation cells.

"The government's effort to detain hundreds of Muslim men outside the rule of law has greatly undermined our nation's moral standing in the international community," the Center for Constitutional Rights said in the report. It "threatens the values of justice and fairness for which our country stands."

The Pentagon defines a hunger striker as anyone who passes up nine meals over 72 hours.

The Supreme Court is expected to decide by the end of this month whether to hear the challenge about the legality of military commissions.

If it does decide to hear the challenge, the high court probably would not decide the case until sometime next year.

AP: Gitmo Interrogators Face Accusations (AJC/AP)

By Ben Fox, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — A U.S. inquiry into alleged abuse at Guantanamo uncovered a climate of deep distrust between military police and interrogators, who were accused during the probe of giving terror suspects personal information about their guards.

The MPs suspected interrogators gave their names and Social Security numbers to prisoners in exchange for intelligence, according to the investigation, which recommended that a senior interrogator be relieved of duty for "failure to know his enemy."

The interrogator "sees himself as a hero for the detainees, and against the MPs, on a crusade in the battle of the MPs against the detainees," one investigator wrote in the report on the inquiry that The Associated Press obtained under a Freedom of Information lawsuit.

The report recommended military authorities look further into the disclosure of MP information to detainees. Guantanamo officials didn't respond to repeated questions about the investigation, including whether the interrogator — a military officer — was relieved of duty or whether the prison camp instituted any reforms in response to the findings.

The investigation began in March 2004, when the same interrogator claimed military police had abused detainees at the high-security camp in eastern Cuba, where the United States holds about 500 men captured in its war on terror.

The interrogator claimed that guards mistreated a suspected al-Qaida member by not allowing him to use the bathroom immediately after a five-hour interrogation and that at other times withheld food and turned the temperature down on a cell to 52 degrees as punishment.

The investigator faulted the interrogator instead — recommending he be relieved of his duties for reasons that included a "failure to know his enemy," the "unfounded" allegations against the guards and "the noted possibility that he suffers from Reverse Stockholm Syndrome."

Stockholm Syndrome is a psychological phenomenon in which hostages develop a bond with their captors. The most often-cited example is the heiress Patty Hearst who helped rob banks with the radicals who kidnapped her in 1974.

The MPs said in sworn statements that they suspected interrogators may have been trading the names and Social Security numbers of guards to get intelligence in return.

"I believe that some of the interrogators would do whatever it takes to gather that, including giving out some MP's personal information," said a guard from the 258th Military Police company who said he was concerned because some detainees had a "deep hatred" for him.

The investigator, after talking to guards, said: "All expressed concerns for the secrecy of their personal information and the safety of their families."

The situation was so bad that an investigator said two guards were "petrified" of disclosing their name, rank and Social Security numbers on Privacy Act statements during the probe.

"They both pushed away from the table with a look of horror on their faces and told the investigating officers that this information was provided to the detainees by the interrogators," the military investigator wrote.

The MPs said personal property of detainees that had been confiscated was sometimes returned to prisoners with the Privacy Act statements of guards who handled the belongings. The detainees told the guards that it was interrogators who gave them the documents.

Nearly 100 detainees have been released since the investigation, but it's unknown if any of those who have been freed had received information about the guards.

At Guantanamo, allegations of inappropriate ties between the largely Muslim detainees and their military and civilian handlers have surfaced before.

Troops had alleged that Ahmad I. al-Halabi, an Arabic translator for the Air Force who was convicted last year of mishandling documents at the base, and Army Capt. James Yee, a Muslim chaplain who was cleared of espionage charges, had also sympathized with detainees.

Suspicion of Muslim personnel by non-Muslims wasn't uncommon, said Donald Rehkopf Jr., the lawyer for al-Halabi, who had more serious espionage charges dropped in a plea deal.

"There was a lot of conflict between the Muslim linguists and the cadre of MPs down there," he told the AP. "It was a total lack of cultural awareness."

It isn't known whether the March 2004 probe involved a Muslim interrogator. Military censors blacked out names and other identifying details in the report. He was described as a regional team chief in charge of interrogators handling detainees from an undisclosed part of the world.

In his sworn statement, the interrogator alleged that it was the guards who allowed detainees to overhear sensitive information. He also said he was told MPs had conducted an "unauthorized cell search" at midnight and "openly talk" about harassing detainees.

"The majority of the ... personnel, especially the reservists, are consummate professionals," the interrogator said. "Those few that dispense information (even inadvertently), who harass detainees, and act in an altogether unprofessional manner, undermine the mission ... and do a disservice to those who work hard to do a good job."

The investigator, though, sided with the MPs and developed a harsh opinion of the interrogator, calling him immature and "driven by ego," according to the report.

Al-Arian Attorney Bumps Prosecutor During Break (TAMPTRIB)

By MICHAEL FECHTER

Tampa Tribune, September 14, 2005

TAMPA A defense attorney for Sami Al-Arian bumped a federal prosecutor and challenged an FBI agent during a break Tuesday morning, saying the government was cheating in prosecuting the terror- support case that could send the defendants to prison for life.

It happened during a morning break with both the judge and jury already out of the courtroom. An Israeli interior ministry official was testifying about birth and other family records involving four men who carried out a 1992 attack against Israeli soldiers. Al-Arian later sent the families of the four men nearly $2,000 each.

But the official only had Hebrew documents and no translations were provided. Defense attorney William Moffitt wanted to spend the break going over the documents with the witness. Federal prosecutor Cherie Krigsman told Moffitt she wanted someone else in the room to observe the questioning.

That set Moffitt off. Prosecutors should have provided translations he said, throwing the documents onto the defense table. He then bumped Krigsman and hollered ``This is business. You're trying to put a guy in jail for life."

The confrontation seemed to catch the other lawyers and U.S. Marshals in the courtroom off guard. FBI case agent Kerry Myers got in between Moffitt and Krigsman, telling Moffitt to leave Krigsman alone because ``she's a female."

Moffitt challenged the agent. ``Get in my face one more time," he said.

In the end, Moffitt did meet with the witness. Then he chose not to cross examine him.

Later, he said the issue was part of a pattern of unfair behavior by prosecutors.

``They hand me a Hebrew document. I have no translation," Moffitt said. ``I'm expected to make a decision about cross examination. This is typical of the way things have happened and I finally got fed up with it."

Hayats Seek Bail With $1.2 Million Worth Of Property (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News Sentinel, September 14, 2005

A Lodi father and son arrested in a terror investigation have secured more than $1.2 million worth of property and hope it's enough to be released from jail while they await trial.

In federal court documents filed Monday night, attorneys for Umer and Hamid Hayat said four homes belonging to the Hayats and their relatives are available to secure bond.

The father and son are currently jailed without bail, and the latest matter will be addressed in court Monday in Sacramento. Prosecutors did not return calls seeking comment today.

Defense attorneys Johnny Griffin III and Wazhma Mojaddidi have been working to secure the property for three weeks, since a U.S. Eastern District Court judge declined to reopen the issue of bail. However, at that same Aug. 23 hearing, Magistrate Judge Dale A. Drozd ruled that the Hayats cannot be held as dangers to the community, and said bail could still be an option.

Umer Hayat, 47, and Hamid Hayat, who turned 23 Saturday, have been held in the Sacramento County Jail for three months, charged with lying to FBI agents about their knowledge of terror training camps.

The younger Hayat is accused of attending such a camp in Pakistan, and his father allegedly knew about it and sent him money. Both have pleaded not guilty to the charges and through their attorneys have denied the allegations.

Additionally, defense attorneys wrote in the motions, the charges have not been corroborated by others and are based on statements made "during stressful, protracted and confusing interview sessions with FBI agents."

Homes Put Up For Hayat's Bail (STOCKREC)

By Jeff Hood, Lodi Bureau Chief

Stockton Record, September 14, 2005

Four homes worth a total of $1.2 million are being pledged to secure the release of a Lodi father and son held since June on federal charges they lied about their ties to terrorists.

Attorneys for Hamid Hayat, 22, and Umer Hayat, 47, filed papers late Monday requesting a new bail hearing. The hearing is tentatively scheduled for Monday in federal court in Sacramento.

The attorneys, Johnny Griffin III and Wazhma Mojaddidi, state in their filings that circumstances have changed since the Hayats were initially denied bail, a condition required for a new bail hearing. They cite a judge's finding on Aug. 23 that the suspects do not pose a danger to the community and the value of property pledged for their release.

The value of the properties, all in Lodi, was established by real-estate appraisers Marcia Wallace-Spaletta of Stockton and Roula Adalat of Fremont. Each appraised two homes, completing reports of 15 to 21 pages, that were attached to the court papers.

According to Monday's filing, the homes are:

n• The Hayats' home at 302 E. Acacia St., which FBI agents searched June 6. Monday's filing claims it is owned by both Hayats and Umer Hayat's brother. Two houses are on the lot. Appraised value: $390,000 with no outstanding debt.

A home belonging to Umer Hayat's brother at 333 E. Acacia St., owned outright with an appraised value of $243,000.

A home at 118 E. Oak St., belonging to a distant relative of the Hayats and worth $370,000 with a $40,000 loan outstanding.

Mojaddidi said the Hayats' relatives met to decide who would pledge their homes as collateral.

"This is an extraordinarily high amount," Mojaddidi said of the $1,213,000 worth of property pledged. "We feel good about it because they're not a danger to the community. The judge told us if we came up with more property, he would consider that a new fact to reopen. Considering that, and if you come up with other conditions, there's no way they're going anywhere."

Federal prosecutors Robert Tice-Raskin and Stephen Lapham could not be reached for comment Monday evening.

Magistrate Judge Dale Drozd previously stated he considered the Hayats to be extreme flight risks in denying a previous request for a new bail hearing.

Hamid Hayat, charged with two counts of lying to federal agents for denying his alleged participation in terrorist training camps in 2003 and 2004 in Pakistan, faces up to 16 years in federal prison. His father faces up to eight years in prison for allegedly lying to agents when he denied knowing about his son's activities.

Monday's filings states that the government has no evidence against the Hayats other than their "unreliable statements," that they have strong ties to the community and that the law entitles them to bail.

Magistrate Judge Gregory G. Hollows is scheduled to hear the motion for bail. Mojaddidi said if the judge is willing to allow only one man free on the property bond, the attorneys would request Umer Hayat's release.

Prosecution, Defense Wrangle Over Terrorism Talk At Money-transmitting Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Michael Weissenstein, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2005

NEW YORK -- A Yemeni immigrant ice cream shop owner accused of illegally funneling $21.9 million overseas successfully fought to keep prosecutors from introducing evidence allegedly linking him to terrorist groups as his trial began Tuesday.

Abad Elfgeeh, 50, stands accused of transmitting money around the world without a license from a dozen bank accounts linked to his tiny storefront in Park Slope, Brooklyn. Prosecutors have said his business was used by a Yemeni cleric convicted earlier this year of a scheme to fund al-Qaida and the Palestinian militant group Hamas.

But prosecutors cannot raise the topic of terrorism at Elfgeeh's trial unless the defense does first because they did not have enough evidence to charge Elfgeeh with a terrorism-related crime.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Pamela Chen made her first attempt to bring up terrorism after an opening statement by defense attorney Frank Hancock, who called Elfgeeh a law-abiding citizen who sent money overseas for Yemeni immigrants innocently seeking to support their families and invest in their native country.

After the jury left the courtroom, Chen asked U.S. District Judge Sterling Johnson Jr. to let her refute Hancock's claims by introducing what she called suspicious checks confiscated from Elfgeeh, some bearing the words "jihad" and "mujahidin." Others were made out to the Yemen-based Charitable Society for Social Welfare, which the FBI has described as a terrorist front group.

Johnson rejected her request but is expected to revisit the issue as the trial moves forward.

Elfgeeh first came to the attention of FBI anti-terrorist agents as they investigated Sheik Mohammed Ali Hassan Al-Moayad, whom they eventually accused of funneling money from the United States to al-Qaida and Hamas. Al-Moayad was convicted of supporting and conspiring to support terrorism and sentenced to 75 years in prison in July.

Witnesses at al-Moayad's trial said he kept Elfgeeh's number in his phone book and called Elfgeeh someone he trusted to transfer money from the United States to Yemen.

Both sides dealt strictly with the unlicensed money-transferring charge in their opening statements Tuesday morning in federal court in Brooklyn. Prosecutors portrayed Elfgeeh as the mastermind of a complicated arrangement of "feeder accounts" and international transfers designed to hide the massive outflow of cash from his Carnival French Ice Cream store.

"You will see evidence about the great lengths to which Abad Elfgeeh went to conceal his business," Chen said. "By all appearances Carnival seemed like any other convenience store."

Defense attorneys called Elfgeeh a pillar of Brooklyn's Yemeni immigrant community who broke no law because he ran a nonprofit community service rather than a moneymaking business that required a license.

The money that went overseas came from hardworking immigrants looking to buy homes, purchase business equipment and support their families, Hancock told the jury.

"What Mr. Elfgeeh did here is what every other immigrant community in the United States does," he said.

Hundreds Closely Watched In Terror Threat, Britain Told (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

LONDON, Sept. 13 - Hundreds of potential terrorists in Britain are being "closely surveyed" by the security services, part of a battle with no obvious end in sight, the home secretary said Tuesday.

"I would not like to put a time period on it," the secretary, Charles Clarke, said of how long Britain might remain a possible target of terrorist attacks. "The fact is that we have what I would call a nihilist terrorist threat, something that will only be beaten by demonstrating it cannot succeed."

Mr. Clarke was testifying before a special parliamentary committee investigating the government's handling of the July 7 suicide bombings on three subways and a bus in London, which killed 56 people, including the four bombers. But in broad remarks on a wide range of topics, neither he nor Sir Ian Blair, commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, offered much in the way of specifics about the actual government response, or about the threats that the country still faces.

Mr. Clarke said he was examining ways that the authorities could do better in the event of another attack. But he praised the response of the emergency services to the July 7 bombings as "absolutely outstanding."

Asked about reports that the official terrorism threat level had been lowered from "severe general" to "substantial" about two months before the bombings, Mr. Clarke said intelligence was an effort to understand generally a situation, rather than knowing "what was out there." In contrast to the United States, Britain does not make public its conclusions about the relative threat levels from terrorism. A spokeswoman for the Home Office said she would not reveal what the current level was or comment on whether it had recently changed.

Mr. Clarke said the police had stepped up security considerably since July 7, spending some $110 million extra in overtime and diversion of existing resources into the antiterrorism effort.

In his testimony, Sir Ian reiterated that the police were "extremely sorry" about the death of Jean Charles de Menezes, a Brazilian electrician who on July 22 was shot repeatedly in the head in the London Underground by police officers who had mistaken him for a terror suspect. The shooting took place the day after four more bombs were set but failed to go off in London.

Sir Ian said the police had reviewed their so-called shoot-to-kill policy since the death of Mr. de Menezes, but had not changed it substantially. The incident is still being investigated by an independent panel; leaks of its early findings seem to indicate that the police and the security services made a series of errors that day that led to the death.

"We made a small number of administrative changes," Sir Ian told the committee, "but the essential thrust of the tactics remains the same." He added that "we now have to find a process for debating these issues without necessarily revealing the absolute details of the tactics, which would be extremely unhelpful."

Sir Ian said it was important that police tactics reflect the new reality of Britain since July 7, the first time suicide attacks have been carried out here. "There is no question that a suicide bomber, deadly and determined, who is intent on murder, is perhaps the highest level of threat that we face, and we must have an option to deal with it," he said.

Hundreds Of Suspects Are Being Watched (WT)

By Paul Martin

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

LONDON -- British officials said yesterday they have put hundreds of suspects under surveillance since the two bombing attacks in July.

"There are certainly hundreds of individuals we continue to watch very closely, who we believe need to be very closely surveilled because of the threat they offer," British Home Secretary Charles Clarke said on the opening day of a parliamentary investigation.

Mr. Clarke explained that, although these suspects posed a "threat," they were not necessarily actively plotting more terrorist attacks.

The July 7 bombings of London's transport system killed 52 persons, plus the four suicide bombers. Bombs failed to detonate in a similar attack two weeks later.

Mr. Clarke also said he had imposed a "control order" on a Briton for the first time.

The special security measure effectively places a person under house arrest, but until now, it has only been used against foreign suspects.

Listening to the evidence at the parliamentary committee were relatives of Brazilian electrician Jean Charles de Menezes, who was fatally shot by British police who thought he was a suicide bomber.

London police Commissioner Ian Blair again apologized for the mistaken shooting, but reaffirmed his determination to continue a policy of "shoot to kill" when police think a terrorist suspect could be about to detonate an explosive.

Three of Mr. de Menezes' cousins attended the session, and Mr. Blair offered to speak to them afterward to apologize personally.

Britain has announced that it will ban foreign supporters of terrorism from entering Britain and will expel "preachers of hate" and others who glorify or excuse terrorists.

Under European human rights legislation, incorporated into British law, terrorist suspects cannot be extradited or expelled to countries where there is a danger they will be tortured or abused or subjected to a death penalty.

Britain has signed a number of bilateral agreements with some Muslim nations in an attempt to prevent extradited suspects from being tortured or executed.

Human rights groups, including Amnesty International, say these agreements -- the first of which was with Jordan -- are not worth the paper they are written on .

In a related development, Italy's highest court yesterday upheld the extradition to Britain of Hamdi Issac, a suspect in the failed July 21 London bombings.

PATRIOT ACT:

Agencies Had Way Before Legislation Was Born (HDR)

By Sajid Farooq, STAFF WRITER

Hayward (CA) Daily Review, September 14, 2005

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the last day of a three-day series looking at the impact and controversy over the Patriot Act and its second revision that awaits President Bush's signature. The series began Sunday.

Poet Amir Sulaiman was on a professional high after his taped performance aired across the country on HBO's "Def Poetry Jam" in February 2004. He had performed a piece titled "Dangerous," a poem he describes as passionate and intense.

But just six days after his performance first aired, the 26-year-old African-American father of three had FBI agents waiting to question him at his mother-in-law's house in SanFrancisco.

"I'm not sure," he said about the FBI knocking on his in-law's door soon after his HBO performance. "The reason the two (events) are connected is six days after the show aired, they knocked on my mother-in-law's door. ... It was a bizarre, almost surreal, phone call that the FBI was waiting for me."

While they waited, FBI agents asked Sulaiman's brother-in-law why his poetry was "anti-American." That's a charge he denies, saying his ancestors help build America and he never once mentions America on his album, but instead tackles issues such as poverty, oppression and tyranny.

The day after the FBI visited Sulaiman, he also found out, while trying to board an airplane, that his name had been added to the "no-fly list," subjecting him to extra security before he could board. He was never charged with a crime or given a reason why his name was added to the list or why he was visited by the FBI.

Contrary to popular belief, both of Sulaiman's experiences had nothing to do with the controversial USA PATRIOT Act, passed by Congress days after the Sept. 11 attacks to give law enforcement more power to investigate potential terrorists.

Since its passage, there have been a lot of myths attached with the Patriot Act's supposed power, from immigrant roundups post 9/11 to the creation of the "no-fly" list. Some of the powers associated with the act are more of a general sense of heightened security by law enforcement agencies than any single bill.

The "no-fly" list, for example, was initiated before the Patriot Act was passed in 2001 —created by a Federal Aviation Administration-issued security directive in 1996. But, still the origin of the no-fly list is mired in secrecy and some confusion. Some security experts have been left scratching their heads when asked when or where exactly the list originated, who is on it and what rights innocent passengers have if their names are similar to those on the list.

"The truth is you cannot really do a lot in the situation because you're not going to get on the plane if you don't comply," said Shirin Sinnar, an Equal Justice Works Fellow for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights.

Sinnar has worked on immigrant rights post 9/11, including the no-fly list and other lists such as U.S. Treasury Department's Specially Designated Nationals and Blocked Persons list, which is used by banks and car dealerships, for example, to screen people and organizations before issuing a loan. That list is available for the public on the Treasury Department's Web site.

Another issue thought by some to be associated with the Patriot Act are FBI interviews and roundups. Both again are not tied to any legislation but instead to a heightened sense of security, according to Dorothy Ehrlich, the executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California.

"The government has taken action since 9/11 (and) the heaviest hand has fallen on people from Muslim background and people from 24 other countries targeted," she said.

She said the FBI was also interested in people involved with the Tablighi Jamat, an Islamic movement founded in India, which encourages members to participate in evangelical efforts across the world. All of the initial interviews are voluntary, according to Sinnar, though some questioned are not aware of this.

"They don't even need legislation to do this because they are asking people to do this," she said. "There are definitely some patterns from the questioning. ... Some stuff has been 'what do you think of Iraq? Do you think we should go in there?'"

After following a lead, the FBI conducts an interview and then creates a web connecting people for more potential interviews.

Even within the powers granted under the Patriot Act, the FBI says there is misinformation.

"I think people need to understand what we can't do," said Special Agent LaRae Quay of the FBI's San Francisco bureau.

One of the more talked about measures of the act is Section 215, which gives agents the ability to access library, medical and financial records.

Civil libertarians have argued the act does not require the proper checks and balances for federal authorities to access records.

Quay, however, said a federal judge still has to approve an FBI agent's request to obtain records or set up a roving wire tap just like before the Patriot Act was passed. And judges still have the authority to deny a request, though, Quay admitted it is rare.

"They (judges) absolutely can say no," Quay said. "Let me tell you the reality. Rarely does a judge say no. You want to know why? Because of all the checks and balances that exist."

For instance, the ability to search library records was available to law enforcement before passage of the Patriot Act.

Jackie Griffin, the director of library services for the Berkeley Public Library, said her library has been served with court orders for book records not involving terrorism cases. She said the library has been served with subpoenas involving two parents getting divorced and one trying to prove the other is an unfit parent based on what books they checked out for their children.

Still, some of the controversy over powers under the act is more of different opinions than myths. There is the sneak-and-peek provision, which gives FBI agents the ability to secretly search through a suspect's house without giving notice. The ACLU says the measure is unfair while the FBI says it is necessary for national security.

"The idea that you have no chance to say you're innocent and they had the wrong address," Ehrlich said.

"Again very controversial," Quay said. "We've been doing this for decades for criminal investigations. You delay the notice of your presence to the person. If you have left a note behind saying 'good afternoon Mr. bin Laden. We were here,' that might hurt the investigation because they might leave or destroy evidence."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

F.A.A. Alerted On Qaeda In '98, 9/11 Panel Said (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - American aviation officials were warned as early as 1998 that Al Qaeda could "seek to hijack a commercial jet and slam it into a U.S. landmark," according to previously secret portions of a report prepared last year by the Sept. 11 commission. The officials also realized months before the Sept. 11 attacks that two of the three airports used in the hijackings had suffered repeated security lapses.

Federal Aviation Administration officials were also warned in 2001 in a report prepared for the agency that airport screeners' ability to detect possible weapons had "declined significantly" in recent years, but little was done to remedy the problem, the Sept. 11 commission found.

The White House and many members of the commission, which has completed its official work, have been battling for more than a year over the release of the commission's report on aviation failures, which was completed in August 2004.

A heavily redacted version was released by the Bush administration in January, but commission members complained that the deleted material contained information critical to the public's understanding of what went wrong on Sept. 11. In response, the administration prepared a new public version of the report, which was posted Tuesday on the National Archives Web site.

While the new version still blacks out numerous references to particular shortcomings in aviation security, it restores dozens of other portions of the report that the administration had been considered too sensitive for public release.

The newly disclosed material follows the basic outline of what was already known about aviation failings, namely that the F.A.A. had ample reason to suspect that Al Qaeda might try to hijack a plane yet did little to deter it. But it also adds significant details about the nature and specificity of aviation warnings over the years, security lapses by the government and the airlines, and turf battles between federal agencies.

Some of the details were in confidential bulletins circulated by the agency to airports and airlines, and some were in its internal reports.

"While we still believe that the entire document could be made available to the public without damaging national security, we welcome this step forward," the former leaders of the commission, Thomas H. Kean and Lee H. Hamilton, said in a joint statement. "The additional detail provided in this version of the monograph will make a further contribution to the public record of the facts and circumstances of the 9/11 attacks established by the final report of the 9/11 commission."

Bush administration officials said they had worked at the commission's request to restore much of the material that had been blacked out in the original report. "Out of an abundance of caution, there are a variety of reasons why the U.S. government would not want to disclose certain security measures and not make them available in the public domain for terrorists to exploit," said Russ Knocke, spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security.

Commission officials said they were perplexed by the administration's original attempts to black out material they said struck them as trivial or mundane.

One previously deleted section showed, for instance, that flights carrying the author Salman Rushdie were subjected to heightened security in the summer of 2001 because of a fatwa of violence against him, while a previously deleted footnote showed that "sewing scissors" would be allowed in the hands of a woman with sewing equipment, but prohibited "in the possession of a man who possessed no other sewing equipment."

Other deletions, however, highlighted more serious security concerns. A footnote that was originally deleted from the report showed that a quarter of the security screeners used in 2001 by Argenbright Security for United Airlines flights at Dulles Airport had not completed required criminal background checks, the commission report said. Another previously deleted footnote, related to the lack of security for cockpit doors, criticized American Airlines for security lapses.

Much of the material now restored in the public version of the commission's report centered on the warnings the F.A.A. received about the threat of hijackings, including 52 intelligence documents in the months before the Sept. 11 attacks that mentioned Al Qaeda or Osama bin Laden.

A 1995 National Intelligence Estimate, a report prepared by intelligence officials, "highlighted the growing domestic threat of terrorist attack, including a risk to civil aviation," the commission found in a blacked-out portion of the report.

And in 1998 and 1999, the commission report said, the F.A.A.'s intelligence unit produced reports about the hijacking threat posed by Al Qaeda, "including the possibility that the terrorist group might try to hijack a commercial jet and slam it into a U.S. landmark."

The unit considered this prospect "unlikely" and a "last resort," with a greater threat of a hijacking overseas, the commission found.

Still, in 2000, the commission said, the F.A.A. warned carriers and airports that while political conditions in the 1990's had made a terrorist seizure of an airliner less likely, "we believe that the situation has changed."

"We assess that the prospect for terrorist hijacking has increased and that U.S. airliners could be targeted in an attempt to obtain the release of indicted or convicted terrorists imprisoned in the United States."

It concluded, however, that such a hijacking was more likely outside the United States.

By September 2001 the F.A.A. was receiving some 200 pieces a day of intelligence from other agencies about possible threats, and it had opened more than 1,200 files to track possible threats, the commission found.

The commission found that F.A.A. officials were repeatedly warned about security lapses before Sept. 11 and, despite their increased concerns about a hijacking, allowed screening performance to decline significantly.

While box cutters like those used by the hijackers were not necessarily a banned item before Sept. 11, some security experts have said that tougher screening and security could have detected the threat the hijackers posed. But screening measures at two of the three airports used by the hijackers - Logan in Boston and Dulles near Washington - were known to be inadequate, the commission found. Reviews at Newark airport also found some security violations, but it was the only one of the three airports used on Sept. 11 that met or exceeded national norms.

Richard Ben-Veniste, a former member of the Sept. 11 commission, said the release of the material more than a year after it was completed underscored the over-classification of federal material. "It's outrageous that it has taken the administration a year since this monograph was submitted for it to be released," he said. "There's no reason it could not have been released earlier."

Updated Version Of 9/11 Report Released (USAT)

USA Today, September 14, 2005

A new version of the 9/11 Commission's report on the four hijacked flights was released Tuesday with recently declassified information about terrorist threats and holes in airport security before the attacks.

At the request of the 9/11 commissioners, the Bush administration declassified much, but not all, of the material it had blacked out before turning the report over to the National Archives in January.

The new version provides fresh details on repeated warnings about al-Qaeda and its desire to attack airlines in the months before Sept. 11. To see the report: www.archives.gov/research/9-11-commission

Ferrer leading in NYC Democratic primary

Fernando Ferrer teetered on the edge of victory over three other Democrats in a primary Tuesday for the chance to run against Republican Mayor Michael Bloomberg. With all precincts reporting, Ferrer was just a few votes shy of 40%, the percentage he needs to avoid a runoff with Rep. Anthony Weiner, who had 29%. Manhattan Borough President C. Virginia Fields got 16%, City Council Speaker Gifford Miller 10%.

Ferrer, a former Bronx borough president, would be the city's first Latino mayor if elected. The primary's outcome may not be known for several days, until every vote is counted, including about 25,000 absentees.

128 Gitmo detainees join hunger strike

Almost 25% of detainees at the military's Guantanamo base in Cuba are on a hunger strike to protest their indefinite detention, and 18 are being force-fed in a hospital, a military spokesman said Tuesday. The hunger strike began Aug. 8, and 128 prisoners have since joined, said Sgt. Justin Behrens, a spokesman for the task force running the prison. “They want to be tried or set free,” Behrens said. He said the number refusing food and water has fluctuated. “Most of the people that started it are off now,” he said.

The prison holds more than 500 terrorism suspects, many captured in Afghanistan. The Bush administration has said the detainees aren't entitled to due process rights.

Woman faces execution today in Texas

Frances Newton, 40, would become the first black woman executed in Texas since the state resumed executions in 1982. Newton says a drug dealer may have been responsible for the killings. Prosecutors told the Associated Press that Newton killed her family for insurance money. In December, Newton came within hours of execution before receiving a reprieve to allow for more ballistics testing.

Authorities: 8 Ohio children kept in cages

Sheriff's deputies in Wakeman, Ohio, have removed 11 disabled children from a home where eight of them slept in cages less than 3 feet high, authorities said.

The children's adoptive and foster parents, Mike and Sharen Gravelle, denied that they'd abused or neglected the children. No charges had been filed.

“The impression that we got was that they felt it was OK,” said sheriff's Lt. Randy Sommers. The Gravelles said a psychiatrist recommended that they make the children sleep in the cages, County Prosecutor Russell Leffler said. Neighbor Jim Power said the kids were well-dressed and well-behaved.

The children, ages 1 to 14, were described as having conditions that included autism and fetal alcohol syndrome. A state investigator found them Friday. They have been put in foster homes.

Remains of Korean War veteran identified

The remains of a Korean War veteran from Pennsylvania who was listed as missing in action nearly 55 years ago have been identified and will be buried Friday. Heintzelman Funeral Home said Army Cpl. Edwin Steigerwalt of Lehighton will be buried with full military honors. Steigerwalt, 22, was last seen Nov. 30, 1950, as his unit fought Chinese forces near Chosin Reservoir in North Korea. His remains were turned over in 1993 and sent to a military lab in Hawaii for DNA analysis. Steigerwalt's remains were identified March 16, said Erika Ruthman of the U.S. Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command. Identification of the war's victims has been difficult because North Korea commingled many of the remains it returned in the 1990s.

Revised Sept. 11 Panel Report Released (AP)

By LESLIE MILLER

AP, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON - A new version of the Sept. 11 commission's report on the four hijacked flights was released Tuesday with recently declassified information about terrorist threats and holes in airport security before the attacks.

At the request of the Sept. 11 commissioners, the Bush administration declassified much, but not all, of the material it had blacked out before turning the report over to the National Archives in January.

The new version provides fresh details on the repeated warnings about al-Qaida and its desire to attack airlines in the months before Sept. 11, 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0005191

For example, on page 61 a previously classified section shows that the Federal Aviation Administration's intelligence unit received "nearly 200 pieces of threat-related information daily from U.S. intelligence agencies, particularly the FBI, CIA, and State Department."

Also unclassified was the conclusion that the domestic aviation system had, since 1996, "operated at a security level that was, in effect, a permanent code orange."

The new report revealed that the civil aviation system was under under "Aviation Security Alert Level III" on Sept. 11, which meant that screeners were supposed to hand wand or pat down suspicious passengers - but only those who had checked their baggage.

Other details about security gaps before the attacks were also disclosed in the revised report. It described, for example, a report for the FAA in 2001 that showed "both carry-on and metal detection screening performance has declined significantly from 1999-2000."

Airport security has been tightened since then.

Many details were revealed in the original report about what happened on the four airplanes, but at least one detail was classified and then declassified: a knife concealed in a cigarette lighter was found at the crash site of United Flight 93, the one that crashed in Pennsylvania.

Former commission chairman Thomas Kean and former vice chairman Lee Hamilton said in a statement that they appreciated the Bush administration's making the information public.

"While we still believe that the entire document could be made available to the public without damaging national security, we welcome this step forward," they said.

The Bush administration has been criticized for its secrecy. Government watchdog groups this month said that federal agencies spent a record $148 last year creating and storing new secrets for each $1 spent declassifying old secrets.

King, Weldon Make Last-minute Push (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 14, 2005

Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.), the leading candidate to take the helm of the Homeland Security Committee, expressed confidence late yesterday that his candidacy will prevail when the GOP Steering Committee meets today to decide the race.

“If I were a betting man, I’d bet on me,” he said. “But I’ve been in politics long enough to know that I could be calling you Thursday morning having to explain what went wrong,” King told The Hill.

Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), who is the current vice chairman of the panel, has campaigned hard for the gavel and continued to search for votes yesterday. He argued that he is the better choice because he has developed expertise and credibility on homeland-security issues.

“The leadership has to make a choice,” he said. “If the choice is based on what state you’re from, I can’t help that, or if it’s [based on] the credibility of issues, that is who I am and what I’m about.”

Weldon told The Hill that he promised Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) that he “would not go out and run a race. I’m not running a geographical race.” He added that some of his colleagues, as well as Joe Allbaugh and James Lee Witt, former directors of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) for Presidents Bush and Clinton, encouraged him to run.

As a New Yorker who personally knew many victims of the Sept. 11 attacks, basic geography may be King’s biggest asset. Republican Reps. John McHugh and Tom Reynolds, both powerful upstate New Yorkers, are King’s biggest supporters on the Steering Committee, he said, and that can only boost his candidacy.

Other candidates for the post include Reps. John Linder (Ga.), Dan Lungren (Calif.) and Don Young (Alaska). Rep. Mac Thornberry (Texas) has been mentioned as a candidate, but he has not returned calls to confirm his candidacy.

The 33-member steering panel will meet this afternoon in the Capitol’s basement to listen to the candidates’ 30-minute presentations. A vote is expected afterward.

Weldon holds a seat on the Steering Committee, representing the mid-Atlantic region. Another lawmaker of his choosing will vote in his place.

A senior House Republican aide said that a memorandum — first reported by The Hill and circulated yesterday — that highlighted King’s past criticism of the Republican Party would not hurt him. But any opposition within the GOP conference to his candidacy could hurt his ability to pass tough legislation on the committee and on the floor if he is chosen chairman.

“He has been much more supportive than most lately,” a GOP aide said of King.

Despite Weldon’s insistence that he’s running a low-key race, he spent yesterday continuing to explain to Steering Committee members how he would run the homeland-security panel. He also said he would circulate a classified memorandum at today's meeting that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld wrote for his top aides citing Weldon's work on the threat of an electromagnetic-pulse bomb, which threatens computer networks.

Hurricane Katrina is also set to play a role in the decision. King said the first thing he would do as chairman is put together a field trip to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast region; Weldon traveled to Louisiana on Sept. 2 to deliver relief supplies donated from private defense and medical companies.

Linder, chairman of the Prevention of Nuclear and Biological Attacks Subcommittee, has met twice with the now-embattled Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff since he was appointed earlier this year, expressing support for the secretary, who since has lost face in the wake of the department's widely panned response to Katrina.

"He is smart, he is tough and he is a great choice," Linder said in the letter. "He is facing bureaucratic foot-dragging."

"Katrina placed an exclamation point on that!" Linder wrote. "He needs our help."

The Steering Committee's decision could hinge on the lawmakers' reputations from their work on foreign-policy issues in which both lawmakers bucked conventional wisdom and the establishment's position.

But Weldon also has taken on the CIA and Pentagon. He wrote Countdown to Terror: The Top-Secret Information that Could Prevent the Next Terrorist Attack on America and How the CIA has Ignored It, which was published this year and ridiculed in some foreign-policy circles.

Weldon also has alleged that analysts working for a Pentagon program called "Able Danger" had identified Mohammed Atta and three other hijackers in 1999 but that Pentagon lawyers did not share the information with the FBI. The Pentagon has disputed the allegations.

Whatever the outcome in the contest for the Homeland Security chairmanship, Weldon is scheduled to testify at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing next week in which he said a witness will testify that he was ordered to destroy thousands of pages of computer data relating to Atta and that the person will state who gave him the order to destroy that information.

For his part, King, an Irish-American, has been intimately involved in the Northern Ireland peace process and was closely associated with the cause of Irish nationalism and the Irish Republican Army's (IRA) political arm, Sinn Fein. In 1986, he welcomed home a convicted IRA gunrunner who had been released from federal prison. King was an early and aggressive advocate of trying to persuade former President Bill Clinton to grant Gerry Adams, a Sinn Fein leader, entry into the United States. Clinton granted him a visa in 1994.

King said his involvement with the IRA is "something that could be easily taken out of context" and that his friends in Congress thought it is something he should think about as he ran for chairman. But King said nobody on the Steering Committee has raised it as an issue.

"I've been very instrumental to bringing about a peaceful resolution. …" he said "Whenever the IRA deviated, I was the first one to criticize them."

"There are some people who are not happy with me," he added, referring to his call in March for the former terrorist group to disband.

Federal Experts To Assess Security At Indian Point (NYT)

By Lisa W. Foderaro

WHITE PLAINS, Sept. 13 - The United States Department of Homeland Security on Tuesday began a top-to-bottom review of emergency preparedness and security at the Indian Point nuclear plant in Westchester County. The review is part of a sweeping initiative by the federal government to assess the vulnerability of the nation's infrastructure.

A dozen experts from several federal agencies, including the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the F.B.I. and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, converged on Indian Point's two reactors, in Buchanan, N.Y., to conduct a three-day inspection. The team started its review of security and emergency plans for Indian Point last week in Washington, according to Kirk Whitworth, a spokesman for Homeland Security.

The officials will identify gaps in those areas and suggest improvements in a report to be issued next week, Mr. Whitworth said. The report will not be made public, but it will be shared with local law enforcement officials and the plant's owner, Entergy Nuclear Northeast.

As the agencies were working in private on the plant's grounds, across the Hudson River in Rockland County an environmental group that has called for Indian Point's closing was staging a flashy protest.

The environmental group, Riverkeeper, like other critics of the plant, argues that it would be impossible to evacuate the more than 300,000 people who live within 10 miles of the plant, which is 35 miles north of Midtown Manhattan. Opponents also criticize what they call a lack of security at the plant. They are concerned, for example, that planes are allowed within 1,000 feet of the reactors and boats within 500 feet of the shore.

To illustrate those points, a Riverkeeper boat bearing a large banner of a yellow "sitting duck" motored back and forth while a plane flew overhead dragging a sign that read, "FEMA: Late to Katrina, Lying to New York." The crafts were well outside the boundaries, but a law enforcement boat and helicopter tailed them for a time nonetheless.

Alex Matthiessen, Riverkeeper's president, called the response "a farcical show of force to give the impression that they are actually protecting the plant." He said that the group's own boat passed by the plant about 100 times a year, and the group had concluded that the security is "very, very minimal."

But Mr. Whitworth countered Riverkeeper's challenge, saying that the point of the review was to improve communication between the federal, state and local agencies that would be responsible for dealing with an accident at the plant. "We believe that this coordination is going to enhance security and emergency response at Indian Point," he said.

In the next 18 months, federal agencies will conduct similar reviews of all the nuclear power plants in the country. The reviews started in May, with Indian Point the eighth of more than 70 to be assessed. The Department of Homeland Security, which was created after the Sept. 11 terror attacks, will also investigate the security at chemical plants, liquid-natural-gas facilities and transportation networks, Mr. Whitworth said.

Mr. Matthiessen said that the federal government's handling of the Hurricane Katrina disaster did not augur well for a nuclear accident or a terrorist attack at Indian Point. "FEMA's gross incompetence has been on full display during the tragic events down in New Orleans," he said. "And that was a natural disaster for which we had several days' warning."

He urged the federal government to withdraw its approval of the emergency plan for Indian Point, and for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to revoke Indian Point's license. The emergency plan was approved two years ago despite the protests of local officials and after a highly critical study commissioned by Gov. George E. Pataki by James Lee Witt, a consultant and former FEMA director.

Guess What Doesn't Get Screened By Airlines? Diplomatic Pouches. (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON - Despite the intense scrutiny of airline passengers and their bags since 9/11, potentially explosive gaps still exist.

Top among them, for some analysts, are diplomatic bags - the privileged cargo that is given special immunity.

Security experts worry that terrorists could exploit the status of diplomatic pouches, which are protected from being opened or detained in any way by the Vienna Convention of 1961. In the past, rogue countries and individuals have used such bags to transport drugs, arms, and cash - and even to smuggle people. That's because a diplomatic pouch can be a crate big enough to carry a large desk.

Some security experts say it's "only a matter of time" before terrorists aligned with a rogue nation - or a dissatisfied diplomatic employee in a friendly one - find a way to abuse the privilege. To prevent that, a growing number of security experts, along with some diplomatic scholars, are calling for the United States and the international community to revisit the sanctity of diplomatic pouches.

The issue is gaining ground as the International Civil Aviation Organization, which sets global aviation standards and best practices, prepares to review its security guidelines later this month.

"The US needs to take the lead in saying this is a vulnerability that needs to at least be explored," says aviation security analyst Andrew Thomas of the University of Akron in Ohio. "Putting our heads in the sand and acting like it's still 1961 in a post-9/11 environment is just not the way to go."

But advocates of more tabs on diplomatic pouches have found an unlikely opponent - the US government itself. The State Department has consistently opposed screening diplomatic bags. "We support [the Vienna Convention] as it stands," says spokesman Noel Clay. That's because it doesn't want American diplomatic pouches screened when they are used overseas. The department worries such a move could compromise the nation's international intelligence operations, Mr. Clay says.

That view is shared by many in the intelligence and foreign affairs communities. The logic is based on preserving the integrity of the Vienna Convention, says Alfred Rubin, professor emeritus of international law at Tufts University's Fletcher School in Medford, Mass. So, if the US insists on screening another country's diplomatic bags, then the US would be vulnerable to the same treatment.

"Then American diplomatic pouches can presumably be examined and X-rayed or opened by our Latin American and African neighbors, and America doesn't want that," says Professor Rubin. "But I do think we have to explore the options."

Advocates of diplomatic bag screening contend there are ways to protect diplomatic protocol and at the same time increase aviation security. For instance, countries could ferry sensitive documents and technology on their own military aircraft.

"Because of the historical record of state sponsorship of and complicity with terrorism, it's certainly something that should be discussed, especially when it comes to nonintrusive means of checking," says Prof. Robert Lieber of Georgetown University in Washington.

Since 9/11, the Canadian government has implemented a policy that allows it to request examination of a diplomatic pouch if it has reason to believe the contents are suspect. "If the process is unsuccessful, [they can] deny transportation of the bag," e-mailed Vanessa Vermette of Transport Canada in response to a question.

Asked if the US has a similar policy in place, Clay of the State Department did not answer directly with a yes or no. "Diplomatic pouches are inviolable under international accords," he says. "We expect that host countries will obey the uses of the diplomatic pouch and institute reasonable precautions to ensure they're used only as intended."

But there is a long history of diplomatic pouches not being used as intended. For instance, in 1984, British authorities found a former Nigerian government minister who'd been abducted and drugged in a large diplomatic crate bound for Nigeria from the Stansted Airport. Also in the crate was a man who was conscious and equipped with drugs and syringes, according to the the July 1985 issue of The American Journal of International Law. Three people were arrested and charged, one of whom claimed diplomatic immunity.

When asked recently if the issue of diplomatic bag screening should be revisited, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff demurred. "There's a lot of law and custom and treaty obligations with respect to this matter," he said at a Monitor breakfast. "We do want to be mindful of all kinds of threats, but we want to operate within the treaty obligations we have."

Technology, Barriers Have Made The Capitol Safer, Officials Say (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, September 14, 2005

For the second time this week, outside mail was halted yesterday because of a power outage at the House off-site mail facility, but recent improvements to mail security allowed interoffice mail and newspapers to continue to circulate. This is just one small example of the numerous security upgrades that have occurred on Capitol Hill since the Sept. 11 attacks.

During the past four years, Congress has taken several steps to make the institution and its business less vulnerable to a terrorist attack. The steps include passing legislation providing for continued congressional operations should a significant number of members be killed or incapacitated in an attack. Congress also has established several off-site data centers that store important information should offices be destroyed and has implemented technology that immediately informs members of an emergency situation. Barriers such as bollards and concrete blocks also have been erected to enhance the security of the Capitol campus.

“Before 9-11, we were prepared for some type of bomb or a shooting,” said House Administration Committee Chairman Robert Ney (R-Ohio). “After airplanes were used as bombs and anthrax was introduced into the building, literally the next day we started to think outside the box.”

Ney credited Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) for supporting and facilitating many of the dramatic changes in security but stressed that ensuring the safety of the campus has been a bipartisan effort.

The Alternate Computing Facility, designed to handle some of the House and Senate data and communications in the event of a catastrophe, is just one of the security centers built after Sept. 11.

In a House Administration Committee hearing June 9, James Eagan, Congress’s chief administration officer, described the facility as a “warm failover site for the House’s Ford Data Center” that handles a number of Congress’s administrative functions and provides redundant systems for e-mail and websites. The facility also backs up capabilities to support “member, committee and institutional-support offices.”

Senate Sergeant at Arms Bill Pickle told The Hill in June that the facility is a backup for some of the House and Senate entities.

“It protects against the loss of data and is similar to the alternative computing facilities of major corporations,” he said.

Eagen also provided an inventory of emergency-related steps. The House, he said, had e-mail, pagers and 6,000 BlackBerry communication devices in circulation with the capacity to receive notifications through the House Alert Capability system. Emergency notification devices have been placed in each congressional office to warn the staff and visitors about potential dangers when they occur.

A digital mail system, which allows first-class mail to be delivered in electronic form, was piloted in 2002 to reduce the House’s vulnerability through the mail in response to the anthrax attacks in 2001. The program began with 30 House offices and is expected to expand to 75 offices by the end of November, according to Ney.

Ney touted the Capitol Visitor Center, or CVC, which is estimated to be completed in the fall of 2006, as a "tremendous addition and enhancement to security." The CVC received $38.5 million in additional funding to improve security inside the facility after Sept. 11.

The passage of the Continuity in Representation Act has been one of the most publicized security changes in the past few months. The provision, which was attached to the 2006 legislative-branch appropriations bill at the request of leadership, provides the House with a plan should 100 members die or be incapacitated during a catastrophic event. The bill stipulates that special elections for new members must occur within 49 days after the Speaker announces the vacancies.

Hurricane Katrina tested the operations of the House Recovery Operations Center (H-ROC), a 24-hour emergency communication center that aides in continuity of government. The system, which was created to ensure that congressional offices can remain running in the event of a disaster, helped Rep. Gene Taylor (D-Miss.) set up operations despite the destruction of his district office in the storm.

The Senate has implemented a similar program through the its sergeant at arms and the U.S. General Services Administration to replace temporarily offices lost by senators in Mississippi and Louisiana, according to Susan Irby, a spokeswoman for the Senate Rules and Administration Committee.

The Senate has also implemented a host of new procedures since Sept. 11.

In conjunction with the Senate sergeant at arms and the Rules and Administration Committee, the Office of Security and Emergency Preparedness was established, evacuation drills of all buildings have been conducted quarterly, quick masks (lightweight protective masks designed for people to don while they are evacuating buildings) have been distributed to all offices and continuity-of-operations plans have been established within each office.

"Disaster-assistance plans are constantly being discussed and improved," Irby said. "This is always an ongoing operation."

The Senate sergeant at arms declined to comment for this report.

The Capitol Police also have played a major role in testing the security procedures since Sept. 11. In addition to providing a more physical presence of safety on campus, the Capitol police have undergone additional training in order to effectively and safely evacuate staff and visitors in the event of an emergency.

"The Capitol Police Department is continually working with the Senate and House sergeant at arms on improving security for the Capitol complex," said a Capitol Police spokesman. "Truck interdiction, mail screening, prohibited items, and other security measures are all integrated to maximize overall effectiveness. These security improvements are necessary so that Congress can continue to operate in an open and safe environment."

Ney said technology is playing a vital part in improving security on the Hill.

"It is a constantly evolving process," he said.

A Clear Risk To The City (WP)

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

The Bush administration, pertinent congressional committees and the D.C. government are all aware of a study showing that an attack on a single railroad tank car of chlorine traveling through a crowded nation's capital could:

It is also true that while the D.C. government has enacted a law to deal with the issue, the federal government has taken no serious steps to prevent chemicals that are toxic if inhaled from being shipped through the District. What's more, the Justice Department and CSX Transportation Inc., rather than supporting D.C. legislation that sought to regulate the transport of ultra-hazardous materials through the city, instead obtained a court order to stop the District from enforcing its law.

As a result of federal opposition to local efforts, an undisputed risk to life and safety in the Washington region is unabated. Credit D.C. Council member Kathy Patterson (D-Ward 3) with bringing this danger to the public's attention and for marshaling legislative support on the council for a solution -- "to reduce the risk of an attack by removing the target from our midst," as she told the Department of Homeland Security in a letter yesterday. Again, Mrs. Patterson was putting her finger on the problem.

Mrs. Patterson was responding to a proposed Department of Homeland Security rail security plan that aims to protect city residents by installing surveillance cameras along seven miles of CSX Transportation tracks. She noted that the cameras "would, surely, provide historical documentation of what vehicle or what individuals gained sufficient proximity to the CSX tracks to blow up a 90-ton tanker full of chlorine -- after the fact of thousands of deaths." She rightly notes that the Homeland Security plan would not prevent a suicide bomber from accessing the tracks. It would only record the bomber doing the dastardly deed. Hooray.

Residents, visitors, members of Congress and the Supreme Court deserve better. They need a federal plan that prevents, rather than simply detects, an attack on the city. On that score, nothing less than rerouting ultra-hazardous materials -- dangerous, toxic-by-inhalation cargo -- around densely populated communities at high risk of attack, such as the nation's capital, will do. Alternative routes for such chemicals are needed here in the District and for other high-risk communities around the nation. The difficulty of the challenge is no reason for the federal government to avert its gaze from this potential nightmare. It must either step up to the problem now or try to explain away the poor federal planning for a catastrophe in yet another national disaster's after-action report.

WAR NEWS:

Bomber Hits Baghdad Crowd; At Least 73 Die (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, September 14, 2005

BAGHDAD — At least 73 people were killed early today when a terrorist drove an explosives-filled vehicle into a crowd of laborers waiting for construction work.

The attack came after Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said Tuesday in Washington that Iraq will not set a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops. He said that to do so would send a signal to insurgents that they can weaken the alliance between Iraq and America.

Baghdad police Maj. Musa Abdel Kerim said the suicide bomber drove his vehicle into a crowd of day laborers waiting at Oruba square in the Kazimiyah district. The men had gathered about 6:30 a.m. to wait for work.

Lt. Col. Moayad Zubair said 73 people died and 162 were injured. He said the death toll would probably go up because some of the wounded were unlikely to survive.

Speaking at a White House news conference with President Bush, Talabani held out the option of significant U.S. troop withdrawals by the end of 2006 if Iraqi forces are ready to assume more responsibility for the nation's security. However, he said that would take place only if the United States agreed.

“A timetable will help the terrorists, will encourage them that they could defeat a superpower of the world and Iraqi people,” Talabani said. “We don't want to do anything without the agreement with the Americans because we don't want to give any signal to the terrorists that our will to defeat them is weakened.”

“I pledge we will not waver, and I appreciate your same pledge,” he said. “Iraq will take its place among the world's democracies.”

Talabani thanked “the glorious American people” for liberating his country from “the worst kind of dictatorship” and called Bush a “great statesman.”

“We are proud to say openly and to repeat it that we are partners of the United States of America in fighting against tyranny, terrorism, and for democracy,” Talabani said.

Bush also warned Syria to stop foreign fighters who train there and then cross the border into Iraq. “The Syrian leader must understand that we take his lack of action seriously,” Bush said.

Talabani has sent mixed signals on troop withdrawals. At a news conference with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on Friday, he said Iraq will need some U.S. troops for the long term but that Iraqi security forces can take on the prime responsibility in two years. About 140,000 U.S. troops are in Iraq.

In Iraq on Tuesday, U.S. forces called in airstrikes during a raid on Hadithah in the north. Troops captured a militant with ties to al-Qaeda in Iraq and killed four others, the U.S. Central Command said.

The assault on Hadithah followed a recent offensive to retake Tal Afar, another northern town, which netted more than 400 suspects. The Iraqi military said its troops had detained 36 others, including a Yemeni citizen, just south of Tal Afar.

Bush Threatens Syrian Isolation For Lack Of Action (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

NEW YORK -- President Bush yesterday threatened to further isolate Syria if it does not stanch the flow of killers streaming into Iraq and vowed to press his case at the United Nations today.

DOJ_NMG_0005197

"The Syrian leader must understand we take his lack of action seriously," Mr. Bush said of Syrian President Bashar Assad. "The government is going to become more and more isolated."

The warning came one day after America's ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said "our patience is running out" and refused to rule out military action against Syria.

"The Syrian government can do a lot more to prevent the flow of foreign fighters into Iraq," Mr. Bush said. "These people are coming from Syria into Iraq and killing a lot of innocent people. They're trying to kill our folks, as well."

Mr. Bush made his comments at the White House before leaving for two days of meetings at the United Nations. He was joined in the East Room by Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, who was also on his way to the United Nations.

"President Talabani and I will take our seats at the United Nations in New York," Mr. Bush said. "The session will mark the first time in a half-century that Iraq is represented by a freely elected government."

U.S. and European diplomats said the United States is planning a diplomatic attack on Syria at the United Nations 60th anniversary summit, which begins today. Syrian officials have not been invited to a foreign ministers meeting on Lebanon hosted by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Participants in the Monday ministerial meeting will include Britain, France, the European Union, the World Bank and Lebanon, with the potential addition of Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Russia, diplomats said.

"It's an important meeting to reaffirm support for Lebanon's political and economic reforms," a senior European diplomat said.

Washington's renewed effort to isolate Syria follows repeated U.S. calls for Damascus to stop what the Bush administration says is continued meddling in Lebanon's internal affairs, including a potential role in political assassinations.

Although Syrian troops pulled out of Lebanon in the spring after three decades of de facto occupation, the United States says the Syrian intelligence service is still active in Lebanon.

U.S. and foreign diplomats said Mr. Assad decided against attending the summit, because he wanted to avoid the pressure he expected to encounter in New York.

"I suspect it has more to do with the fact that Syria feels under some pressure from U.N. investigations about its behavior in Lebanon," Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick told the Al Arabiya TV network on Monday.

He referred to a probe into the February assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri led by U.N. investigator Detlev Mehlis.

"In the name of the Iraqi people, I say to you, Mr. President, and to the glorious American people, thank you, thank you," he said. "Thank you because you have liberated us from the worst kind of dictatorship. Our people suffered too much from this worst kind of dictatorship."

Mr. Bush also said he would discuss his "grave concern" over Iran's nuclear ambitions during meetings with world leaders, including a bilateral session yesterday afternoon with Chinese President Hu Jintao.

The Bush administration is making a concerted effort to increase pressure on Iranian officials, who are in New York this week for U.N. meetings.

Mr. Hu acknowledged "frictions" over the U.S. trade imbalance with China, but promised to buy more imports from America. However, he hinted that cooperation would be forthcoming only if the Bush administration refrained from meddling in Taiwan.

"The proper handling of the Taiwan question holds the key to the sound and steady growth of the China-U.S. relationship," Mr. Hu said.

Mr. Bush, for his part, made good on his promise to "bring up human rights" in his meeting with Mr. Hu, said Michael Green, senior director for Asia on the National Security Council. Mr. Green added that the president accepted an invitation from Mr. Hu to visit China for two days in November.

The president's call for Syria to stop the flow of killers across its border came as U.S. forces continued to hunt such foreign fighters in the northern Iraqi city of Tal Afar. The offensive, known as Operation Restore Rights, began two weeks ago and has resulted in the killing or capture of hundreds of terrorists.

Mr. Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, on Monday accused Syria of having training camps for insurgents on its territory.

"A lot of these people are coming in through the airport in Damascus," Mr. Zoellick said about the foreign fighters. "It's not hard to stop people coming through the airport, and that's where they ought to start."

U.S. Will Stick With Iraq Mission, Bush Pledges (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush promised his Iraqi counterpart Tuesday that the United States would persevere in the joint fight against insurgents.

Appearing with President Jalal Talabani during a day of meetings with foreign leaders, Bush pledged that U.S. forces would "stay on the offensive alongside Iraqi security forces." He said they would return home when their mission was over.

Bush also intensified American pressure on Syria, saying that he was working to isolate Damascus because it allowed insurgents to cross its eastern border into Iraq and continued to meddle in the affairs of neighboring Lebanon.

Bush said that during this week's meetings of the United Nations General Assembly, he would be talking to foreign leaders about Syria's actions.

The Syrian government "can do a lot more to prevent the flow of foreign fighters into Iraq," Bush said, adding that Syrian President Bashar Assad "must understand we take his lack of action seriously." Syrian officials say they have made a major effort to police their border.

U.S. officials have been complaining for months but recently stepped up the pressure. On Monday, Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, told reporters that U.S. officials were considering all options in dealing with the problem.

Haim Malka, a fellow in the Middle East Program of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, noted that Assad had canceled his trip to the U.N. gathering after the Americans made clear that he would not be welcome in joint meetings that U.S. officials were planning.

Ethnic and religious factions in Iraq clashed last month over development of a draft constitution that will face an October referendum. Bush on Tuesday praised the draft constitution as a milestone document that protects fundamental freedoms and helps ensure the unity of a diverse nation. Talabani offered a more balanced assessment, acknowledging that the document is not perfect.

Talabani said in a speech in Washington last week that he believed most coalition forces could be out of Iraq by 2007. On Monday, in an interview with the Washington Post, he said the United States might be able to withdraw as many as 50,000 troops by the end of this year.

Bush has refused to talk about timetables, saying it only encourages the insurgents to wait out the U.S. forces. Timetables could also be embarrassing for the president if the troops are not withdrawn by the designated date.

"We will set no timetable for withdrawal, Mr. President," he said. "We hope that by the end of 2006, our security forces are up to the level of taking responsibility from many American troops, with complete agreement from America."

Bush's view of the U.S. military mission in Iraq continues to differ slightly from that of Pentagon officials, who consider it unlikely that U.S. forces will be able to defeat the insurgency. Bush says the U.S. objective is to defeat the insurgents, but American commanders have stressed that Iraqi forces would need to continue the battle after U.S. forces have departed.

The U.S. commander in charge of a campaign underway against insurgents near the Syrian border said that area might continue to serve as a refuge for fighters until Iraqi forces are able to defend it on their own. About 5,000 Iraqi troops are fighting alongside about 3,500 U.S. troops around the insurgent stronghold of Tall Afar.

"Is there enough force here right now to secure this area permanently? No," said Army Col. H.R. McMaster, speaking to Pentagon reporters in a videoconference. "We'll continue to conduct operations in those outlying areas to disrupt [the insurgents'] ability, until we can establish a permanent security capability with police and army."

McMaster said he couldn't predict how long that might take, in part because he expected insurgents to continue their attacks against Iraqi troops and police officers.

"We've got to really make sure that they can withstand the enemy's intimidation," he said.

Calling U.S. Troops `occupation Forces,' Iraqis Seek Timetable For Exit (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

Knight Ridder, September 14, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq - In an attempt to lay the legal groundwork for asking the United States to withdraw its troops, an Iraqi National Assembly committee released a report Tuesday that said the presence of the American military prevents Iraq from becoming fully sovereign.

The 18-member National Sovereignty Committee, made up of legislators chosen in national elections in January, said the only way Iraq could achieve sovereignty was for multinational forces to leave. The report called for setting a timetable for the troops to go home and referred to them as "occupation forces," a first.

The report is the second time in four months that National Assembly members have expressed frustration with the continued American military presence. In June, one-third of the 275 assembly members signed a petition asking the United States to set a timetable for withdrawal.

It wasn't clear what impact the new report would have. Iraqi government officials have said they oppose a U.S. withdrawal or setting a timetable, a position that President Jalal Talabani repeated Tuesday in Washington.

"We will set no timetable for withdrawal. A timetable will help the terrorists," said Talabani, who's a Kurd.

Most of the committee members are members of the Shiite Muslim political coalition that dominated January's parliamentary elections, though it was impossible to know how widespread their view is among government supporters.

Assembly members were silent after Jawad al-Malikit, the committee's chairman and a member of the powerful Shiite United Iraqi Alliance, completed reading the four-page report.

Later, members of the committee said they'd compiled the report to create a legal channel that would make their country independent. "It's normal to ask for our full sovereignty. It should have happened right after the elections because the government is legal," al-Malikit said.

Hassan al-Rubai, another committee member, said he was grateful to the United States for removing Saddam Hussein from power. But he added: "We want the United States to make us feel they came here to liberate us, not occupy us."

The report also asks the United Nations to issue a resolution declaring Iraq a sovereign country and the government to repeal an order enacted by the U.S. Coalition Provisional Authority that gives foreign nationals here immunity from prosecution in Iraqi courts.

It also called for the government to have control over its intelligence operations, palaces and prisons. American forces so far have refused to grant Iraqis access to many intelligence operations, to allow them to occupy several palaces that Saddam built and to let them operate several prisons.

The real measure of the report is how leaders of the Iraqi government, other National Assembly members and the people react to it in the next few days, said Anthony Cordesman, an Iraq analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a national-security research center.

"It's posturing," Cordesman said. "The question is: What kind of clout does the political posture have?"

Indeed, some wondered whether the committee released its findings as a way to reach out to Sunni Muslim Arab leaders. The assembly is seeking to win a national vote next month on a proposed permanent constitution. Many Sunni Arabs, some of whom have said they'll vote down the proposed constitution, have called for a timetable for withdrawing foreign troops.

Still, many were surprised that a committee made up of Shiites and Kurds would call for a timetable.

The United States returned sovereignty to Iraqis in June 2004, when L. Paul Bremer, then the head of the Coalition Provisional Authority, signed a resolution and dissolved the CPA.

But many National Assembly members and average Iraqis have said it's impossible to feel sovereign when troops are running through their streets and foreigners direct the actions of the Defense and Interior ministries.

"This country hasn't had sovereignty since the beginning of the occupation," said Saleh Mutlaq, who was one of the four principal Sunni negotiators in the drafting of Iraq's constitution. "People already know they are not sovereign because the Americans are everywhere. They are in the streets. They are on top of our houses. How can we feel sovereign?"

Committee members said they planned to asked officials of the Defense and Interior ministries when they thought Iraq would be able to defend itself.

75 Killed In Baghdad Blast; Amended Charter Approved (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Wednesday, Sept. 14 -A suicide car bomber killed at least 75 people when it ripped through a gathering of day laborers waiting for work on Wednesday morning in one of Baghdad's largest Shiite districts.

The bomb detonated at 6:50 a.m. at Aruba Square in the Khadamiya district of northern Baghdad, where large numbers of laborers typically gather in the morning in hopes of being hired for the day. Another 162 were wounded by the blast, according to an official with the Interior Ministry.

The attack appeared to be the latest sectarian strike directed against Shiites in Baghdad, who have been repeatedly targeted by Sunni Arab insurgents and terrorists bent on exploiting Sunni-Shiite divisions across Iraq.

On Tuesday, the leaders in the Shiite-dominated National Assembly said they approved a final, modified version of the proposed new constitution. But the charter still does not come close to mollifying Sunni leaders who had hoped to win far broader changes in the document before the Oct. 15 national referendum.

The approval came more than two weeks after the draft was formally presented to Parliament over the objections of some lawmakers.

The revisions are relatively minor, and are not likely to win the support of Sunni Arab leaders who oppose the charter and had hoped to see broader changes on regional autonomy and other issues. The four approved changes touch on water rights, adherence to international treaties, cabinet staffing, and Iraq's Arab identity, a more controversial subject on which the new draft offers a compromise position.

The leaders of the constitutional drafting committee said they had signed off on a final version, as did Hussein al-Shahristani, the acting speaker of the National Assembly and a leader of its Shiite majority. Mr. Shahristani said that he would announce the document's completion at a news conference on Wednesday, and that it would then be given to United Nations officials, who are responsible for printing and distributing it.

But in a measure of the chaos that has surrounded the constitutional process, some committee members said Tuesday afternoon that they were not aware a draft had been agreed on and suggested that more delays could be in store.

Nicholas Haysom, the head of the United Nations constitutional advisory team, said the United Nations would insist that any draft it received have the approval of the full assembly, not just the speaker or the committee that drafted the document.

For weeks, the constitution has been in a perplexing state of uncertainty. Several different versions were circulated after negotiations were said to have ended. Some Iraqi leaders held meetings on amending the charter in hopes of winning over the Sunni Arab opposition, while others insisted that the document was already final and that it would not be changed.

The delays have reduced the time Iraqis will have to study a final draft before they vote on the constitution on Oct. 15. It will take about 10 days to print the five million copies of the 39-page document, a little more than one for every household in Iraq, Mr. Haysom said. That will leave just over three weeks to distribute them, far less than originally envisioned. Nongovernmental groups and schools will assist in the effort, and newspapers and radio and television will help publicize it, he said.

One of the approved changes addresses an objection by the panel's Sunni minority. They were angered by an article describing Iraq as part of the Islamic world without saying it is part of the Arab world. The amended version compromises by stating that Iraq "is a founding member of the Arab League and is committed to its charter."

Mahmoud al-Mashadani, a Sunni member of the constitutional panel, said that was not enough to convince the constitution's opponents, who have sworn to lead a campaign against the document.

"The defense and the prosecution have rested," he said. "The case is now in the hands of the jury."

Under transitional law, the constitution will be defeated if two-thirds of the voters in any 3 of Iraq's 18 provinces vote against it. That would lead to fresh elections for a new temporary national assembly, which would be charged with writing a new constitution.

The revisions do not touch on the most controversial part of the draft constitution, a provision that allows for the creation of largely autonomous regions within Iraq. That section, written at the insistence of Shiite leaders, has ignited fierce opposition from Sunnis and some others, notably the rebellious Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who has hinted that he may lead a campaign against the document, too.

Many Sunnis were also angered by language that banned the symbols and remnants of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party, another provision that is not being changed.

The changes that were made include the addition of language making it clear that the central government is responsible for the distribution of water. Some Kurdish lawmakers, seeking control of water rights on rivers that flow through Iraqi Kurdistan, had resisted the change, but ultimately gave in, several committee members said.

Another change, specifying that the prime minister will have two deputies in the next elected government, was made in response to requests from the Kurds, who believe it will ensure some Kurdish influence over the prime minister's office.

The last change was the deletion of an article stating that Iraq would adhere to any treaties it had signed on international human rights "unless they conflict with the rules and principles of the constitution." The clause was widely seen as an effort to escape the treaties, so the lawmakers chose to drop the article altogether.

In the northern city of Tal Afar on Tuesday, Iraqi forces said they had killed 14 insurgents and captured 35 on the third day of a major offensive aimed at clearing the area of guerrilla fighters, Reuters reported. In western Iraq, American forces struck at insurgents in Haditha, killing four and capturing a militant with ties to Al Qaeda, military officials said.

In Baghdad, gunmen killed a high-ranking Interior Ministry official, Muhammad Kadhum al-Musawi. Elsewhere, an Iraqi police officer was shot to death as he worked on his car, Interior Ministry officials said. Six handcuffed bodies were found in a northern neighborhood.

For Success In Iraq, Change Course (WP)

By Joseph R. Biden Jr.

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

The Bush administration's mishandling of Iraq has brought us to the brink of a national security debacle. To salvage the situation, the administration must fundamentally change course inside Iraq, in the region and at the international level.

Stabilizing Iraq is a political as well as a military challenge. The administration is taking a huge gamble by going forward with a referendum for a constitution that is more likely to divide Iraq than to unite it.

A majority of Sunni Arabs are likely to vote against the constitution, but not the two-thirds needed to defeat it. That will further embitter them.

The consequences for U.S. interests could be devastating. Sectarian violence might escalate into a full-blown civil war, drawing in Syria, Iran and Turkey and turning Iraq into a new Lebanon. Even worse, Iraqi Sunnis could forge stronger alliances with foreign jihadists, turning a swath of Iraq into a pre-Sept. 11 Afghanistan for a new generation of terrorists.

Stranded in the middle of this mayhem would be brave American soldiers, their lives on the line for a failing policy set by others.

The Bush administration's hope seems to be that Sunnis and Iraqi women will "get over it." But hope and stubbornness do not constitute a strategy. As our ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, has said, the constitution should "be a national compact that brings Iraqis together and undermines the insurgency."

Sunni Arabs have themselves to blame for sitting out January's elections and supporting the insurgency. But unless they are offered a reasonable stake in the new order, they will continue to resist it. It would be a mistake to force-feed them a constitution they cannot stomach. There is a better way.

First, if negotiators don't reach reasonable compromises that bring moderate Sunnis on board, the Bush administration should support postponing the constitutional referendum until after elections for a new National Assembly are held in December, which would allow a new committee with elected Sunni members to reconsider the draft.

This would encourage the growing desire among Sunnis to participate in the political process. It would empower legitimate Sunni leaders who can sell the constitution to their community. And it could split the Sunni population from the insurgents and foreign jihadists. Moderate Kurds and Shiites, many of whom privately admit that some of their leaders overreached, will welcome the balance legitimate Sunni representation would bring to the process.

For this policy to work, the administration must do what it has failed to do thus far: involve the major international powers and Iraq's neighbors in a stabilization strategy. The administration should create a contact group with countries such as France, Japan, Britain and Russia, along with organizations such as the European Union, NATO and the United Nations. As constitutional negotiations resumed, the Iraqis would see a united international front and be more likely to make difficult compromises.

The administration must also develop a regional strategy that either forces or induces Iraq's neighbors to act responsibly. In some instances, that would require the administration to engage regimes that the United States would rather not work with. But that's exactly what we did in the Balkans to get to the Dayton peace agreement and with Afghanistan's neighbors in the "six plus two" group and the Bonn conference. Iran, Saudi Arabia and Egypt could help temper the demands of the communities with which they have influence. Tehran and Damascus would be more likely to end their dangerous meddling if they saw the rest of the international community lining up with us. The president should immediately name a senior envoy to the region and organize a regional conference.

The president can build international support for this new policy at the United Nations this month. He should challenge those countries that have as much to lose as we do from chaos in Iraq to join this effort.

At home, President Bush must close the credibility chasm that is threatening the most important weapon our overstretched troops have: the support of the American people. He must convince Americans that he is leveling with them about the situation in Iraq and that he has a coherent strategy for securing our fundamental national interests and bringing our troops home.

To that end, the administration should develop concrete goals for training Iraqi security forces so that they can operate independently, building a political system that enjoys legitimacy and rebuilding basic services -- and establish a reasonable timetable for meeting these goals.

It is no longer acceptable to say that our troops will stay in Iraq "as long as necessary -- and not one day longer." The American people need -- and our troops deserve -- a much clearer picture of the way forward.

Congress must step up to its responsibilities by holding monthly oversight hearings with senior administration witnesses to assess Iraq's progress.

Some will argue that this policy would prolong our presence in Iraq. The opposite is true. Proceeding with an ill-advised referendum, and without a strategy to involve the region and the major powers, could lead to chaos that would take even more time, treasure and casualties to tame -- if it does not prove irreversible and leave Iraq what it was not before the war: a permanent base for radical fundamentalist terrorism.

Successfully involving moderate Sunnis, sharing the burden with the key international players, getting support from the region, setting concrete goals with timelines and insisting on regular accountability from the administration would bring our troops home sooner and safer. It's also the best way to leave Iraq with our most fundamental security interests intact.

By Reuters

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

BAGHDAD (Reuters) - A suicide bomber blew up his minibus after luring a crowd of men to the vehicle with promises of work in Baghdad on Wednesday, killing at least 82 people and wounding 163, police and officials said.

Witnesses said the blast in the mostly Shi'ite district of Kadhimiya tore through a group of laborers waiting at the roadside in the hope of finding jobs for the day.

``We gathered and suddenly a car blew up and turned the area into fire and dust and darkness," said Hadi, one of the workers who survived the attack.

An Interior Ministry source said the bomber had pulled up in the minibus and called to a group of men to gather round, saying he was looking for workers. He then detonated his explosives.

One source said up to 500 lbs of explosives might have been used in the bomb.

Bodies lay in the street beside burned-out cars, witnesses said. Some used wooden carts to haul away the dead. Iraqi government officials have accused Sunni Arab militants of attacking majority Shi'ites, who were swept to power in January elections, in a bid to spark a civil war.

The carnage followed late-night killings in the town of Taji, just north of the capital, where gunmen dragged 17 people out of their homes and shot them, police said.

Baghdad Blast Kills Scores Of Iraqis (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

BAGHDAD — In one of the deadliest vehicle bombs to strike the capital, as many as 80 unemployed construction workers were killed early today as they lined up for day jobs in a largely Shiite neighborhood, Iraqi officials said.

Along with the slaying of 17 Shiite Muslims early today in the city of Taji, the attack broke a relative lull in large-scale assaults and threatened to fuel already high sectarian tensions between Iraq's majority Shiite population and the once-ruling Sunni Arabs.

It was the deadliest bombing in Iraq since a suicide attacker ignited a fuel tanker July 16 near a Shiite mosque in the central town of Musayyib, killing almost 100 people.

Today's bomb exploded about 6:45 a.m. in the Kadhimiya district of the capital, where as many as 3,000 construction workers gather each morning to seek work for the day. Construction supervisors and engineers drive to the area throughout the day to pick up workers, who swarm around the vehicles in hope of being selected.

A suicide driver approached in a truck, pretending to be interested in hiring workers, witnesses said.

"Everyone gathered around the car, and when they got close it exploded," said Hassan Qasim, one of the laborers. "I can't believe I'm alive. It's a miracle."

Hazam Araji, a representative of Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr in Kadhimiya, said, "This is a terrorist act targeting civilians and ordinary people in one of the safest areas of Iraq."

One witness reported seeing a U.S. convoy passing the area shortly before the explosion. But several victims said they believed that the attack was motivated by sectarian tensions.

"The explosion was targeting Shiites, because there are no Sunnis there," said Majid Hamid, 18, who was taken to a nearby hospital with injuries to his eyes and hands. "We were all Shiites."

"We are fed up with the government," said Ahmed Qusay, another job seeker. "They are doing nothing. They should exterminate those terrorists. If the government can't do it, we will do it ourselves."

About two hours before the blast, men armed with machine guns dragged 17 Shiite men from their homes and killed them in Taji, a Sunni Muslim-dominated city north of Baghdad, the Interior Ministry said.

Gunmen wearing Iraqi national guard uniforms and driving government-issued vehicles surrounded a residential neighborhood and entered several houses, seemingly at random, saying they were "arresting" the 17 men.

About 30 minutes later, residents heard gunshots on the edge of the neighborhood and discovered the men's bodies.

On Tuesday, U.S. and Iraqi forces continued their crackdown on insurgents in Tall Afar in northern Iraq and bombed a safe house in Haditha in the western province of Al Anbar.

U.S. officials said they killed four suspected insurgents in Haditha and captured one accused of having ties to Al Qaeda.

In Basra, four employees of a private U.S. company working at the airport were killed by a roadside bomb Tuesday, said Col. Kareem Zaidi, spokesman for the Basra police. Five others were injured. Nationalities of the victims were not released.

Number Of Attacks Decreases On Baghdad Highway To Airport (USAT)

By Kimberly Johnson Special For

USA Today, September 14, 2005

BAGHDAD — Attacks on and around the 7-mile highway linking Baghdad to its international airport have dropped 41% since May, the result of increased U.S. and Iraqi troop presence and new tactics to battle insurgents along one of the world's most dangerous roads.

There hasn't been a suicide car bombing on the road since April, according to U.S. military statistics through August.

U.S. officers attribute the decline to an influx of Iraqi troops who have been stationed at key points along Airport Road, which goes by the military designation Route Irish.

“Route Irish is definitely not the most dangerous road in Iraq any longer, and everyone who uses it knows it,” says Lt. Col. Geoffrey Slack, commander of the New York National Guard's 1st Battalion, 69th Infantry Regiment.

In May, insurgents staged 49 attacks on the road and in surrounding neighborhoods, including assaults with deadly roadside bombs and rocket-propelled grenades, according to statistics from Slack's battalion, which was responsible for the area until a recent hand-over.

Violence in the road's area peaked in November 2004. That month, insurgents launched 52 attacks, including 13 car bombs, according to the military statistics. The number of attacks fell to 29 in August, mostly small-arms fire.

Airport worker Hana Abdul Aziz, 28, was on her way to work in a bus with other airport employees one morning last November when the bus came under attack.

Aziz remembers glass and blood flying through the air. A woman sitting next to her was killed in the attack. “She got a bullet in her head and died immediately,” she says.

For most of the past year, the New York battalion has been responsible for securing the road and surrounding neighborhoods. U.S. military officials declined to discuss numbers, but American battalions generally number about 800 troops.

In June, an Iraqi police commando unit was assigned to work alongside the American troops. Iraqi battalions typically have about 750 troops, says Lt. Col. Fred Wellman, spokesman for the command responsible for training Iraqi troops.

The additional Iraqi troops, along with U.S. counterparts, were deployed at seven armed checkpoints at the entries to the road. The checkpoints are staffed around the clock and can carefully watch vehicles entering the highway.

The airport highway has been hotly contested. It is heavily used by American and coalition forces, contractors, diplomats and Iraqis working with them. Surrounding the airport is a large U.S. military facility that serves as headquarters for coalition forces.

There are few entrances or exits on the road. Most of the traffic is going to or from the airport or the U.S. base, presenting prime targets for insurgents.

“They knew you'd have diplomats traveling on that road,” says Maj. Alayne Conway, spokeswoman for the 3rd Infantry Division.

The highway also has symbolic importance as one of the main links between Iraq and the outside world.

During March and April, attacks on the road were so common that U.S. Embassy personnel were banned from using the road.

Dense neighborhoods along the road make ideal hiding places for insurgents who can attack and take cover in the narrow streets.

Coalition forces have struggled to make it safe, highlighting the difficulty of fighting an insurgency in a big city.

Soldiers have cut down date palms that lined the road, cleared trash, moved guardrails and cut weeds to make it difficult to hide roadside bombs, Conway says.

Getting the additional Iraqi troops assigned to the area allowed commanders to set up strong points along the highway and "turned the tables," Slack says.

U.S. officers stop short of saying the problem is fixed. "I don't want to speculate that things are going to stay the same, but obviously with the things that have been done, the road is safer," Conway says.

U.S. Raids Militant Stronghold In Iraq (AJC/AP)

By Tarek El-tablawy, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. forces widened their operations against insurgents in northern Iraq on Tuesday, launching an attack on the Euphrates River stronghold of Haditha only days after evicting militants from Tal Afar. Residents also reported American air strikes in the same region near Qaim.

The Americans called in bombing raids in Haditha, 140 miles northwest of the capital. They captured one militant with ties to al-Qaida in Iraq and killed four others.

In the volatile city of Qaim, about 80 miles northwest of Haditha, residents said clashes broke out between insurgents and coalition forces. The U.S. military did not confirm the air strike.

In the south, a roadside bomb killed four people near Basra — an attack that was a twin to a deadly bombing in the area last week. Iraqi police said the dead were four American contract workers, but U.S. officials were unable to confirm the nationalities of the victims. Last Wednesday, a roadside bomb near Basra hit a passing convoy of U.S. diplomatic security guards, killing four Americans.

President Jalal Talabani, meanwhile, said in Washington that Iraq would not set a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops, declaring at a news conference with President Bush that the American force still was needed. The Bush administration is under increasing pressure at home to set a date to begin pulling out the 140,000 U.S. troops.

"We will set no timetable for withdrawal. A timetable will help the terrorists," Talabani said. He said he hoped Iraqi security forces could take responsibility for the country by the end of 2006.

A U.S. Army commander said Tuesday that extremist fighters battling for control of Tal Afar in northern Iraq had committed atrocities against civilians, including beheadings, torture and the booby-trapping of a murdered child's body.

"The enemy here did just the most horrible things you can imagine — in one case murdering a child, placing a booby trap within the child's body and waiting for the parent to come recover the body of their child and exploding it to kill the parents; beheadings and so forth," Col. H.R. McMaster, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, said in an interview from Tal Afar with reporters at the Pentagon.

McMaster said Tal Afar is not yet under the control of the 5,000 Iraqi government forces and 3,500 to 3,800 U.S. troops that have been fighting together there for the past two weeks. Tal Afar lies about 50 miles from the Syrian border.

"Don't think you can benefit from our difficulties. It may be for the short term, but for the long term it might backfire on you," he warned Iraq's neighbor to the West.

Bush also renewed criticism of Syria, accusing it of doing too little to control the flow of fighters across the border.

"The Syrian leader must understand we take his lack of action seriously," he said. "The government is going to be more and more isolated."

Syrian officials say they are doing all they can and deny they offer sanctuary to insurgents.

During Sunday's operation in Tal Afar, Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari closed the closest Syrian border crossing. Iraqi officials say most of the insurgents they flushed out of the city were foreigners who entered the country from Syria.

After the raid Tuesday on Haditha, Associated Press Television News videotape showed at least three houses that residents said were demolished in the U.S. air strike. The U.S. military said American jets destroyed a vehicle used by one of the insurgents. Haditha is one of a series of towns in the Euphrates River valley controlled by militants.

U.S. forces have been conducting random raids and air strikes in the region that target insurgent safe houses and weapons caches.

In Baghdad, insurgents shelled the heavily fortified Green Zone, firing two mortar rounds that exploded near a military hospital inside the protected area that houses the U.S. Embassy, the Iraqi government and parliament and other foreign missions. There were no casualties.

In the Shiite holy city of Karbala, 50 miles south of Baghdad, police banned trucks from entering the city as of Tuesday and said they would prohibit cars from entering beginning Thursday. The move was a precaution against bomb attacks on 3 million pilgrims expected for a key religious festival early next week.

The stringent security measures in Karbala reflect fears that birthday celebrations for Imam al-Mahdi al-Muntadhar, a 9th-century religious leader, could be marred by attacks by Sunni Arab insurgents, many of whom view Shiites as heretics.

Insurgent attacks on similar celebrations throughout the country have left hundreds dead in the past two years, prompting authorities to impose increasingly restrictive measures.

The security plan involves roughly 5,400 provincial policemen, including police commandos and about 750 Iraqi soldiers, Karbala police chief Brig. Karim Al-Hasnawi told The Associated Press.

"The main duty for the army battalion and the 1,400 police special forces will be to set up check points on a 25-mile radius around the city to secure the main highways leading to the city and the surrounding farming areas," said Al-Hasnawi.

U.S. Commander: Iraq Fighters Use Torture (AJC/AP)

By Robert Burns, Ap Military Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — A U.S. Army commander asserted Tuesday that extremist fighters in northern Iraq committed atrocities against civilians, including beheadings, torture and the booby-trapping of a murdered child's body.

The accusations by Col. H.R. McMaster, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, included some of the most graphic and specific charges by an American military officer during the ongoing battle for control of Tal Afar, a city about 50 miles from the Syrian border that has been an insurgent stronghold.

"The enemy here did just the most horrible things you can imagine — in one case murdering a child, placing a booby trap within the child's body and waiting for the parent to come recover the body of their child and exploding it to kill the parents; beheadings and so forth," McMaster said in an interview from Tal Afar with reporters at the Pentagon.

McMaster said Tal Afar is not yet under the control of the 5,000 Iraqi government forces and 3,500 to 3,800 U.S. troops that have been fighting together there for the past two weeks. He predicted eventual victory but said it was impossible to know how long it would take before the Iraqis can control Tal Afar by themselves.

"Is Tal Afar secure? No, it's not secure," he said. "Is the enemy on the run in Tal Afar? Yes, the enemy's on the run. And we're going to conduct some follow-on operations in the next week or so to relentlessly pursue the enemy across the city."

McMaster repeatedly condemned the tactics of the insurgents, whom he called terrorists and extremists.

"Not only were they targeting civilians, brutally murdering them, torturing them, but they were also kidnapping the youth of the city and brainwashing them and trying to turn them into hate-filled murderers," he said.

His comments came two days after the al-Qaida leader in Iraq, Abu-Musab al-Zarqawi, purportedly accused American forces of using poison gas in the Tal Afar fighting, a charge that U.S. officials have denied. The accusation was made in an audiotape posted on the Internet on Sunday and attributed to al-Zarqawi.

McMaster alluded to that accusation and said he believed the insurgents had planned to detonate chemicals in a building in a residential area and then claim that U.S. forces had employed poison gas against civilians.

"In one of these buildings the enemy had big barrels of chemicals that had explosives implanted in the chemicals, wires running around them. The whole house was rigged for demolition," he said.

When U.S. troops went into the house, "immediately their eyes began burning, their throats began burning. So they withdrew out of the house immediately and then we conducted reconnaissance with some chemical protective gear, with a remote reconnaissance capability, into the house. And we could tell that the thing was rigged with chemicals."

McMaster also said U.S. troops found manuals that described how to make "these kind of chemical dirty bombs and so forth."

In Tall Afar, A Brawl To Blow Off Some Steam (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 13 -- After months of preparing for a battle with insurgents that never fully materialized and 12 days of running around this city from dawn to dusk, the soldiers of Eagle Troop did what soldiers often do with unspent aggression.

They fought each other.

Squaring off Tuesday evening in the front yard of a home they had commandeered to be their command post for the final stage of the assault on Tall Afar, they grappled one-on-one on the grass for hours. Good-natured taunts flew. T-shirts and uniform pants were torn. And as the sun began to fall behind the stone buildings of this restive city, an audience of hecklers grew.

At the end of a particularly one-sided bout between soldiers mismatched by at least 100 pounds, Pfc. Hector Rodriguez, 21, an accomplished trash-talker from Buffalo, pointed at the preening victor and said to the vanquished: "What's he got in his hand? That's your manhood, son."

During the incursion into Tall Afar, a city of more than 200,000 located about 40 miles from the Syrian border in northwestern Iraq, more than 550 suspected insurgents have been killed or captured this month, commanders said. Much of the fighting was carried out with airstrikes or by the Iraqi army, which led the assault.

Though the operation is to continue through the end of the month, "the 24-hour curfew on the people moving in the street is lifted today, and the ban on driving cars in the street ends in the coming days," Najim Abdullah Jabouri, the newly appointed mayor, said at a news conference Tuesday.

Jabouri, a former general in ousted president Saddam Hussein's army who was installed as the city's police chief four months ago by U.S. and Iraqi forces, said thousands of people who fled the city in recent months would soon be encouraged to return.

With the current phase of the operation over, the soldiers of Eagle Troop, part of the U.S. Army's 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, planned to spend at least the next few nights at their base outside the city.

"We planned for this for months, and whenever you plan for an operation for that long, you always hope you have a bit more contact with the enemy than we did. But you also look back and say we didn't get anybody hurt, and that is definitely a good thing," said Capt. Noah Hanners, 26, of Chillicothe, Ohio, the leader of the troop's Blue Platoon.

He had told his charged-up troops from the start of the attack to show restraint, to avoid destroying property in the dozens of homes they raided across the city. But as the wrestling matches escalated Tuesday, each ending with a handshake and applause, Hanners took a seat on the grass and cheered with the others.

"Blue Four versus Blue One," came a shout from a rooftop, using radio call signs to request a match between Hanners and Sgt. 1st Class Herbert Gadsden, the platoon's two senior soldiers.

"No, man, that's like watching your parents fight," said another soldier to peals of laughter that signaled the showdown was canceled before it started.

Despite the lack of extensive fighting during the offensive, soldiers had slept an average of less than five hours a night over nearly two weeks and were exhausted. They were constantly on foot and constantly on the move from the moment they woke on a rooftop or living room floor or back yard of a commandeered home.

Working 18-hour days, they covered almost a quarter of the city, dashing from house to house or leaping between rooftops, kicking down doors or smashing them with sledgehammers -- while carrying 40 pounds of equipment. They were routinely shot at but could rarely tell where the bullets came from.

Without interpreters who spoke Turkish, the predominant language in this city where most people are ethnic Turkmens, interrogations often involved hand gestures or pidgin English or Arabic. American soldiers said they were lied to constantly.

Last week, a man in the eastern neighborhood of Hassan Koy communicated to them during a stilted, gesture-filled conversation that he was a teacher and that there were no weapons in his home. They found an Iraqi police armband and uniform in a closet. He said he did not know where the items had come from. Then they found a police academy graduation certificate made out in his name and a 9mm pistol sewn into a pillow.

"This is ridiculous. I don't even get whether he was lying because he was a policeman and didn't want us to know or because he was faking it," one soldier said.

At least some of the soldiers' frustration appeared to dissipate during Tuesday night's fights. Shouts and jeers came from troops assembled on rooftops and lining the yard to prevent combatants from slamming into head-high stone walls. The noise drew curious soldiers from an Iraqi army unit stationed across an arid field. Soon they wanted in.

Spec. Bernard Penegor, 19, of Rockland. Mich., fought to a draw with a feisty Iraqi corporal, who afterward presented him a small medal inscribed with Arabic writing.

At 7 p.m., Eagle Troop took a brief break for a group photograph to commemorate the operation. Then it was back to the bouts.

"We'll probably do this all night until someone gets killed," joked Spec. Jason North, 19, of Santaquin, Utah. "Not that we'd stop just 'cause someone gets hurt. I mean, this is Iraq. It happens."

Praise And Questions For Iraqi Prime Minister In Michigan (NYT)

By Danny Hakim And Jeremy W. Peters

DEARBORN, Mich., Sept. 13 - This city's Iraqi-American population, who form one of the world's largest Iraqi expatriate communities, loathed Saddam Hussein. Tuesday evening, they embraced Ibrahim al-Jaafari, Iraq's first democratically elected prime minister, at times shouting poetry and prayer in his praise.

But they also had plenty of questions in a town hall meeting that was at times contentious. Attendees asked Mr. Jaafari about the future of Kirkuk, whether the rights of Chaldeans would be respected, whether there were still Iraqi prisoners of war in Iran and whether Iraqi embassies throughout the world and government agencies in the country were still stocked with former Baathists. And they wanted to know when justice and the rule of law would return to their native land.

"What moves me is my desire to work for my country and for you," Mr. Jaafari told the crowd of several hundred at a Ritz-Carlton hotel. "Just as we were once upon a time imposed on by this tyrant, we are now imposed upon by this group of terrorists," he said, adding that it was his top priority to combat terrorism. He said the country was making progress in lowering the number of daily car bombings, but added that there were very likely still hostile elements even inside the different institutions within the government.

"Don't think the time between May 3 and now is enough to diminish 35 years of Saddam's rule," he said, referring to the day he took office. "Don't think that anything is going to happen overnight. We need time."

Mr. Jaafari is a medical doctor who fled Iraq in 1980 when Mr. Hussein began rounding up members of the Dawa Party, which Mr. Jaafari now leads. He returned to Iraq shortly after the war began. On Monday, an insurgent group put a $100,000 bounty on him, coinciding with his visit to Tal Afar in northern Iraq, the site of a major coalition operation against insurgents.

Mr. Jaafari seemed somewhat wearied from his trip; he arrived in town shortly before his speech. He addressed a small group of local community leaders and then the crowd of several hundred for about an hour before sitting to listen to a stream of questioners.

He said he had personally asked Iranian officials about P.O.W.'s and had been told there were none. He assured a Chaldean in the crowd that his ethnic group would not be overlooked, adding that he had personally mentioned them in his acceptance speech after his selection. And he repeatedly asked for patience.

Nisrin Kadum, 49, a banking specialist at Comerica Bank who fled Iraq in 1979, was almost shouted down when she asked about the role of women in the country. "What kind of rights do women have in this Constitution?" Ms. Kadum said in a later interview, expressing anger at the Islamic bent of the constitution. "There is something missing in this Constitution. We want something more for this government."

Mr. Jaafari quoted parts of the new Constitution, saying, "It does provide several points to protect women's rights in all aspects."

Most of Dearborn's Iraqi-Americans are Shiite, as is Mr. Jaafari, and there is a visible Chaldean Christian community as well. Most have a story to tell about what Mr. Hussein did to their family. Many said they were distressed by the country's lack of stability and came seeking a progress report.

Abir Aldhalimi, a 20-year-old college student, said she no longer watched television for news on Iraq because she could not bear to see all the death. "It's not getting better," she said, "it's getting worse."

Her mother, Samira Alzayadi, 42, interrupted. "Saddam was a criminal; to have anything else is better," she said.

Mr. Jaafari, speaking of his visit to Tal Afar, said the Iraqi army had "succeeded in their honorable work in preventing the terrorists and removing them from the city." His comments, made in Arabic, were translated for a reporter by Dr. Basim M. Al-Khafaji, the director of the pathology residency program at a local hospital.

Imam Husham Al-Husainy, one of the organizers of the event, said of the crowd: "They see a prime minister among them. They see hope and they see the democratic process is working. It used to be dreams. Now it is a reality."

Iraq May Expand Death Penalty (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

BAGHDAD — Struggling to fight back against insurgents roiling the country, Iraqi lawmakers have begun to debate sweeping anti-terrorism legislation that could significantly expand use of the death penalty.

Iraq's leaders, who have been widely criticized at home for not doing enough to protect their citizens, are contemplating expanding the list of crimes punishable by death to include offenses such as attacking government buildings, using explosives to kill people and advocating sectarian violence.

But like many issues in Iraq, the debate is being shadowed by the bloody legacy of Saddam Hussein and the religious and ethnic divisions that many fear are feeding the current violence.

Although many Iraqis have been calling for more executions since the insurgency began, some Sunni Arabs fear that they will be unfairly targeted by the death penalty because the rebellion is centered in Sunni regions of the country.

And human rights groups are expressing concern that an expanded use of the death penalty may push Iraq back toward a time when the government wantonly executed its opponents.

"We have to be careful," acknowledged Thamer Ghadban, a Sunni legislator with the secular Iraqi List slate, who nonetheless said he was confident that lawmakers would pass a cautiously worded bill that would be implemented fairly.

"We need some kind of a response to these terrorists, to make them think two or three times before they decide to carry out terrorist acts," said Ala Noori Talabani, a member of the transitional National Assembly with the Kurdish alliance. "Otherwise, what will make people afraid to commit these crimes?"

U.S. authorities initially banned the death penalty after American-led forces deposed Hussein in 2003.

When Iraq's first transitional government took control last year, it immediately reinstated the death penalty, which is common throughout the Middle East. But delays in reforming the country's justice system slowed its use, to the growing frustration of many Iraqis who saw the delays as evidence of their government's impotence.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani has been on the defensive recently for saying he personally opposes the death penalty, even for Hussein, who is set to go on trial next month on charges stemming from a 1982 massacre of 143 Shiite Muslims.

This month, Iraqi officials carried out the nation's first executions since the fall of Hussein, hanging three men convicted of murder, rape and kidnapping in the southeastern city of Kut.

"If Iraqis do not get an effective government that will enforce law and order, then the outcry, the pressure for a strongman, may be dangerously strong," Kubba warned recently.

Iraq's current law makes numerous crimes punishable by death, including murder, sedition and some drug offenses, said Tariq Harb, a prominent Baghdad attorney.

According to a draft of the anti-terrorism legislation, people convicted of attacking police officers, army personnel and diplomatic missions could be subject to the death penalty. So too could those who arm, mobilize or finance citizens to carry out attacks against other sectarian groups. Lending assistance in any of the crimes also could be punishable by death.

The sweeping language of the legislation has prompted the National Assembly to try to clarify the proposal, lawmakers said. Ghadban said the original language could have made a taxi driver who drove a terrorist to a target subject to the death penalty. Those ambiguities will be cleared up, he and others said.

But talk of expanding the death penalty is already making some Sunni leaders and citizens uneasy.

At Baghdad's large Umm Qura Mosque, cleric Mahmoud Sumaidaie warned Friday against unjust uses of force by authorities. And several Sunnis who came to pray expressed misgivings about expanding the death penalty.

"I support the principle of execution," said Mohammed Dhiaa, a Baghdad shop owner. "But I fear that if the law is implemented, it will be imposed on one part of society more than another…. I fear that many will be executed."

Lawmakers said they expected the final anti-terrorism bill to pass within the next several weeks.

Guess Who's Coming To Dinar (WSJ)

By Amir Taheri

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

In the Tehran moneychangers' bazaar on Manuchehri Street, traders are always on the lookout for the new sogoli. The word, which means "top flower," is used to describe anyone or anything that is popular at any given time -- a thoroughbred steed, a beauty in the harem and, on "Foreign Exchange Street," the dozens of currencies traded each day. These days the moneychangers' sogoli is a surprise newcomer: the Iraqi dinar.

Iraq's currency of change.

With the world media depicting Iraq as a ship sinking in a sea of blood, and self-styled experts predicting civil war or disintegration, it is hard to imagine why anyone would want to abandon such all-time favorites as the U.S. dollar and the euro, not to mention the oil currencies of the region, in favor of the world's newest money.

One reason, of course, is the sharp rise in the supply of dollars, a result of the dramatic increase in the price of oil. (Iran is earning something like $200 million each day from its oil exports.) Another reason is that hundreds of thousands of Iranians have registered to travel to Iraq to visit Shiite sites in Najaf, Karbala, Samarra and Kazemiah. Under a recent agreement, an average of 1,000 Iranians are allowed to perform the pilgrimage each day. (The number is to rise to 5,000 a day in two years.) To these must be added several hundred non-Iranian Shiites, mostly from the Indian subcontinent and the Persian Gulf, who travel to Iraq via Iran after visiting the Iranian holy city of Mash'had.

Yet another reason for the increased interest in the Iraqi dinar is the dramatic increase in the volume and value of unofficial exports from Iraq to Iran. Ironically, a good part of this trade consists of petroleum products, which are shipped from Iraq to four Iranian border provinces. Thanks to Iraqi government subsidies, petrol is 30 times cheaper in Iraq than in Iran. (There is also much smuggling of petroleum from Iraq to Turkey, where petrol costs 160 times more). Adventurous Iranian businessmen, often working on behalf of well-connected mullahs, are also making a killing by importing foodstuffs, medical supplies and consumer goods from Iraq, especially the Kurdish areas, at prices that defy competition inside Iran.

Iraq is also benefiting from a slow but steady transfer of Shiite religious funds from many foreign countries, notably Iran. The reverse was the case under Saddam Hussein, when the Shiite foundations were anxious to keep as little of their assets in Iraq as possible. In the past year or so, several foundations have started to withdraw their assets from Iran. The trend was accelerated last spring after the Iranian government seized assets worth some $200 million from the Khoi Foundation, named after the late Grand Ayatollah Abol-Qassem Mussavi Khoi. It is suddenly Iraq, and not Iran, that looks like the safe haven for Shiite foundations.

Angered by increasing state intervention in religious affairs, a small but growing number of Shiite mullahs are leaving Iran to settle in Iraq. There is further concern that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's new administration -- dominated by the Islamic Revolutionary Guard -- may order a crackdown against the clergy.

Iraq's economic attraction, however, is not solely due to the arcane calculations of mullahs and pilgrims. It is also reflected in the latest report by the International Monetary Fund, published last month. It offers a mixed picture. For example, the report estimates Iraq's annual economic growth rate at just over 4% for 2005, a sharp drop compared to last year, when the economy grew by 52%.

But a closer look shows that the Iraqi economy still performed surprisingly well. The 52% growth rate represented exceptional circumstances in the aftermath of liberation and was unsustainable. Furthermore, the current 4% growth rate is higher than the average rates for the members of the Arab League. It is also a full percentage point higher than the annual average Iran achieved during the eight years of President Muhammad Khatami's administration.

If oil prices hold, Iraq's gross domestic product per head is projected to reach $3,000 next year, making it number 12 in the Arab League; in 2003, it was number 18. The IMF report shows that Iraq absorbed only $4.2 billion in investments in the non-oil sector of the economy compared to the $5.2 billion forecast last year. That figure, however, ignores investments made by small and mid-sized businesses, as well as farmers and individuals. Anecdotal evidence shows that such schemes are acting as the engine of growth in many parts of the country.

The key reason for the strong performance of the Iraqi dinar, however, may be the sevenfold increase in the nation's foreign currency reserves -- from less than a billion dollars to $7.3 billion. And the real figure may be higher because the report, finalized last July, does not reflect the latest rise in oil prices.

Some Americans might think that Iraq owes its robust economic performance to a flood of dollars provided by the U.S. taxpayers. The IMF report shows that this is not the case. Iraq is paying 90% of its own expenditures, including the cost of economic reconstruction. Of the remaining 10%, the U.S. accounts for four-fifths, with the rest coming from other donors. The bulk of the money the U.S. spends in Iraq is allocated to military and security operations, consultancy contracts and administrative costs.

The IMF speculates that within a decade Iraq could emerge as an engine of growth in the Middle East. Theoretically, this looks plausible. Iraq owns the world's second-largest deposits of crude oil and, once it produces its full OPEC quota, could take in up to $250 million a day from exports. It is also the only country in the Middle East that could easily double its agricultural production by introducing new farming techniques and equipment.

Nevertheless, Iraq's economic model suffers from two basic weaknesses. First, it is a rentier economy designed to distribute the oil income via state subsidies. Subsidies now account for 51% of the gross domestic product; the comparable figure in Iran is 22%, and 13% in Turkey. This limits the state's ability to invest in infrastructural projects, economic development programs and social services. It is clear that the current government under Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari lacks the political courage to reduce -- let alone abolish -- the subsidies that prevent the Iraqi economy from fully taking off.

The second weakness is the foreign debt inherited from Saddam Hussein, which amounts to $190 billion, including reparations distributed through the United Nations. (It excludes Iran's claim of over $1 trillion in damages.) Even under the best case scenario, servicing that debt could consume almost half of Iraq's GDP for the next decade. The best way to help Iraq would be for its creditors to write off the debts accumulated by an unrepresentative despot.

Iraq is in the process of crafting a more durable government. Economic reform should be a major part of that important effort.

U.S. Considering Troop Reduction In Afghanistan (WP)

By Bradley Graham

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 13 -- U.S. military commanders have drafted plans to lower the number of American troops in Afghanistan by roughly 20 percent next year if NATO-led troops from Europe continue to widen their role in securing the country, according to senior officers here.

A reduction of as many as 4,000 of the nearly 20,000 American troops in Afghanistan would be the largest drop in a force that generally has grown since the U.S.-led invasion in late 2001 drove the Taliban from power and routed al Qaeda fighters.

The U.S. plan is contingent on an improving political and security situation in Afghanistan and on decisions still to be made by NATO about what types of forces it would commit and its willingness for them to engage in combat against insurgents, the officers said.

"It makes sense that as NATO forces go in, and they're more in number, that we could drop some of the U.S. requirement somewhat," Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the senior U.S. commander in the region, said in an interview here. He stressed that no decision had been made to shrink the U.S. military presence.

The planning comes as intensified fighting in Afghanistan this year has killed more than 50 Americans, the highest death toll in any year since the troops arrived. U.S. officials say the increase is due in large part to aggressive moves by U.S. forces to root out guerrillas.

Although U.S. commanders expect the fighting to subside when harsh winter weather sets in, they anticipate another round of battles starting in the spring. "I think you have to get used to the cycle of fighting in Afghanistan," Abizaid said.

Even so, he and other commanders expressed confidence that the threat posed by the Taliban movement will dwindle as the Afghan government's authority spreads and Afghan forces become more capable.

NATO already leads a peacekeeping contingent of more than 9,000 troops known as the International Security Assistance Force, whose mandate was renewed for another year on Tuesday by the U.N. Security Council. In the past two years, the force has broadened its reach from its original base in Kabul, the capital, and now commands operations in the country's northern and western regions.

The alliance is moving toward assuming command in the southern region by May, which would leave the U.S. military responsible only for the eastern region.

But the expansion remains a sensitive issue in the alliance, particularly among member countries that have been reluctant to put their troops into combat as opposed to the less risky job of peacekeeping in relatively secure areas.

U.S. troops have so far borne the brunt of the fight with Taliban insurgents, whose strongholds are in remote parts of the south and the rugged hills of eastern provinces bordering Pakistan.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, arriving in Berlin on Tuesday for a meeting of NATO defense ministers, urged the alliance to shoulder more of the work in Afghanistan and to better develop its counterinsurgency and counter-narcotics capabilities. The NATO ministers plan to discuss Afghanistan on Wednesday.

The NATO force being readied for the south will consist of troops from Britain as well as the Netherlands and Canada, countries with records of combat operations since 2001.

British Defense Secretary John Reid appeared to back Rumsfeld's message after talks with the Pentagon leader, telling reporters Tuesday that the alliance must "have forces which are not paper forces."

However, speaking to reporters in London before heading for Berlin, Reid had said that the expansion of NATO's forces in Afghanistan next year was not intended primarily to deal with insurgents. "Their primary mission will not be to go chasing Taliban all over the country," Reid said, according to news service reports.

Handing more responsibility to NATO would appear to lighten the load on the U.S. military much faster than waiting for Afghanistan's fledgling security forces to become ready to conduct counterinsurgency operations on their own.

The Afghan army has grown to about 25,000 troops, and the Afghan police force has about 50,000 members. But U.S. commanders acknowledged in interviews here in the past two days that the development of both security branches has run into problems.

Concern about continuing shortfalls in logistical and other support for Afghan army units in the field recently prompted Army Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, the senior commander in Afghanistan, to slow the formation of new battalions, from about two a month to one.

And a move to set up what officers call "partnering relationships" between Afghan and U.S. units to foster on-the-job training is only now beginning. The first joint operation between an Afghan battalion and an American one occurred last week in the northeastern province of Konar.

"This question of partnering is something we've now aggressively adopted," Eikenberry said, "but perhaps we could have moved on that piece a little bit earlier."

The police suffer serious shortages of weapons, vehicles and communications gear and a reputation for corruption. "It's more or less a hollow force," said Air Force Maj. Gen. John Brennan, who oversees the development effort.

Germany has had the lead in training the police under an international division of responsibility set up after the 2001 invasion. But the Pentagon recently stepped in, broadening the effort by adding a mentoring program using foreign civilian law enforcement veterans and developing Afghan trainers. The United States also has allotted $860 million for police equipment, with the goal of establishing what Brennan called "a credible, well-equipped" force by the end of 2009.

Even if U.S. force levels in Afghanistan drop significantly next year, a sizable U.S. military presence in this country is likely for some years, according to U.S. and military diplomatic officials here.

The United States would continue to have what Eikenberry called "enduring missions" in Afghanistan, including the development of Afghan's security forces and the struggle against the country's vast poppy crop and opium trade.

U.S. forces also will be needed to provide airlift, intelligence and other logistical assistance to NATO allies. "We have to keep a force that's agile enough to back up NATO," said Ronald E. Neumann, the U.S. ambassador here. "NATO is not a question of providing some excuse for us to quit the mission early."

Under a longer-term alliance plan that envisions NATO taking command of Afghanistan's eastern sector, U.S. ground forces would continue to play the lead role there.

With elections due Sunday for a national assembly and provincial councils, the U.S. military command here is bracing for a possible surge in violence, although the level of insurgent activity in recent days has been lower than officers expected.

The potential for danger will not pass with the election and might intensify in the aftermath, U.S. officers here warned. They noted that millions of ballots must be transported from distant villages to central counting centers and that victorious candidates would likely end up waiting several months to be sworn into office.

Rumsfeld Urges NATO To Expand Afghan Role (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

BERLIN -- Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld urged NATO nations to continue efforts to expand their presence in Afghanistan -- a move that eventually could enable the U.S. to draw down its own troops in the country.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization's 11,000 troops have taken over security missions in northern and western Afghanistan, and by mid-2006, U.S. officials say they believe NATO troops will take over security in the country's once-restive south. The increased NATO presence and the development of Afghan security forces eventually should allow the U.S. to begin reducing its presence, Mr. Rumsfeld said.

He didn't give a time frame, saying any reduction would depend on conditions on the ground. With U.S. troops stretched by missions in Iraq, Afghanistan and now disaster relief on its own Gulf Coast, where about 71,000 U.S. troops are helping, any cuts would be welcome. Mr. Rumsfeld said the flow of troops into Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama has stopped.

In recent months, the U.S. boosted its presence in Afghanistan to about 20,000 troops to help secure the elections scheduled for this weekend. U.S. troops also are the main counterinsurgency force, performing raids along the border with Pakistan. Mr. Rumsfeld suggested the U.S. would like NATO personnel eventually to take a larger role in counternarcotics operations and take over -- at least in part -- the counterinsurgency mission.

There has been debate within NATO nations over whether the alliance's troops should be involved in counterinsurgency operations. In Germany, which holds an election Sunday, the subject of how German troops might be used has become a polarizing issue.

British Defense Secretary John Reid, appearing with Mr. Rumsfeld in Berlin, told reporters he supports the U.S. push for a bigger NATO role. NATO "has to have forces which are not paper forces," he said after meeting with Mr. Rumsfeld, adding that there must be a balanced approach to Afghanistan combining economic development, counternarcotics and offensive raids on insurgents and terrorists.

U.S. May Start Pulling Out Of Afghanistan Next Spring (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 13 - Senior Pentagon and military officials are discussing a proposal to cut American troop levels in Afghanistan next spring, perhaps by as much as 20 percent, the largest withdrawal since the Taliban were ousted in late 2001.

The troops would be replaced by NATO soldiers, who now oversee security and reconstruction missions in northern and western Afghanistan and are to take over an American command in the south next spring. American troops have been taxed by lengthy deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan, and Pentagon officials have sought to replace them with indigenous or allied troops.

But Germany, supported by Britain, France and other European allies, said Tuesday at a meeting of defense ministers in Berlin that it strongly opposed any American-backed restructuring of the NATO command structure that could lead to having alliance troops become involved in counterinsurgency.

Because those operations represent a large part of American troop activity in the south, it is not clear whether the reductions can go forward. In the past few months, violence has surged in the south, with Taliban forces conducting a campaign of assassinations and intimidation ahead of elections on Sunday.

Military officials emphasize that any reductions in the nearly American 20,000 troops in Afghanistan hinge on resolution of the details with NATO, successful parliamentary and provincial elections and stable security.

"It makes sense that as NATO forces go in, and they're more in numbers, that we could drop some of the U.S. requirements somewhat," Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head the United States Central Command, said in an interview here on Tuesday.

General Abizaid declined to give an exact number of potential troop cuts. But another senior officer, who spoke anonymously because the decision is not final, said the Pentagon could reduce force levels by as much as 20 percent, or about 4,000 troops.

American officials were quick to note that the United States would still have the largest number of foreign soldiers in Afghanistan, and would remain committed to ensuring political, economic and security gains in the country.

At the meeting in Berlin, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said he would urge the alliance to expand its role in Afghanistan beyond its security and peacekeeping duties.

Although Mr. Rumsfeld emphasized that American troops would continue to handle the counterinsurgency mission "for a time," he said NATO should consider deploying troops to the eastern border region, which the United States oversees and where much of the fighting is occurring. He added that "over time, it would be nice if NATO developed counterterrorism capabilities, which don't exist at the present time."

But the German defense minister, Peter Struck, said merging NATO's peacekeeping mission with the American combat operation under a single commander would fundamentally change NATO's role in Afghanistan and "would make the situation for our soldiers doubly dangerous and worsen the current climate in Afghanistan." Officials in Britain and France also voiced opposition to the idea.

Some American officials played down the dispute, saying that while they were seeking to combine the operations of American and NATO forces, they were not committed to any particular approach, and that a consensus would be worked out.

To overcome European opposition, the Pentagon is proposing, among other ideas, a joint NATO command structure in which countries willing to contribute troops to counterinsurgency would be under one officer, while allies that want to continue to conduct peacekeeping and other noncombat roles would fall under another. The two contingents would fall under one overall commander.

Both France and Germany have small special forces involved in combat alongside American troops, but most of the European contribution is to the 11,000 officers in the International Security Assistance Force, which conducts peacekeeping and security duties in Kabul and in the north and west.

Britain, Canada and the Netherlands have already agreed to take over the NATO command in the south, where American troops have clashed with Taliban, in particular north of Kandahar. But it is unclear if the force in the south will be intended for counterinsurgency.

American commanders say they are bracing for factional violence to extend through the ballot-counting process and until the new legislators are seated in December or January. “We have to be prepared for uncertainty after the announcement of the candidates,” Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, the senior American commander in Afghanistan, said in an interview.

Throughout Afghanistan on Tuesday, the American military continued gearing up for an anticipated spike in insurgent attacks just before the voting. Virtually all American troops will stand by, out of sight, to safeguard some 6,200 polling stations, which will be ringed with Afghan soldiers and police officers. American commanders say they are bracing for factional violence to extend through the ballot-counting process and until the new legislators are seated in December or January. "We have to be prepared for uncertainty after the announcement of the candidates," Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, the senior American commander in Afghanistan, said in an interview.

Attacks against American forces are down slightly from a year ago, commanders said, but this year's violence has been deadlier, with assassinations and roadside bombings killing 2 candidates for Parliament and at least 16 others.

Sixty-nine American service members have been killed in Afghanistan this year, the deadliest for United States troops since the war in 2001. Some deaths resulted from stepped-up American offensives in areas sympathetic to the Taliban. Lt. Col. Gerald J. O'Hara, a military spokesman, said coalition troops had killed about 600 insurgents since March.

Maj. Gen. Jason K. Kamiya, the American commander of daily tactical operations in Afghanistan, gave details on a new plan to outfit Afghan soldiers to fight through the winter, when both insurgent and allied troops usually curtail operations because heavy snows make travel through mountainous regions extremely difficult.

General Kamiya said in an interview that he wanted to keep the pressure on Taliban fighters as they leave their summer fighting positions for sanctuary in Pakistan or deep in the Afghan interior.

He said he was also planning to spend $68 million in reconstruction projects by next spring in an effort to show the Afghan people that combat operations were pushing ahead along with improvements to their villages and towns.

In a similar effort to impress villagers in the Taliban heartland, Army engineers and the Agency for International Development recently completed a $35 million, 74-mile road connecting Kandahar to Tarin Kwot, cutting a bone-jarring 11-hour drive to 3 hours.

Pakistanis Seize 21 Militants

By The New York Times

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Sept. 13 - A top Pakistani military commander here said Tuesday that his forces had arrested 21 militants in its mountainous northwest region, found a remotely piloted spy plane and seized a cache of arms and communications equipment believed to be used in insurgent operations in Afghanistan.

The commander, Lt. Gen. Safdar Hussain, in charge of military forces and tribal agencies in the North West Frontier Province, also said his forces had detected an office for recruiting men to fight the government and Americans in Afghanistan.

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

BERLIN — NATO should ultimately take over anti-terrorism operations in Afghanistan handled by the U.S.-led coalition, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Tuesday, but he refused to set a timetable for drawing down American troops.

Speaking to reporters at the beginning of a two-day NATO meeting, Rumsfeld also rejected suggestions that the United States might begin pulling troops out of Iraq by the end of the year, saying the departure would be determined by what is occurring in that country.

"It's all condition-based," Rumsfeld said.

Affirming that position was the British defense minister, John Reid.

"We are in Iraq for as long as it takes to solve the problems in Iraq," Reid said, "until the job is done."

More detailed talk was stifled by fears about increased violence accompanying parliamentary elections in Afghanistan scheduled for this coming weekend, as well as the upcoming elections in Germany, where some have openly opposed any increased combat missions for NATO.

Afghanistan's elections come four years after the U.S. invaded the country to overthrow the Taliban. Insurgents have vowed to disrupt the balloting.

Rumsfeld said NATO's move to take on a larger role in Afghanistan, including drug interdiction, will be a key topic of discussion throughout the meeting.

"Over time it would be nice if NATO would develop counterterrorist capabilities which don't exist at the current time," he said.

NATO has 11,000 mostly European troops providing security in northern and western Afghanistan. Around 19,000 U.S.-led troops cover the south and east.

NATO plans to expand slowly its peacekeeping role and eventually take primary responsibility for security in the country. Thirty-five countries have troops in Afghanistan, including a number of non-NATO nations.

Under the NATO plan, German troops will take the lead role in the north, Italians in the west, British in the south and Americans under NATO command in the east. French and Turkish troops will lead in Kabul — working alongside Afghanistan's fledgling army and police.

Rumsfeld said he is also urging his defense counterparts to find ways to increase the military flexibility of NATO's forces and the financing for the alliance. Several countries put limits on the military activity their forces can engage in as part of NATO, such as limiting where they can go or what type of combat force they can use.

Rumsfeld declined to single out which countries he felt posed problems. He said there are 17 pages of edicts limiting where troops can go and what they can do.

"Different restrictions on national forces makes it enormously difficult for commanders to have the flexibility to function," said Rumsfeld.

In addition, he said a funding increase is needed because some smaller countries have lower defense budgets or must plan their spending so far in advance that it makes it difficult for them to respond quickly to changing military needs.

Rumsfeld said he hopes that changes in the structure of NATO will eventually allow the alliance to reduce some of its forces in Kosovo as well.

Rumsfeld plans to meet privately with several of his colleagues Wednesday, including Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov.

Meanwhile, Afghan President Hamid Karzai said the U.S.-led coalition needs to reconsider the way it is fighting Taliban-led rebels. His comments came after six months of fierce battles that have left more than 1,200 dead.

"We and the international community, the coalition, must sit down and reconsider and rethink whether the approach to the threat of terrorism that has (been) taken is the absolutely right one," he told British Broadcasting Corp. in an interview broadcast Tuesday.

He suggested combating the problem where "terrorists are trained" but declined to elaborate.

3 Charged In Prisoner Abuse Case (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

FORT BLISS, Tex., Sept. 13 (AP) - An Army officer and two more of his soldiers from a Reserve unit have been charged in a prisoner abuse investigation in Afghanistan, the Army announced Tuesday.

The officer, Capt. Christopher M. Beiring, who led the 377th Military Police Company based in Cincinnati, was charged with dereliction of duty and making a false official statement. He is the first officer to be charged in the investigation.

The abuse case primarily involves two detainees who died at the Bagram Air Base detention center, where Captain Beiring's unit worked. The first, Mullah Habibullah, was found dead in his cell at the detention center just days after being taken into American custody in December 2002. A second detainee, Dilawar, arrived at Bagram the day after Mr. Habibullah died. Mr. Dilawar died about a week later.

Investigators say Captain Beiring did not properly train or supervise soldiers under his command in legal uses of force, according to documents released by the Army. He is also accused of failing to take steps to correct the soldiers' actions - as directed by his superior and a legal adviser - after Mr. Habibullah died. In addition, Captain Beiring is accused of lying about training his soldiers received.

Staff Sgt. Brian L. Doyle and Sgt. Duane M. Grubb, both from the unit Captain Beiring commanded, were also charged Tuesday. Sergeant Doyle faces charges of dereliction of duty and maltreatment. Sergeant Grubb is accused of assault, maltreatment and making a false official statement.

U.S. To Fund Prison In Afghanistan (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

The Pentagon will help finance construction of a locally run military prison in Afghanistan as part of a plan to send to their home countries scores of terror detainees at the prison at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The releases in the next year or so could reduce the prisoner population at the base to less than 400, from a one-time high of 800. There has not been a new detainee sent to Guantanamo since last September.

"We hope that in the future there will be less need for us to detain large numbers there," Matthew C. Waxman, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, told The Washington Times. If any new detainees come to Guantanamo, he said, "it would be at a much slower, small rate of inflow than anything that we saw at the beginning" in 2002.

Instead, the Bush administration is embarking on a new strategy.

Mr. Waxman said the United States will help Afghanistan build a military prison to detain enemy combatants and to accept transfers from Guantanamo. A defense official could not supply details on the new prison, saying talks were in the early stages. The Pentagon also has made Guantanamo more selective, looking only for detainees thought to hold valuable intelligence information about terror networks.

Of the 500 detainees at Guantanamo, more than 100 are Saudi Arabians and 110 are Afghans. The United States has signed a deal with Afghanistan to gradually repatriate detainees on assurances that they will not be released to fight again. The Pentagon and State Department are "far along" in inking a similar agreement with Saudi Arabia, Mr. Waxman said.

The deals could result in the prisoner population at Guantanamo shrinking significantly in the next several years. It also would present fewer opportunities for attorneys of the detainees to pursue cases in U.S. courts. Two federal appeals courts have sided with President Bush on his asserted right to hold enemy combatants.

Mr. Waxman is part of a movement to reform the Pentagon's prisons in Afghanistan, Iraq and Guantanamo. The changes come in response to the abuse of some detainees by U.S. military personnel and to criticism from human rights groups.

The Pentagon started 12 senior-level investigations, resulting in nearly 500 recommendations for improvement. Congress convened 31 hearings, and the military conducted more than 500 criminal probes.

Mr. Waxman's post was created to advise Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on detainee policy. Mr. Waxman also coordinates operations with the Army, which runs the system, and reaches out to the International Committee of the Red Cross in Geneva.

In 2002, the prison network lacked adequately trained guards, field guidance on how to interrogate terror suspects and a good system of vetting complaints from Red Cross inspectors. Today, the Army is issuing new guidelines and has started modernized training programs. And prisoners have set up administrative review panels similar to parole boards that judge when inmates should be released.

"Over the past year, we've been quietly making significant changes across all aspects of detainee policy and operations," said Mr. Waxman, a Yale Law School graduate and former staffer on the White House National Security Council. "Detention operations today are more effective and humane than they were a year ago. ... We want to show that aggressive waging of the war on terrorism and humane treatment of detainees are not incompatible."

Pakistanis Seize Afghan Militants (NYT)

By Mohammed Khan And Somini Sengupta

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Sept. 13 - With less than a week to go before the crucial elections in Afghanistan, a top Pakistani military commander here said Tuesday that his forces had arrested 21 militants along the border, found a remotely piloted spy plane and seized a cache of arms and communications equipment believed to be used in insurgent operations in Afghanistan.

The commander, Lt. Gen. Safdar Hussain, in charge of military forces and tribal agencies in the North West Frontier Province along the border, also said his forces had detected a recruitment office that was bringing in new fighters for the war against the Afghan government and the American-led forces there.

Afghanistan has blamed infiltrators from Pakistan for a rise in militant activity. As the government has prepared for national and provincial elections on Sunday, a new surge of violence from Taliban forces and their allies has been aimed at election workers, candidates and government installations along the border.

This week, Pakistan said it was willing to erect a fence to block the infiltration of militants into Afghanistan. General Hussain said he favored the idea but pointedly put the burden of fence-building on Afghanistan.

The general said his forces had found a Chinese-made drone aircraft that he said had been used by militants to spy on Pakistani Army activity, and displayed sophisticated radio equipment used to transmit instructions to fighters inside Afghanistan.

Pre-election violence showed no signs of letting up in Afghanistan. A candidate's convoy was hit Tuesday by a roadside bomb in eastern Nangahar Province, bordering Pakistan, wounding two members of his campaign team and two police officers.

LOUISVILLE, Ky. -- Greg Van Tatenhove, the chief federal prosecutor for the eastern half of Kentucky, is in line to become a federal judge after being tapped by President Bush.

Van Tatenhove, the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Kentucky, was nominated to fill a vacancy created on the federal bench when Judge Karl Forester took senior status in May.

In a statement Tuesday, Van Tatenhove thanked Bush for nominating him and expressed gratitude to Republican U.S. Sens. Mitch McConnell and Jim Bunning for their support.

"I look forward now to the confirmation process and will withhold further comment until that process is completed," Van Tatenhove said.

DOJ_NMG_0005216

Van Tatenhove is well connected politically, having served as an assistant to McConnell before attending law school and later as a top aide to U.S. Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky.

McConnell praised the nomination and said his one-time aide would serve with distinction.

"Greg is an intelligent and thoughtful individual who has a temperament that will serve him and the bench well," McConnell said in a statement.

A McConnell spokesman said the Senate hopes to take up the nomination as soon as possible.

Van Tatenhove, 45, has been U.S. attorney for the 67-county Eastern District since 2001. The district runs from Shelbyville to Pikeville and from Covington to the Tennessee line.

He is a 1989 graduate of the University of Kentucky College of Law. His professors included John Rogers, now a member of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Rogers on Tuesday remembered Van Tatenhove as a "diligent, energetic" student.

Van Tatenhove spent four years as a trial attorney for the U.S. Justice Department. He then served as Lewis' chief of staff and legal counsel from 1994 to 2001.

If confirmed as a U.S. District Court judge, Van Tatenhove would mainly be responsible for cases in Pikeville, but could handle cases elsewhere in the district, said Leslie Whitmer, clerk of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District. His yearly salary would be $162,100.

The nomination of someone not from the eastern Kentucky mountains drew some criticism.

Pikeville attorney Larry Webster said the nomination was "an affront to the Big Sandy Valley." Van Tatenhove is a native of Wilmore in central Kentucky.

"Mr. Van Tatenhove's done much to cleanse the political environment in eastern Kentucky," Webster said, referring to a series of election fraud cases from Pike and Knott counties that resulted in convictions of some prominent people, including former state Sen. John Doug Hays. "But the federal judicial selection process has been carefully crafted to avoid danger to the establishment," Webster said in a phone interview.

Webster said cases often are switched from Pikeville to other federal courthouses in the Eastern District. "Any excuses that the judges can come up with to have hearings or trials in other places than here are employed routinely," he said.

Early this year, Forester said that his successor should consider living in Pikeville.

John David Preston, an eastern Kentucky Family Court judge and another candidate for the federal judgeship, said lawyers handling cases in the Pikeville division would prefer a judge from the area. "But for whatever reason, that has not been the case," he said.

Preston said there have been instances when cases in Pikeville were switched to other courthouses in the district, creating "something of an inconvenience and a cost to clients."

Preston said the outcome of the judgeship search left him disappointed but added "the geographical situation was not a factor in the thinking on the appointment."

"I'm sure that he will do a good job as judge," Preston said of Van Tatenhove.

Webster said that having roots in the area can be advantageous for a judge.

"Your knowledge of such things as environmental degradation that comes from mining would be actual knowledge based on reality," he said.

Top D.C. Lawyer Is A Candidate For Judgeship (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

D.C. Attorney General Robert J. Spagnoletti, the city government's chief lawyer, is one of three candidates for an opening on the bench of D.C. Superior Court.

Spagnoletti, 42, has had his eye on a judgeship for at least a few years, but when he took on his current job in May 2003, he indicated to Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) that he was committed to staying through the mayor's current term. The new opportunity comes more than a year before the mayor's race, and Williams has yet to declare whether he will seek reelection.

A prosecutor for 13 years before joining the mayor's Cabinet, Spagnoletti was on the short list for the Superior Court bench once before, in 2000, while he was working at the U.S. attorney's office. His current job has given him a much higher public profile.

In addition to Spagnoletti, the D.C. Judicial Nomination Commission chose Andrew Fois, a former assistant attorney general at the Justice Department, and Carol A. Dalton, a D.C. Superior Court magistrate judge, for consideration by President Bush. The opening was created by the appointment of Judge Noel A. Kramer to the D.C. Court of Appeals.

The president can pick one of the candidates offered by the commission or reject the slate. The president's choice is subject to Senate confirmation. The selection process can be lengthy -- lately, it has taken as long as a year.

Dalton, 55, has been a magistrate judge in the family court division of Superior Court since 2002. Before that, she was director of the court office that coordinates the work of attorneys who represent parents, caretakers and children in abuse and neglect cases.

Fois, 47, was the Justice Department's assistant attorney general for legislative affairs from 1995 to 1998. Before that, he held other positions at the Justice Department and on the House Judiciary Committee. Since 2000, he has served as a senior fellow at GlobalSecurity.org, an organization that tracks military and other security issues.

Spagnoletti took over what was then known as the corporation counsel's office when the city's legal arm was suffering from a heavy caseload, a staffing shortage and slumping morale. He made organizational and personnel changes and succeeded in having the office renamed the attorney general's office, a title he said was more fitting of its responsibilities.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Splits Enron Broadband Case Into Three Retrials (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kristen Hays, Ap Business Writer

Find Law, September 14, 2005

(AP) - HOUSTON-Five former executives from Enron Corp.'s defunct broadband unit whose trial ended with jurors unable to reach verdicts on most charges will be retried in three separate cases next year.

Nearly two months ago a jury returned acquittals on some charges after a three-month trial but was deadlocked on dozens more. U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore declared a mistrial on those charges and set retrial dates Monday.

At least one of the trials, involving conspiracy and fraud counts against the broadband unit's former finance chief and a former in-house accountant, was scheduled for May 1. It is likely to overlap with the conspiracy and fraud trial of Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling, set to begin in January in a courtroom next door to Gilmore's. The other two cases were scheduled for June 5 and Sept. 5.

All five broadband defendants, as well as Lay and Skilling, have pleaded innocent.

Barry Pollack, who represents former in-house Enron broadband accountant Michael Krautz, questioned whether a a fair jury could be found in the middle of the publicity of the ongoing Lay and Skilling trial.

"I have concerns about selecting a jury for this case while that trial is going on," he told Gilmore.

The judge advised him to argue the point later.

The five men, indicted in 2003, went to trial in April in a case often bogged down with tedious, jargon-filled testimony about whether Enron's broadband network actually worked as touted to investors and analysts in 1999 and 2000. The unit went bankrupt along with its parent in December 2001.

A conspiracy charge linked all five defendants in two alleged schemes involving technology and finance.

On the finance side, jurors were deadlocked on all 15 counts of conspiracy and fraud pending against Krautz and Kevin Howard, former finance chief of the broadband unit. The two men are accused of using accounting tricks to manufacture income for the broadband unit so its losses would match those announced to Wall Street in 2000.

On the technology side, former broadband unit CEO Joseph Hirko, software head Rex Shelby and broadband strategist F. Scott Yeager were charged with conspiracy, fraud, insider trading and money laundering. The government alleged they touted capabilities of the network and its operating software to pump up Enron stock and get rich from selling inflated shares. All three testified that the network and software worked but was being implemented in phases.

Jurors acquitted Hirko of 14 of the 27 charges - two for insider trading, the other dozen for money laundering. They acquitted Shelby of four insider trading counts. Shelby's lawyer, Ed Tomko, said that left 16 charges unresolved, including six for insider trading. Both men remain charged with conspiracy and fraud. Gilmore scheduled their trial for Sept. 5.

Yeager faces the most charges. The jury acquitted him of the conspiracy charge linking him to the other defendants and five fraud counts, leaving 109 counts of insider trading and money laundering pending. Prosecutors intend to retry him June 5.

Prosecutor Lisa Monaco told Gilmore on Monday the government aims to file three separate indictments within a month. She said it expects to drop the remaining money laundering charges against Shelby, but otherwise all defendants would be tried on the other pending charges.

Gilmore said Monday she was considering requests from the defendants that she acquit them of all remaining charges.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Court: Eric Rudolph Defense Cost $4M (AP)

By JAY REEVES, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2005

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. (AP) - Legal fees to defend Eric Rudolph in a deadly Alabama abortion clinic blast and the Atlanta Olympics bombing cost taxpayers more than $4 million before he agreed to plead guilty in a deal that spared his life, court documents show.

One of Rudolph's attorneys said Tuesday the bill would have been far higher had the case gone to trial.

"That would have probably tripled the cost," said Bill Bowen, part of a team of at least nine lawyers who defended Rudolph.

Rudolph is serving four life terms after pleading guilty in the Birmingham clinic bombing, which killed a police officer in 1998, and the Olympics bombing, in which a woman died in 1996. He also pleaded guilty in two other bombings that occurred in Atlanta in 1997.

U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said the government had not computed the total cost of prosecuting Rudolph, who was the subject of an intense manhunt following the Birmingham bombing in 1998 until May 2003, when he was captured in Murphy, N.C.

The cost of defending Rudolph was disclosed in an order filed last week by U.S. District Judge Lynwood Smith. Attorneys in the Alabama case were paid $2.02 million for representing Rudolph, who declared himself broke and received court-appointed legal representation following his arrest in 2003.

Experts, investigators and others who assisted in the defense were paid another $2.02 million, according to Smith's order.

Karen Redmond, a spokeswoman with the Administrative Office of U.S. Courts, said the cost of defending Rudolph was far less than the $18 million taxpayers spent on lawyers for Timothy McVeigh, who was convicted in a trial and executed in 2001 for the Oklahoma City bombing, which killed 168 people.

Redmond said the Justice Department spent $80 million prosecuting McVeigh in the Oklahoma City case.

Teen Pleads Guilty To Hacking Paris Hilton's Phone (WP)

By Brian Krebs, Washingtonpost.com Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

A Massachusetts teenager has pleaded guilty to hacking into the cell-phone account of hotel heiress and Hollywood celebrity Paris Hilton, a high-profile stunt by the youngest member of the same hacking group federal investigators say was responsible for a series of electronic break-ins at data giant LexisNexis.

The 17-year-old boy was sentenced to 11 months' detention at a juvenile facility for a string of crimes that include the online posting of revealing photos and celebrity contact numbers from Hilton's phone. As an adult, he will then undergo two years of supervised release in which he will be barred from possessing or using any computer, cell phone or other electronic equipment capable of accessing the Internet.

The U.S. Attorney's Office for Massachusetts and the state district court declined to identify the teen, noting that federal juvenile proceedings and the identity of juvenile defendants are under seal. But a law enforcement official close to the case confirmed that the crimes admitted to by the teen included the hacking of Hilton's account.

The teen also pleaded guilty to making bomb threats at two high schools and for breaking into a telephone company's computer system to set up free wireless-phone accounts for friends. He also participated in an attack on data-collection firm LexisNexis Group that exposed personal records of more than 300,000 consumers. Prosecutors said victims of the teen's actions have suffered about $1 million in damages.

In a series of telephone and online communications between March and June with a washingtonpost.com reporter, the teen acknowledged responsibility for all of the crimes for which he was sentenced.

Washingtonpost.com is not revealing his name because he communicated with the reporter on the condition that he not be identified either directly or through his online alias.

Investigators began focusing on the teen in March 2004 when he sent an expletive-laced e-mail to a high school in Florida threatening to blow it up, according to a statement from prosecutors. The school was closed for two days while a bomb squad, a canine team, the fire department and and other emergency officials examined the building.

In August 2004, the teen broke into the internal computer systems of "a major internet service provider" by tricking an employee into opening a virus-infected file he sent as an e-mail attachment. The virus -- known as a "Trojan horse" program -- allowed the juvenile to use the employee's computer remotely to access other computers on the ISP's internal network and gain access to portions of the company's operational information, prosecutors said.

The teen told washingtonpost.com earlier this year that around that time he broke into the network of Dulles, Va.-based America Online. AOL did not return calls seeking comment.

In January, the teen hacked into the telephone records system of T-Mobile International. He used a security flaw in the company's Web site that allowed him to reset the password of anyone using a Sidekick, a pricey phone-organizer-camera device that stores videos, photos and other data on T-Mobile's central computer servers. A month later, the teen would use that flaw to gain access to Hilton's Sidekick files, according to corroborating information and screen shots he shared with washingtonpost.com.

Later that month, according to prosecutors, an associate of the teen "set up accounts for the juvenile at a company which stores identity information concerning millions of individuals."

Again, prosecutors declined to name the company targeted in that attack. But according to screen shots provided by the teen -- supported by other information from the teen that was verified by a senior federal law enforcement official investigating the case who spoke on condition on anonymity -- the company was LexisNexis, which reported in March that hackers had gained access to the personal records of more than 310,000 Americans.

An adult member of the hacker group acknowledged in phone conversations with a washingtonpost.com reporter that he collaborated with the teen in sending hundreds of e-mails with an explicit image and a message urging recipients to open an attached file to view additional pornographic images of children. According to both hackers, a police officer in Florida was among those who opened the e-mail attachment, which harbored a virus-like program that allowed the hackers to record anything a victim typed on his or her computer keyboard. Not long after his computer was infected with the keystroke-capturing program, the officer logged on to his police department's account at Accurint, a LexisNexis service provided by Florida-based subsidiary Seisint Inc., which sells access to consumer data.

The teen said the group members then created a series of sub-accounts using the police department's name and billing information. Over the period of several days, the group looked up thousands of names in the database, including those of friends and celebrities.

Then in June, according to prosecutors, he called "a major telephone service provider because a phone that a friend had fraudulently activated had been shut off." (A washingtonpost.com reporter was invited to listen in on the call, which was made to Little Rock-based Alltel Corp.) When the company refused to provide the requested access, the teen threatened to cripple its Web site with a "distributed denial of service" attack, in which attackers use the Internet bandwidth of hundreds or thousands of remote-controlled computers to overwhelm a site with so much traffic that it can no longer accommodate legitimate visitors.

Roughly 10 minutes later the teen and others "initiated a denial of service attack that succeeded in shutting down a significant portion of the telephone service provider's web operations," according to the prosecutors.

The Justice Department said the investigation of the teen's associates is continuing, but it remains unclear how many of those individuals will be prosecuted. In May, Secret Service and FBI officials served search warrants on at least nine people thought to be connected to the hacking ring of which the teen was a member, known as the "Defonic Team Screen Name Club" or "DFNCTSC" for short.

The teen is likely to be required as a condition of his plea agreement to cooperate with the government in their ongoing investigation and provide information not only about how the attacks were carried out, but who else was involved and what their roles were, said Mark D. Rasch, senior vice president at McLean, Va.-based online security firm Solutionary Inc. and a former federal prosecutor for computer crimes.

According to interviews with at least two other former members of the group, investigators now are focusing on the individual who helped the teen gain access to LexisNexis.

"They came and took my laptop and asked a whole bunch of questions about him," a former group member known online as "DJint" said. "They told me they're looking to go after him for access-device fraud and possession of child pornography."

Still, Rasch said, it could be some time before the government wraps up its investigation into these attacks.

"Investigations of computer crimes are particularly difficult because they always involve many different types of evidence from numerous locations, and they require cooperation from many different organizations," Rasch said. "It's hard work."

Dentist Gets 57-month Term For Fraud (SBT)

By MARTI GOODLAD HELINE, Tribune Staff Writer

South Bend (IN) Tribune, September 13, 2005

SOUTH BEND -- A former Warsaw dentist who operated a mobile dental lab in the South Bend area has been sentenced to 57 months in prison for Medicaid fraud.

Spilmon, 44, pleaded guilty to 12 counts of health care fraud and one count of money laundering.

The remaining charges in the 52-count indictment were dismissed, as were charges filed against Spilmon's wife, Diane.

At the time of his guilty plea, Spilmon admitted to submitting billings and claims for reimbursement to Medicaid for treatments and diagnostic procedures that were never done or were not necessary.

Spilmon was accused of falsely billing the heath care benefits program for the needy for more than $2.4 million from 2001 to 2003.

He took his mobile dental units to areas where he could serve needy youths between 12 and 18, purporting to provide adequate dental care for them, when he was just engaging in a massive billing fraud, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Donald Schmid.

Sharp ordered Spilmon to make restitution of $2.4 million. Spilmon also was ordered to reimburse the Indiana attorney general's Medicaid Fraud Unit more than $70,000 for the costs of investigating the case.

In addition, Spilmon agreed to forfeit several vehicles, including two Lexus cars, a Subaru, a camper, a pickup truck and the mobile dental units. He and his wife also forfeited the contents of about 40 accounts at financial institutions, according to court documents.

The forfeitures have already netted some $2.3 million for the government, and that amount could reach $2.5 million by the time all the forfeited items are sold.

The U.S. Marshals Service may take the two mobile dental units to the Gulf Coast to assist in Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, Schmid said.

Sharp agreed to a term of the plea agreement in which Spilmon could be credited up to 50 percent of the value of the forfeited items toward the restitution obligation. That amount could reduce his restitution debt to $1.2 million.

The case was a very significant one for the government, according to Schmid. "The scope of the fraud is quite large and the investigative work by the Medicaid Fraud Unit and the FBI was outstanding."

Spilmon later tried to withdraw the guilty plea, asserting his innocence, but Sharp would not permit him to take it back.

Spilmon was ordered to report Oct. 11 to begin his term.

Four Admit Illegal Sale Of Electronics Gear To China (NSDY/AP)

By Jeffrey Gold, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2005

NEWARK, N.J. -- Four people who operated an electronics firm in southern New Jersey pleaded guilty Tuesday to violating export regulations by shipping nearly $400,000 of electronics that could be used for military purposes to entities controlled by the Chinese government.

The case involving Manten Electronics Inc. is the latest, but far from the largest, to deal with illegal technology and arms exports to China.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement said it has seen a dramatic increase in the shipment of sensitive technology and weapons components to China. Since January 2000, the agency has launched more than 400 investigations into illegal technology and arms exports to China.

The four people at Manten, as well as four people at Universal Technologies Inc. in Mount Laurel, were arrested in July 2004 following an 18-month investigation by ICE, the FBI and the U.S. Commerce Department.

Prosecutors have reached plea deals with the Universal defendants but the agreements have not yet been formalized, Assistant U.S. Attorney Judith H. Germano said.

Among the restricted items Manten obtained were monolithic microwave integrated circuits, an electronics component used in a variety of weapons systems and found on U.S. bombers, fighter aircraft, military helicopters, missiles and satellites, according to court papers.

In court Tuesday, Manten president Xu Weibo and his three co-defendants each pleaded guilty to a single charge of conspiring to violate export laws, admitting that they sent restricted items at the request at least two Chinese agencies, the 20th and 41st Research Institutes. They admitted they lied to U.S. distributors and on shipping documents to conceal the nature of the shipments. The conspiracy charge carries up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 or twice any profit.

The two Chinese agencies are part of the Ministry of Information Industry and develop military and civilian communications technology, according to court papers. Specialties of the 20th include aircraft landing systems and military radio-navigation technology. Work at the 41st includes military amplifiers and testing devices for military instruments.

The Commerce Department in May 2001 said the 20th Research Institute "poses an unacceptable risk in the development of weapons of mass destruction or the missiles used to deliver weapons of mass destruction," according to court papers.

Weibo, 38, also pleaded guilty to violating the Export Administration Act, which carries up to 10 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 or five times the value of the export or twice any profit; and a count of violating the Arms Export Control Act, which carries up to 10 years in prison and a fine of up to $1 million or five times the value of the export or twice any profit.

Also pleading guilty was his wife, purchasing agent Xiu Ling Chen, also known as Linda, 33, of Mount Laurel; her brother, vice president Hao Li Chen, known as Ali, 29, of Mount Laurel; and his wife, controller Kwan Chun Chan, known as Jenny, 29, of Mount Laurel.

The four agreed to forfeit $391,337, which Germano said represented the revenue from illegal sales made from June 2002 until Manten was closed with the arrests in July 2004.

All four are naturalized U.S. citizens from China. The women used a translator to follow court proceedings, but answered in English when questioned by U.S. District Judge Joseph A. Greenaway Jr. They remain free on bail pending sentencing, scheduled for Feb. 6.

U.S. Asks Manila To Uncover Suspected Spy Links (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

Filed at 7:18 a.m. ET

MANILA (Reuters) - The United States has asked the Philippines to help it trace recipients of classified documents suspected to have been stolen by a former Filipino police officer and an FBI employee, a senior official said on Tuesday.

Michael Ray Aquino, a former top police official in the Philippines, and Leandro Aragoncillo, a Philippine-born U.S. citizen, were arrested in the United States on espionage charges on Saturday.

The Philippine foreign affairs department said in a statement that the charge sheet accused Aquino, a known ally of senior opposition politicians, of passing classified papers from the Federal Bureau of Investigation to two ``national level'' officials and one ``former national level'' official in Manila.

``The FBI is now asking for our help to find out who received those documents here in the Philippines and who provided the money for the transaction,'' Reynaldo Wycoco, head of the National Bureau of Investigation (NBI), told reporters.

Wycoco said the information was a ``classified assessment of the Philippine political situation and political leaders.''

According to affidavits from FBI agents, Aragoncillo passed classified documents about the Philippines to Aquino between February and August this year using cellphone text and e-mail messages.

The Philippines has been through months of political turmoil sparked by allegations of electoral fraud and graft against President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo, who last week survived an impeachment attempt by the opposition.

Wycoco added that recipients of the classified documents could be indicted by U.S. or Philippine courts.

Aquino moved to the United States in 2001 after the ouster of former President Joseph Estrada in a military-backed popular uprising.

The Philippine foreign ministry said Aquino was arrested at his Queens residence in New York on Saturday and is being held at Passaic County Correctional while awaiting court hearings.

FBI Takes Sheriff's Elections Records (HTRIB)

By TODD RUGER

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), September 14, 2005

SARASOTA — The FBI has subpoenaed Sarasota County Sheriff William Balkwill's campaign financial reports for the 2000 and 2004 elections.

Balkwill does not know why the records were subpoenaed, Sheriff's Office spokesman Lt. Chuck Lesaltato said Tuesday.

"He has no idea," Lesaltato said.

The FBI has not served a subpoena to Balkwill or anyone else in the Sheriff's Office, Lesaltato said.

The FBI special agent listed on the subpoena declined to comment Tuesday, referring questions to the FBI spokeswoman in Tampa.

That spokeswoman, Sara Oates, said the FBI does not confirm or deny the existence of any investigations.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Tampa also declined to comment on the subpoena.

The records are hundreds of pages detailing the finances of Balkwill's campaigns, including lists of who donated to his elections and how he spent that money.

The donations generally range from $10 to $200 and were made by area residents, businesses and law enforcement officers.

The paperwork is filed periodically, as required by state law, and is open to public inspection.

AP, September 14, 2005

NASHVILLE, Tenn. The U-S Attorney for Middle Tennessee says a former lawyer wanted on fraud and money-laundering charges has been brought back to Nashville from Brazil.

U-S Attorney Jim Vines says Nason is charged with conspiracy to defraud mortgage loan companies and financial institutions, mail fraud, bank fraud, money laundering and false statements to financial institutions.

Prosecutors say Nason and the others bought properties, then sold them to "straw buyers" at inflated prices. The government says the "straw buyers" borrowed from the banks and mortgage lenders and the alleged conspirators paid them ten-thousand dollars per sale for helping in the scam.

Thirteen loans were taken out, for a total of more than three (m) million dollars.Nason fought extradition all the way to the Brazilian Supreme Court, which turned him down.Federal marshals returned him to Nashville over the weekend.

Mass. Attorney, GOP Official Charged With Money Laundering (LAW/AP)

By Denise Lavoie, The Associated Press

Law.com, September 14, 2005

The vice chairman of the Massachusetts Republican Party was charged Tuesday with money laundering after he allegedly offered to "cleanse" drug proceeds for a legal client.

Lawrence Novak, 54, an attorney from Brockton, Ma., was arrested at his home Tuesday after investigators said he allegedly offered to launder drug profits for Scott Holyoke, who is awaiting trial on federal drug trafficking charges and agreed to be a cooperating witness against Novak for the FBI.

Novak was taken into custody after he allegedly deposited money in a Brockton bank, federal authorities said.

Gov. Mitt Romney called for Novak to step down while the investigation continues.

"The charges against Larry Novak are very troubling and Gov. Romney believes that it's appropriate while these charges are pending for Mr. Novak to step aside as vice chairman of the state party," said Romney's spokesman, Eric Fehrnstrom.

Republican Party Executive Director Tim O'Brien said the charges are unrelated to Novak's GOP role. Novak served as the party's treasurer in the late 1990s.

"We're shocked to hear about the developments. These are very serious allegations that we are going to be following very closely," O'Brien said.

Novak made an initial appearance in U.S. District Court late Tuesday and was released on $25,000 non-surety bond. Neither he nor his attorney would comment on the charges.

Novak allegedly offered to have Holyoke sign false affidavits in an attempt to invalidate some of his prior state court convictions in order to reduce the sentence he would face in his federal case.

Holyoke told Novak that he had over $100,000 in cash in a safe deposit box, repeatedly telling Novak that the money was drug proceeds, according to an affidavit filed by Lauren Youngquist, a special agent with the criminal investigation unit of the Internal Revenue Service.

Novak allegedly told Holyoke that he would take approximately $60,000 of the money as a legal fee and offered to "clean" or "cleanse" the remainder of the cash, the affidavit said.

According to the arrest affidavit, after Novak made the offer to launder Holyoke's drug proceeds, the IRS and FBI introduced an undercover IRS special agent who posed as Holyoke's aunt.

On Tuesday, the agent gave Novak approximately $107,000 in cash and told Novak it was drug proceeds. Novak then took the money to Eastern Bank in Brockton, where he purchased three bank checks in the amount of $9,000 and three $1,000 money orders.

He deposited $77,000 into an existing account at the bank, according to the arrest affidavit.

Novak then returned to his home and office, where he was arrested.

A bank employee told the IRS special agent that when Novak deposited the cash and purchased the bank checks, he said he had found the money.

Novak is due back in court on Oct. 3. He faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine if convicted.

Female Killer Set For Death Penalty (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

DALLAS -- Texas stands ready today to execute the first black woman, and only the third female, to be put to death since the state resumed capital punishment in 1982.

Frances Newton, 40, was convicted of murdering her husband and two children in 1987. She always has maintained her innocence, though prosecutors convinced a Harris County jury that she killed her family for $100,000 in insurance money.

Only a last minute stay of execution by Gov. Rick Perry or intervention by the Supreme Court can halt the execution. Newton's lawyers wrote a letter to Mr. Perry Monday, asking for a 30-day stay in their efforts to show that prosecutors erred in linking her to a presumed murder weapon.

Unlike the days preceding the executions of Karla Faye Tucker in 1998 and Betty Lou Beets in 2002, Newton's plight has not elicited much interest from outside the state, although the president of the American Bar Association has asked the governor to intercede, citing "compelling new evidence" that "has not been evaluated by Texas courts."

Michael S. Greco, the ABA president, said Newton was not properly represented by her court-appointed lawyer, Ron Mock of Houston -- a lawyer who often has been reprimanded by the state bar and is now prohibited from representing clients in death penalty cases because of his inadequacy. Mr. Mock told the judge the day her trial began that he had not interviewed a single witness on behalf of Newton.

David Dow, a Houston lawyer who now represents Newton, wrote the governor saying courts had been "influenced by a lie" in the state's assertion that a gun placed in an abandoned house was the one used to kill her family.

"Newton," he wrote, "has always admitted she placed a gun in an abandoned house. We know, however, that the State recovered at least two guns and perhaps as many as three, and we have reason to believe that at least two guns, and possibly all three, were handguns manufactured by Raven Arms. What that means is that we have absolutely no reason to believe the gun Newton admits to having placed [made by a different manufacturer] was the murder weapon."

One assistant district attorney testified that only one gun was found. A top police officer said he thought two had been recovered. Another assistant district attorney told a Dutch television newsman there had been two.

Few believe Mr. Perry will intercede and halt the execution. Last December he granted a 120-day stay.

In the past week, the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals voted not to stop the scheduled execution and the Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles voted 7-0 not to recommend that the governor commute the sentence to life in prison. Mr. Dow has filed a final appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Austin American Statesman editorialized strongly Monday that Newton should not be executed. "Race, ethnicity, income and geography all are factors in the imposition of death sentences. As long as Texas has a death penalty, capital defendants should have access to competent legal counsel. Newton didn't get that. For that reason she should be spared."

Two DeLay Associates Indicted (DMN)

By Wayne Slater

The Dallas Morning News, September 14, 2005

AUSTIN – Two political associates of U.S. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay were indicted Tuesday on additional felony charges of illegally using corporate money to elect Republicans in 2002.

John Colyandro and Jim Ellis were charged with using $190,000 in corporate money to make campaign contributions to GOP candidates for the Texas House in what prosecutors say was an illegal money-laundering scheme.

Mr. Colyandro, former executive director of the Texans for a Republican Majority Political Action Committee, and Mr. Ellis, who heads Mr. DeLay's Washington-based Americans for a Republican Majority, were indicted earlier on money-laundering charges. Tuesday's charges focus on the campaign contributions. Both defendants deny wrongdoing.

Mr. DeLay, the Sugar Land Republican who created both political action committees, is not charged in the three-year grand jury investigation into allegations of illegal corporate cash in Texas political races.

An attorney for Mr. Ellis complained Tuesday that it was the second time the Travis County district attorney has revised the indictment to add charges.

"There is nothing new in the facts alleged in the latest version of the indictment," J.D. Pauerstein said. "Indicting these men three different times for the same alleged acts is unconscionable."

It is illegal in Texas to use corporate money to elect candidates. Texas law also prohibits corporate donations to political parties during the final 60 days of an election.

Mr. Colyandro and Mr. Ellis are accused of sending $190,000 in corporate money to the national Republican Party, which then issued the same amount in political party funds to seven Texas legislative candidates. Prosecutors say the transaction was designed to hide the source of the money.

After the Republicans won a Texas House majority in 2002, Rep. Tom Craddick of Midland was elected speaker. He helped Mr. DeLay achieve the goal of redrawing the Texas congressional map, and in 2004, the party won five more U.S. House seats.

The original $190,000 check was dated Sept. 13, 2002. A three-year statute of limitations would have expired Tuesday on additional charges.

The Travis County grand jury has also indicted TRMPAC and the state's largest business group, the Texas Association of Business, on charges of violating state campaign finance laws.

Meanwhile, a federal judge has dismissed a separate civil case brought against Mr. Colyandro by two Texas Democrats.

Judge Lee Yeakel ruled that lawyers for the Democrats had failed to prove that Mr. Colyandro had knowingly broken Texas law by using corporate money to fund campaign advertisements.

CIVIL LAW:

2nd Circuit Approves Holocaust Settlement Allocation Formula (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

Law.com, September 14, 2005

An Eastern District of New York judge's allocation of settlement funds to the most needy, elderly victims in the Holocaust Victims Assets litigation has been upheld by a federal appeals court.

In a decision issued Friday written by Judge Jose Cabranes, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the formula used by Judge Edward Korman that placed special emphasis on compensating Holocaust victims who live in the former Soviet Union.

The principal issues in the appeals were settled by the circuit in In Re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation cases 04-1898-cv and 04-1899-cv. The appeals challenged Korman's geography-based allocation of a $1.25 billion settlement with Swiss banks and other organizations designed to aid victims of the Holocaust.

The proceeds of the settlement are to be divided among five classes -- the Deposited Assets Class (those whose assets were stolen from Swiss banks); the Looted Assets Class (those whose possessions were stolen by the Nazis and then disposed of through Swiss banks), two classes of those forced into slave labor by the Nazis, and a fifth Refugee Class.

Special Master Judah Gribetz, of counsel at Bingham McCutchen, concluded that the Settlement Agreement gave priority to members of the Deposited Assets Class -- which should receive roughly $800 million based on evidence that as many as 54,000 Swiss bank accounts are "probably" or "possibly" related to Holocaust victims.

The remainder, he suggested, should be allocated to the other classes, including the Looted Assets Class. Gribetz recommended that, at least during the first stages, distributions should be focused on surviving Holocaust victims among the Looted Class members "who are in greatest financial need."

Of the $90 million to go to programs for the neediest survivors, Gribetz proposed earmarking 75 percent for destitute Jewish victims of Nazi persecution in the former Soviet Union.

While the total amount of funds was later increased for the Looted Assets Class, the proportions of the allocation remained the same when Korman adopted Gribetz's supplemental recommendations in 2002 and 2003.

In 2004, Korman turned aside an objection to the allocation formula by The Holocaust Survivors Foundation-U.S.A. Inc. and others who argued that survivors in the United States had received a disproportionately small allocation.

Korman endorsed the formula partly because of the wildly disproportionate distribution of restitution funds to survivors since the end of World War II. But he also favored the formula given the harsh conditions survivors endured both during Communism and after its collapse.

Korman noted that "the financial situation of individual survivors in the Former Soviet Union ... is woeful in comparison to that of survivors in the United States."

Judges Thomas Meskill and Jon Newman joined in the appeal.

JUDGE WITHIN HIS DISCRETION

Cabranes said appellants were not challenging the District Court's discretion to distribute settlement proceeds to the neediest members, only "whether the District Court exceeded the bounds of that general principle in this case by allocating funds partly on the basis of geographic disparities in the provision of basic needs."

The conclusion, Cabranes said, was that Korman was "well within his discretion."

"We recognize that, in a traditional class action brought to remedy an injury that had occurred shortly before the initiation of suit, the amounts allocated among claimants would normally vary primarily by the effect of the injury upon different claimants, rather than by the current financial needs of the claimants," Cabranes said. "But in the circumstances presented by this case, we think the equitable principles of the cy pres doctrine permit the geographic variation that the District Court adopted."

The circuit gave considerable weight to Korman's focus on prior restitution.

"As that Court pointed out, survivors residing in the Former Soviet Union had been cut off by the prior Soviet regime from the ten prior major efforts at Holocaust reparations, and of the $53 billion that has been provided to Holocaust victims through these prior efforts, $14.8 billion or 28 percent has gone to survivors in the United States and only $444 million or 0.8 percent has gone to survivors in the Former Soviet Union," Cabranes said.

In the end, Korman's decision to allocate 75 percent of Looted Assets Class funds to needy Jewish survivors in the former Soviet Union "was rendered after the District Court carefully weighed all relevant considerations and made numerous factual findings," he said.

Korman "acted well within his discretion, and we find no support in the record of this case for appellants' suggestion that the Court acted in a 'totally subjective' manner," he said.

Despite a series of challenges to his rulings in this and other appeals, Cabranes said, Korman has approached every step of the litigation with "thoughtful analysis and scrupulous fairness."

Edward Labaton of Goodkind Labaton Rudoff & Sucharow was lead attorney for appellants in cases 04-1898-cv and 04-1899-cv. Burt Neuborne was the lead settlement counsel.

The circuit also upheld Korman's refusal to allocate funds to a trust that would have provided grants to "disability oriented, non-profit, non-governmental organizations," and his rejection of a second proposal to make allocations in support of "scholarly, educational and outreach programs" related to the Nazi persecution of homosexuals.

The circuit's accompanying decisions upholding Korman's discretion of those issues came in cases 04-2466-cv and 04-2511-cv, respectively.

Cold War Drags On — Forever (USAT)

USA Today, September 14, 2005

By the end of next week, President Bush has to decide what to do with a list of military base closings and realignments he received Thursday from a special commission. The president has two choices: approve the list, or kick it back to the commission for further review.

Because the panel gave the Pentagon most of what it sought, and because Bush is occupied with Hurricane Katrina and other issues, he's not expected to pick a fight.

But this is a fight worth picking.

This is the final round of a 17-year process aimed at trimming forces that were needed to fight the Cold War. A succession of commissions were created to overcome political opposition. Yet this commission still spared costly Air Force and Navy bases that the Pentagon doesn't want.

As absurd as this is, it's not as absurd as the reaction of several governors, who are suing to reverse the panel's modest changes to National Guard bases. Connecticut's governor, for instance, says A-10 planes need to be based there for homeland security. A-10s are used for strafing ground forces. Perhaps Gov. M. Jodi Rell fears invasion from Canada.

Rejecting the commission's report would signal the governors that the Pentagon needs to focus on the terror threat from abroad, not domestic jobs at Guard bases. And a rejection would force the commission to reconsider other questionable decisions born of the same misplaced motivations:

Tolerating excess submarine capacity. Submarines play a minor role in the terror war, and the country doesn't need three East Coast submarine bases. Nor does it need to retain its excess submarine repair capacity. And yet the commission elected to keep open the submarine base in New London, Conn., as well as the Portsmouth sub repair yard in Kittery, Maine.

Delaying base closings. Though the panel agreed that New Mexico's Cannon Air Force Base should lose its four F-16 fighter squadrons, it delayed closing the station — just in case the military could find a new use. Commissioners feared the impact that losing 5,000 jobs would have on the tiny city outside Cannon. But generosity was not the commission's mission.

Just as ill-advised was the decision to keep open South Dakota's Ellsworth Air Force Base. Many suspect politics played a role there because killing Ellsworth could have been fatal to the career of freshman Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., who won his seat by promising to keep the base open. There's no proof, argued the commission, that consolidating the entire B-1 fleet at a single base in Texas would save money.

Common sense suggests otherwise.

The president has a full plate right now, but he shouldn't pass up a chance to save money and improve defense — even if it means putting the commission back to work.

Thune: Ready To Roll (RC)

By Mark Preston

Roll Call, September 14, 2005

A few days before a federal commission was scheduled to decide the fate of Ellsworth Air Force Base, South Dakota's two Senators preemptively released a lengthy statement pledging to work together on issues of importance to the state.

"We both strongly believe that the time for emphasizing partisan differences and partisan attacks is long over and that South Dakotans are eager that both of us work as closely together as possible, which we are committed to doing," Sens. John Thune (R) and Tim Johnson (D) wrote in the Aug. 23 letter.

It was a striking public statement from two political enemies who had spent the better part of the past four years trying to end the other's career. But the declaration came at a time when both Senators were bracing for the worst: the loss of a military base that is their state's second largest employer.

Within 72 hours, they were saved from their greatest fear, as the Base Realignment and Closure Commission shunned the Pentagon's recommendation to shutter Ellsworth and voted instead to keep the base open.

Now, the question is how long will the Thune-Johnson alliance remain intact, given that these two political rivals may be headed for yet another showdown in 2008.

Thune is the early frontrunner to lead the National Republican Senatorial Committee in the 2008 election cycle — the same year that Johnson will be seeking a third term. Johnson said he "anticipates" that Thune will be the chairman of the NRSC, and acknowledged "maybe this will come apart, but I hope not."

"I think we have ... come to terms with an understanding we will work together where we can," Johnson said.

For Thune, the decision to keep Ellsworth open allows him to expand his political portfolio beyond South Dakota's borders. The Republican Senator had campaigned in 2004 on the idea that, as a Republican in a GOP-controlled capital, he would be best positioned to keep the base open. That's why the closing of Ellsworth, had it happened, would have been so damaging: It would have forced Thune to shore up support in his home state rather than advancing his national ambitions.

But by helping convince BRAC to keep the base open, Thune has instead added to his reputation of overcoming long odds to win. Less than a year earlier, Thune defeated Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) in the most closely watched Senate race of 2004. His campaign victory earned him the title of "giant killer" for being the first challenger to defeat a Senate leader in more than half a century.

The Pentagon, which recommended that Ellsworth be closed, is Thune's latest adversary to go down in defeat.

"He was extraordinarily effective in making the case about the impact of [closing Ellsworth] on his state," said Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). "Typically, these BRAC recommendations are not adjusted in any major way, but I would call that a major adjustment. That was a great victory for him."

Much to the chagrin of GOP officials, Thune suspended all campaign activity once it was announced in the spring that Ellsworth was being targeted for closure. He declined invitations to appear at Republican fundraisers across the country and even postponed a $100,000 event in New York City for his own political action committee.

The Ellsworth victory now allows Thune to spend part of his time helping the national Republican Party. He recently appeared at two fundraisers that raised about $200,000 for Sen. James Inhofe (R-Okla.). And the South Dakota Republican acknowledged that he is interested in chairing the NRSC in the 2008 election cycle.

"Some folks have talked to me about it, and I am at least entertaining the thought of possibly running for that," Thune said in an interview last week. "It is early on right now, but I think the key is recruiting good candidates and then raising money, and those are two things I think I can do well."

"It is clear his priority is not South Dakota," charged Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "BRAC was not a big victory for him, but rather a big sigh of relief for him."

But Republicans were quick to point out that whether Democrats like it or not, Thune has a national profile. Inhofe said many of the contributors that attended his fundraisers told him they had donated to Thune's 2004 campaign.

"Almost everyone who came in, of course they were real heavy hitters for me, almost everyone of them had given to him," Inhofe said. "So that gives you an idea of the national significance of his race and the national impression that is out there."

Further evidence of Thune's national appeal is the fact that his PAC raked in more than $500,000 in the first six months of this year.

McConnell, who is expected to succeed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in the 110th Congress, said Thune has the qualities to be an effective leader of the NRSC.

"I think anyone who has won a tough race, you develop the kind of campaign skills that are very useful in a job like that," said McConnell, himself a former two-term NRSC chairman. "He certainly demonstrated, I think, great political skill."

Even though Thune is generally considered a loyal soldier for the GOP, Thune confidants said he is not afraid to use his political skills against his own party if it aids his own state. His allies note that when the White House refused to help Thune in his bid to keep Ellsworth open, the freshman Senator openly opposed President Bush's nominee for U.N. ambassador, John Bolton, though Thune himself never made the linkage.

Thune said he holds no animosity toward the Bush administration, but added in an interview that he would not support the administration in the future on issues where their "mutual interests are not aligned."

For now, Thune said he is evaluating each campaign fundraising request "on a case-by-case basis" to determine where he can be of the most assistance.

"I want to be helpful to the team and keep the majority in the Senate," Thune said. "There are a number of colleagues running this time who are friends, and I will do as much heavy lifting as I can."

Corrections Department Under FBI Investigation (SPT)

St. Petersburg (FL) Times, September 14, 2005

TALLAHASSEE - The FBI confirmed Tuesday it is investigating the Florida Department of Corrections, though the nature of the probe is unclear.

FBI agents are working with the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, said FBI spokesman Jeff Westcott in Jacksonville. He declined to provide details.

"I can confirm that the FBI, along with FDLE, are involved in an investigation that concerns the Department of Corrections," Westcott said.

A high-ranking state prison official, Region I director Allen "A.C." Clark, quit last week without explanation. Clark rose through the ranks under Corrections Secretary James Crosby, who also has declined to discuss why he quit, other than citing "personal reasons."

Gov. Jeb Bush suggested Monday that he knew details but could discuss them.

Four current or former Corrections Department employees were charged in February with illegal distribution of steroids. The case involved the Justice Department, FDLE, Clay County Sheriff's Office and federal postal inspectors.

CHARLOTTE — In a national report issued Tuesday, the Federal Reserve Board said blacks and Hispanics disproportionately receive high interest rates on mortgage loans, that it does not know why and it intends to find out.

Regulators will examine lending by about 200 selected companies to see if discrimination affected pricing decisions, the report said. The Fed declined to name the firms.

The Fed also said it will examine whether blacks and Hispanics are sometimes steered to high-rate lenders when they could qualify for a market-rate loan.

The report is the federal government's opening statement in an accelerating public debate about the role of race in loan pricing.

For the first time, lenders must disclose which of their loans carry a high rate.

The Charlotte Observer reported in August that blacks were four times as likely as whites last year to receive high rates on home purchase loans, based on the newspaper's analysis of about half of all loans. Hispanics were twice as likely.

Charlotte's big banks, Bank of America Corp. and Wachovia Corp., made few high-rate loans last year. They also made relatively few loans to blacks.

The gaps do not prove discrimination. Lenders say pricing is based on risk and that race is not considered. They emphasize that the data do not include credit scores, down payment amounts or other factors lenders use to determine interest rates.

But the Fed report said discrimination might be a part of the explanation. The report found that many of the disparities resulted from the fact that minorities are far more likely than whites to borrow from companies that specialize in loans with high rates. In 2004, interest rates of about 8 percent and higher were considered high, while market rates averaged around 6 percent.

In addition to the possibility that borrowers are steered to high-rate lenders, the Fed said it will explore whether some market-rate lenders fail to make their loans equally available in minority communities.

"This industry is certainly under a spotlight," said Paul Hancock, a lawyer who once led the Justice Department's enforcement of fair housing laws and now works with lenders on compliance issues. "To the extent that differences in loan prices are correlated with race and national origins, the burden will be on the lender to explain the reason for the differences."

Playing Games With Voting Rights (NYT)

The State of Pennsylvania took a shameful step backward when the State House passed a bill that could potentially deprive tens of thousands of parolees and probationers of the right to vote. Even if the bill fails to be passed by the State Senate - as many people predict - it will inevitably suppress the vote in the poor and mainly minority communities where ex-felons tend to live. People in those communities are already confused about their rights under the law, and many who are actually eligible to vote don't do so out of fear that they may penalized or turned away at the polls.

The Pennsylvania bill comes at a time when the rest of the country is moving in the opposite direction. Over the last decade, a dozen states have softened or revoked disenfranchisement laws, understanding that voting rights are integral to the mission of reintegrating ex-offenders into the community. Indeed, the American Correctional Association, which represents prison officials, recently called on states everywhere to stop barring ex-offenders from the polls because that practice was inconsistent with the goal of rehabilitation.

The Pennsylvania bill represents an odious attempt by lawmakers to undo a state court ruling overturning a law that required newly released prisoners to wait five years before getting the right to vote. Republican lawmakers who disliked the court ruling liked it even less when community activists in Democratic parts of the state began to inform ex-felons that they now had the right to return to the polls. Legislators are also trying to direct public attention away from a hugely unpopular pay raise that they voted for themselves earlier this year. That makes the attack on voting rights all the more reprehensible.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft, Google Both Claim Victory (WP)

By David A. Vise

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

A ferocious battle for the loyalty of computer users, pitting mighty Microsoft Corp. against search engine juggernaut Google Inc., is playing out in a court case that feels more like a barroom brawl than a staid conflict over one company hiring an executive away from the other.

The feud between the companies reaches the highest levels of the corporate suites and has burst into public view amid court proceedings laced with bitterness and foul language. As the heavyweight and incumbent, Microsoft is trying to defend itself against attacks involving recruiting, products and innovation from a scrappy rival that poses a threat to its preeminent position in personal computing.

Yesterday, a judge in Washington state ruled that a former Microsoft executive hired by Google can begin doing some, but not all, work for the search engine company in China, the latest twist in a battle that will play out into next year.

In a written opinion, King County Superior Court Judge Steven C. Gonzalez ruled that Kai-Fu Lee can start recruiting employees for Google, meeting with government and university officials, and establishing a headquarters for Google's new research center. But, pending a trial in January, the judge barred Lee from hiring anyone away from Microsoft, using confidential information he learned during his employment there, or working in computer search and other specified fields for Google.

Not surprisingly -- given the ongoing war of words prompted by anger over Google's hirings of dozens of Microsoft employees around the world -- both sides immediately declared victory.

Tom Burt, Microsoft's deputy general counsel for litigation, said the Redmond, Wash.-based software giant had succeeded in severely restricting Lee's activities and use of corporate secrets. He said Google was paying Lee $10 million to head its China operations even though he could actually do very little of substance in light of the ruling.

"Dr. Lee has been reduced to the highest-paid HR [human resources] manager in history," Burt said. "Even calling him an HR manager is overstating it because an HR manger has an idea what new jobs will be, and how employees will be managed. . . . I'm sure Google and Dr. Lee will portray this as a split decision. It is like a boxer who lost on a third-round knockout saying, 'Yeah, but I got a good jab in there, didn't I?' "

Nicole Wong, associate general counsel for Google, said Lee would immediately get rolling, hiring employees in China and establishing a new research center there. "We're thrilled, and he's excited to get right to work on several big things," Wang said in a written statement. "The bottom line is Dr. Lee is going to get busy."

Depositions filed in the case revealed that top Microsoft officials, including CEO Steven A. Ballmer, increasingly saw Google as a serious competitive threat, and alleged, that angry outbursts have occurred. Mark Lucovsky, a former Microsoft executive, alleged in an affidavit that he had a stormy meeting with Ballmer as he left the company in November last year.

"At some point in the conversation, Mr. Ballmer said, 'Just tell me it's not Google,' " Lucovsky stated. "I told him it was Google. At that point, Mr. Ballmer picked up a chair and threw it across the room, hitting a table in his office." After cursing about how he was going "to bury" Google chief executive Eric Schmidt, Lucovsky stated, Ballmer said: "I have done it before, and I will do it again. I'm going to [expletive] kill Google."

Ballmer also allegedly sought to persuade Lucovsky to stay at Microsoft during the meeting and in phone calls. Microsoft said Lucovsky's description exaggerated what occurred in his exit meeting and conversations with Ballmer.

In a separate affidavit, Lee said that before leaving Microsoft for Google last summer, he had a series of tense meetings with top Microsoft officials, including Chairman Bill Gates, Ballmer and others. They told the Chinese computer scientist, the highest-ranking employee snared by Google, that a lawsuit would be filed if he left for Google, Lee stated.

"You should not go. Things will be very unpleasant for you if you go," Microsoft senior vice president Rick Rashid allegedly told Lee.

"Kai-Fu, Steve is definitely going to sue you and Google over this," Gates allegedly warned Lee. "He has been looking for something just like this."

Lee said Ballmer told him: "When we do something, please don't take it personally. We like you. Your contributions to Microsoft have been immense. It's not you we are after, it is Google."

In his ruling yesterday, the judge found that Lee misled Microsoft about his plans to return to the company after a sabbatical and continued to have access to proprietary information. "Dr. Lee began assisting Google while he was still employed at Microsoft," Gonzalez wrote.

Judge Rules On Ex-Microsoft Exec's New Work (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gene Johnson, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 14, 2005

(AP) - SEATTLE-A state judge, ruling in a case that exposed the behind-the-scenes animosity between two high-tech titans, cleared the way Tuesday for a former Microsoft Corp. executive to perform most of the tasks rival Google Inc. had hired him to do.

King County Superior Court Judge Steven Gonzalez's decision supersedes a temporary restraining order he imposed this summer and remains in effect until Microsoft's lawsuit against Google goes to trial in January.

Kai-Fu Lee remains barred from working on products, services or projects he worked on at Microsoft, including computer search technology. But while the judge said that a noncompete agreement Lee signed with Microsoft is valid, he said recruiting and staffing a Google center in China would not violate that agreement.

Lee cannot set budget or compensation levels or define the research that Google will do in China, but he can hire people to work there, the judge said.

Lee, who has worked at Microsoft since 2000 and oversaw development of its MSN Internet search technology, including desktop search software rivaling Google's, left in July to lead Google's expansion into China.

DOJ_NMG_0005230

Microsoft sued Lee and Google, contending that Lee's job at Google would violate the terms of a noncompete agreement, which prohibits him from doing similar work for a rival for a year. Microsoft also accused Lee of using insider information to get his job at Mountain View, Calif.-based Google.

Google has responded with its own lawsuit against Microsoft in U.S. District Court in San Jose, Calif.

Google, which is emerging as a formidable competitor to the Redmond, Wash.-based software behemoth, said it hired Lee to have him create an engineering office in China. But Lee is also an expert in computer recognition of language - an important field for search engines such as Google.

In a hearing last week, Microsoft asked Gonzalez to restrict the work Lee could do for Google until its lawsuit goes to trial. Gonzalez said in his ruling that the trial would more fully define the rights of both companies under the noncompete agreement.

Google wants Lee to help pick a site for the China facility and begin using his connections there to recruit students and software engineers. In China, companies recruit students in the fall to begin work the following summer. Had Lee been barred from recruiting this fall, he would have missed the recruiting season and would have had to wait until next fall, Google said.

Gates On Apple, Google -- And Microsoft's Future (SEAPI)

By TODD BISHOP, SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 14, 2005

LOS ANGELES -- Microsoft Corp. is grappling with "a lot of smart competitors," including Google and Apple, who are ahead of the Redmond company in some key markets, Bill Gates acknowledges.

But the Microsoft chairman on Tuesday said his company remains the overall industry leader, and he compared the current rivalries to legendary ones with Lotus, Novell and WordPerfect -- situations in which the Redmond company ultimately overcame steep odds to prevail.

"At any point in our history, we've had competitors who were better at doing something," Gates said in an interview with the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, underscoring the fact that it wouldn't be unprecedented to come from behind now.

That was one of the subjects addressed by Gates during the interview at the company's Professional Developers Conference, where Microsoft is seeking to rally support for Windows Vista and Office 12, the next versions of its dominant PC software programs. Among other things, the company showed plans to shift away from traditional drop-down menus to a new "ribbon" of commands across the top of the widely used Office programs.

Gates answered questions on a wide range of topics, including Microsoft's growth prospects in the Seattle region, its ambitions in China, and efforts to shore up the security of its software. Edited excerpts from the interview:

Q: You showed Office 12 here for the first time today. How do you think users are going to react when they see such a different look?

Gates: Well, this is the world's most popular application, and people sit and use it hours and hours a day, and so any advance we make in Office can actually drive up global productivity in a significant way. For years we've had the user interface confined to just these 2-D menus.

As Office has gotten richer, we knew that was a very limiting thing. It just wasn't very visual and so now, what we've done, it is a big deal. If you're a Word user, it should only take you 10 or 15 minutes to see how those things are laid out, so it's not like you're starting over. All the same concepts are there. The capabilities are there, and you will find yourself using more of the product.

You'll hear some people say, "Yikes, this is a change," but pretty quickly you'll hear from people about what a timely and important change it is.

Q: Companies such as Google and Apple have taken the lead in some key areas. Are Windows Vista and Office 12 a chance for you to recapture some of that buzz, and show that Microsoft plans to remain a central figure in the software industry?

Gates: Well, if you look at software very broadly -- productivity software, software tools -- Microsoft is the leader in way more respects than anyone else. Driving the research that will give us speech recognition and vision, and all of those big hard things that you've got to take a long-term approach in.

At any point in our history, we've had competitors who were better at doing something. Novell was the best at file servers. Lotus was the best at spreadsheets. WordPerfect was the best at word processing.

Right now, because of the breadth of what we do, we have that in many areas. Nokia is way ahead of us in phones; we're closing the gap. Sony is ahead of us in video games. We're just on the verge of something (the Xbox 360) that will help us close the gap there. In Web search, Google is the far-away leader. Big honeymoon for them. Even if they do "me, too" type stuff, people think, "wow." And Apple in music has done a fantastic job.

We've got all these areas -- like tablet computing, this Internet connectivity, or taking presentation to a new level, office productivity -- where we're just out there in front and we just need to keep pushing the frontiers.

In those areas where somebody else has done well, that's great. We'll match what they do, we'll bring new things to it, do it better and integrate it in with other things. And so it's very healthy for the consumer. We see that in search, we see it in music. It's not new at all that that's out there.

Q: Are there any features of Windows Vista that the U.S. antitrust settlement is keeping you from including, that you would otherwise want to include?

Gates: We're not being prevented from including features, and that's the strength of the settlement that we reached with the Justice Department and others. There's quite a bit of process we go through to make sure that the way we're putting them in and exposing them to third parties, that we're meeting all the requirements of that. But it's not preventing us from being very, very innovative and making it as rich as we want to.

Q: I wondered, for example, if you might want to build in antivirus protections into Windows if not for the antitrust situation.

Gates: Well, there's a ton of security capability that we are building in to Windows Vista. The whole thing about spyware, malware, phishing, a lot of things that support antivirus. The actual capability of getting updated signatures, that's something you need on an ongoing basis, so you need to ship that separately from the operating system itself and so we will have a way that people sign up from that separate from the operating system.

Q: What will Windows Vista do for computer security, and for Microsoft's security reputation in general?

Gates: Ever since I put out the big security memo talking about that as our top priority, we've been gaining a lot of respect for how seriously we're taking it, and the steps we've taken. People have seen visible progress in terms of the ease of securing their systems, some reduction in the spam that's out there.

Now that doesn't mean that the bad guys aren't always trying to find something new. Phishing is the big thing they're doing right now. And so there will be constant innovation in these areas, invention, the need to educate customers how they set their systems up in the right way.

But in terms of making it something that doesn't really hold the industry back and Microsoft is viewed as a leader in terms of our investments, and our predictability and showing the framework for how we're doing this, we have made immense progress. We can see that when we go out and survey customers. They want more, and we're not done in any way, but they appreciate the progress and the attitude we're showing.

Q: Some people hold Microsoft most accountable for security problems, even though software flaws are exploited by "bad guys," as you said. Is that a fair criticism?

Gates: Software in general, whether it was from Microsoft or somebody else, was not set up for an environment where all the computers were connected together. So it's not like there was some software that had this security capability and our software did not. As we use the Internet to connect everyone up, then the need to essentially have suspicion and only listen to certain other systems, and if flaws come up to have those updated very quickly, that became a new requirement.

Because Microsoft is the biggest software company and so successful, we should be held responsible for coming up with those things. We've got to push the state of the art, we've got to be the one to solve those problems.

Q: You've said that this will be the most significant release of Windows since 95. Do you have any hope or expectation of recapturing the consumer excitement that accompanied that particular launch?

Gates: I'm sure we'll have some of that. The PC is so broad now compared to back in 1995, it's not quite as radical. Everybody has got a PC. I don't know if we'll use the same kind of midnight madness type things. We're seeing a lot of that in our Xbox world, where when we do a new version of 'Halo,' we do this Xbox 360, because it's very consumer oriented, we see just such mass enthusiasm.

Q: The economy has been rebounding, and Microsoft's hiring has remained steady, but at pretty much the same pace over the past few years. Do you envision that hiring rebounding in the coming years in the Seattle area?

Gates: We have been hiring people in Seattle. We see that continuing, I'm not sure I'd say at any different level than it's been at. The constraints on how many great engineers are there out there to hire will always put a ceiling on that. We're glad that we're adding people, but I wouldn't say we're entering some significantly new phase.

Q: Is outsourcing playing a role there, in lessening the amount of growth in the Seattle area?

Gates: Well, the economy is a very complex thing. We sell way more of our software overseas than we sell internally. That is, the U.S. disproportionately gets our R&D activity relative to the amount of software we sell in the U.S. And so, why has Microsoft ever been able to hire people? Because of world trade. So if people don't believe in letting other countries get rich and buy more U.S. products, if trade liberalization freezes up or goes backwards, that's a very bad thing for an export-oriented company like Microsoft.

We like the idea that China is developing their economy. They've taken more people out of poverty than any country in history over just even the last 10 years. We view those as a good thing. It does mean the world is getting a lot more competitive. We will have competitors arising out of these Asian countries. That's fine.

So I think the advances in the world economy largely have been positive, and we see that in the increasing sales in Asia, and without those our hiring growth couldn't be maintained.

Q: Last week you were scheduled to meet with Chinese President Hu Jintao before his U.S. trip was canceled. How much will China figure into Microsoft's future, and how will you overcome challenges there, such as open source software and piracy?

Gates: China is an amazing country, and I was very disappointed that it didn't work out for the President to come last week. I fully understand why the leaders decided that made sense. I'm very hopeful he'll come back to Seattle. It's going to be great to sit down and talk with him. I got to know his predecessor, Jiang Zemin, and now he's leading China in this new era.

We've been investing there, it's our long-term approach. I think China will set the standard in some ways in terms of efficiency, driving a new wave of companies into the world economy.

Q: One of the big pieces of news this week was Oracle's plan to acquire Siebel Systems. How would that deal affect the competitive landscape for Microsoft?

Gates: We've always had a good relationship with Siebel, and we'll do our best to keep that strong as they become part of Oracle. Oracle we do some things with and obviously compete in the database area. I don't think that acquisition overnight is a dramatic thing. It is part of a trend toward some consolidation that people want to simplify the software they run in their companies.

By James Prichard, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, September 13, 2005

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. – Whirlpool Corp. has officially notified the Federal Trade Commission and the U.S. Department of Justice of its intent to purchase rival appliance maker Maytag Corp. in a cash-and-stock deal valued at more than $1.7 billion.

Whirlpool sent notification letters last week to both agencies because it is unclear at this point whether it will be the FTC or the Justice Department that will investigate possible antitrust concerns, Whirlpool spokesman Steve Duthie said Tuesday.

"Neither Justice nor the FTC has considered or ruled on a merger in the U.S. appliance industry for a long time – 15 to 20 years, I think," Duthie said.

Once the regulators figure out which of them has jurisdiction, Benton Harbor-based Whirlpool will provide the investigating agency with more details about its planned acquisition of Maytag, he said.

Probably by the end of this month, Whirlpool will notify the Securities and Exchange Commission that it plans to issue new shares of stock to be given to Maytag shareholders as part of the proposed transaction.

Shareholders of Newton, Iowa-based Maytag must approve the acquisition and will vote on the proposal before the end of the year, the company said last month. The agreement does not need the approval of Whirlpool's shareholders.

The companies announced Aug. 22 that they had formally agreed for Whirlpool to acquire Maytag for $21 per share and assume $977 million of Maytag debt.

A combined Whirlpool-Maytag company would capture about 48 percent of the U.S. major-appliances market, analysts have estimated. General Electric Co. would have about 26 percent of the market and Sweden's Electrolux AB would have about 20 percent.

Whirlpool-Maytag would control as much as 70 percent of the U.S. laundry market, a figure that analysts said would likely generate close government scrutiny.

Both companies have said they expect to close the deal during the first quarter of 2006, although some industry observers have said it may take longer to receive regulatory approval.

Shares of Whirpool fell $1.19, or 1.5 percent, to close at $77.91 on the New York Stock Exchange while Maytag shares dropped 19 cents, or 1 percent to $18.65.

AP, September 13, 2005

CHICAGO (AP) -- Wireless carrier U.S. Cellular Corp. said Tuesday it is acquiring Cellular One's operations in Nebraska and Kansas in a move to expand its presence in the Midwest.

In exchange, U.S. Cellular will transfer its Idaho networks to an Alltel Corp. unit and pay $50 million.

U.S. Cellular said the deal will give it about 125,000 retail customers, 193 cell sites, 15 company-owned stores and 89 agent locations in an area containing about 1.4 million people. The company currently operates in 25 counties in southeastern Nebraska and 80 counties in northeastern and southeastern Kansas.

Little Rock, Ark.-based Alltel will receive about 91,000 customers, 84 cell sites, six company stores and 32 agent locations in a region containing about 500,000 people.

The companies predicted that the deal will close in the fourth quarter, pending approval by communications regulators and the Justice Department. After the agreement is complete, both companies will continue operating their stores under the old brand names until they are remodeled.

Shares of United States Cellular Corp. opened up 10 cents at $55.41 on the American Stock Exchange. Alltel shares were up 54 cents at $63.69 on the New York Stock Exchange.

PECO Files Settlement To Facilitate Exelon-PSEG Merger (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones Newswires, September 13, 2005

PHILADELPHIA -(Dow Jones)- Exelon Corp. (EXC)'s (EXC) Peco Energy (EXC) unit filed with Pennsylvania utility regulators a settlement that the company expects will resolve state regulatory concerns related to Exelon's planned merger with New Jersey utility Public Service Enterprise Group Inc. (PEG) (PEG).

Exelon and PSEG agreed in December to merge. The deal has received regulatory approval from New York, Connecticut and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, but still requires the go-ahead from Pennsylvania, New Jersey and the Justice Department.

In a press release Tuesday, PECO said its settlement offer to the Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission would cap rates for five years and give rate discounts of $120 million over the next four years.

Peco said a judge with the Pennsylvania regulator will review the proposed settlement, which also includes funding for investment in "alternative" energy and environmental projects.

The judge is expected to make a recommendation before the settlement goes before the regulator for a full vote, which Peco said may happen before the end of the year.

Exelon and PSEG expect to complete all regulatory reviews and close the merger in the first half of 2006.

In a separate email statement, an Exelon spokeswoman said the company plans a conference call at 11:30 a.m. EDT. The call can be accessed at 1-800-683-1525.

America West Shareholders Back US Airways Merger (WSJ/DJN)

By Nicole Urbanowicz, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

PHOENIX -- America West Holdings Corp. said Tuesday its shareholders have voted in favor of the company's merger with US Airways Group Inc., clearing the way for the deal to close this month.

The parent company of low-fare carrier America West Airlines said 95.5% of total voting shares were voted in favor of the deal.

Class A shareholders voted 100% in favor of the deal, while class B shareholders voted 85.2% in favor. Out of the class B shareholders, 4.4% opposed the deal and 10.4% abstained from voting.

"With US Airways final bankruptcy court hearing scheduled for later this week, we anticipate closing our merger with US Airways at the end of September as previously scheduled," America West President and Chief Executive Doug Parker said in prepared statements.

US Airways' bankruptcy turnaround plan relies on the merger with America West. The U.S. Bankruptcy Court of Alexandria, Va., has a hearing scheduled for Thursday to consider final court approval of the air carrier's Chapter 11 turnaround plan.

Under the deal, America West will become a wholly owned unit of US Airways, and existing America West shareholders will receive about 37% of the merged airline's shares.

Investors in the merger, who have pledged a total of $565 million, are slated to receive about 52% of the reorganized US Airways. The remaining shares will fund distributions to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. and US Airways' general unsecured creditors.

Once the merger is complete, the new company will operate as a low-cost airline based in Tempe, Ariz. The merged airline will trade under the stock symbol "LCC."

Shares of America West recently changed hands Tuesday at $7.21, down 11 cents, or 1.5%, in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

US Airways-America West Deal Approved (WT)

By William Glanz

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

US Airways Group Inc. yesterday took a big step toward emerging from bankruptcy when shareholders at America West approved combining the two airlines.

Shareholders at America West overwhelmingly approved the merger, with more than 95 percent agreeing to the deal during voting at the company's headquarters in Tempe, Ariz.

The vote is a "ringing endorsement" of the proposed company's business plan, said Douglas Parker, who is chief executive of America West and would serve as chief executive of the combined company.

The combination of US Airways and America West would create the nation's sixth-largest airline and a low-cost carrier with a broad geographic reach.

Perhaps more important for US Airways, yesterday's vote made it more likely that U.S. Bankruptcy Court Judge Stephen Mitchell would approve its reorganization plan, analysts said.

"I expect court approval," said Ray Neidl, an airline industry analyst for Calyon Securities Inc., in New York.

Judge Mitchell's hearing on US Airways' reorganization plan, scheduled for tomorrow, is the last hurdle the company must clear before a merger can take effect and its second trip into bankruptcy can end.

The merger is the linchpin of the reorganization. It also may make the difference between US Airways' failure or success.

"I think most of us expected US Airways to disappear," said Michael Roach, an airline analyst and co-founder of America West, which began flying in 1983.

But then America West came along, he said. US Airways and America West began merger discussions in January, then announced their plan to combine operations May 19.

The new company will be funded with $1.5 billion in new equity from companies including Airbus SAS, Air Canada parent ACE Aviation Holdings Inc. and a group led by Air Wisconsin Airlines Corp.

US Airways' unsecured creditors and the Air Transportation Stabilization Board, which has backed more than $1 billion in loans for the two airlines, have approved the merger.

If Judge Mitchell approves US Airways' plan tomorrow, the first official day of the merged company would be Sept. 27, America West spokesman Philip Gee said.

The airlines are promoting Sept. 27 as "Day One."

The combined company will operate with the US Airways name, but it will move to America West's corporate headquarters in Arizona.

Immediate changes will be modest. US Airways and America West operate jointly in 38 cities, and it will take months before the airlines complete work to change logos and rebrand themselves in each market.

While work is done to present the airline as a single company, flight operations must remain separate until the Federal Aviation Administration issues the combined company a single operating certificate. That could take up to three years, Mr. Gee said.

Even if Judge Mitchell approves the reorganization plan tomorrow, the airlines still face significant obstacles, industry analyst Darryl Jenkins said.

Rising jet-fuel costs will impose a heavy financial burden, and determining seniority among pilots, flight attendants and mechanics will take years, he said.

"There are going to be problems," Mr. Jenkins said.

America West flight attendants demonstrated outside the airline's headquarters yesterday to voice their dissatisfaction with the slow progress of contract talks. The union this week asked a federal mediator to oversee negotiations with the airline.

Suit Says Wal-Mart Is Lax On Labor Abuses Overseas (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

A labor rights group filed a class-action lawsuit yesterday against Wal-Mart Stores in which apparel workers in Bangladesh, China and other countries assert that Wal-Mart violated its contractual obligations by not enforcing its code of conduct for overseas contractors.

The lawsuit, filed in state court in Los Angeles, makes the novel argument that Wal-Mart's code of conduct created contractual obligations between it and thousands of workers employed by contractors who were supposed to comply with the code.

In the lawsuit brought by the International Labor Rights Fund, workers from Bangladesh, China, Indonesia, Nicaragua and Swaziland assert that the codes of conduct were violated in dozens of ways. They said they were often paid less than the minimum wage and did not receive time-and-a-half for overtime, and some said they were beaten by managers and were locked in their factories.

"Based on its vast economic power, Wal-Mart, based on its code of conduct, can and does control the working conditions of its supplier factories," the lawsuit states. "It could use its power and position to prevent its producers from profiting from the inhumane treatment of plaintiffs."

Beth Keck, a Wal-Mart spokeswoman, said the company was studying the lawsuit. "It's really too early for us to go into any kind of detail about this complaint," Ms. Keck said. "It involves a number of countries, suppliers and factories. We will be looking into this and taking it very seriously."

Wal-Mart executives say that they have the world's largest overseas monitoring program, with more than 5,000 factories inspected by 200 full-time inspectors who visit 30 factories a day. The executives say that when inspectors find violations, they give factories several months to fix any problems before another inspection.

Last year, according to the company's ethical standards report, Wal-Mart cut off 1,200 factories for at least 90 days because serious violations were found in the second visit. Another 108 factories were permanently banned, primarily because of child-labor violations.

In the lawsuit, two male workers for Wal-Mart contractors in Shenzhen, China, asserted that they were not paid the minimum wage, not permitted to take holidays off and were forced to work overtime. They said the contractors withheld the first three months of all workers' pay, almost making them indentured servants because the company refused to pay the money if they quit.

An apparel worker in Dhaka, Bangladesh, said that she was locked into the factory and did not have a day off in her first six months. She said that she was told if she refused to work the required overtime, she would be fired. Another worker said her supervisor attacked her "by slapping her face so hard that her nose began bleeding simply because she was unable to meet" her "high quota."

The complaint tells the stories of 16 plaintiffs, but lists them as John and Jane Does, saying they need to be protected against reprisal. Several said they were fired or suspended for backing unions.

The lawsuit accuses Wal-Mart of breach of contract for wage violations, forced labor and denying workers the right to associate freely. It also accuses the company of negligence, unjust enrichment and fraudulent and deceptive practices in violating California's business code.

Terry Collingsworth, executive director of the International Labor Rights Fund, a Washington-based advocacy group, asserted that filing the lawsuit in California was appropriate because Wal-Mart had violated that state's laws. He said that if the plaintiffs had filed the lawsuit in their home countries, they would have faced arrest, physical attacks and hostile judicial systems that favored corporations.

He faulted Wal-Mart's monitoring system, contending that fewer than 10 percent of its inspections were unannounced. He said company managers often coach workers on what to tell the inspectors.

Wal-Mart executives say that they are working to improve the monitoring and that more inspections will be unannounced.

"With our growth, the challenge of ethical sourcing has become increasingly complex," H. Lee Scott Jr., Wal-Mart's chief executive, wrote in the company's 2004 Report on Standards for Suppliers. "But we have a qualified ethical standards team dedicated to verifying that factories are in compliance with local labor laws and/or Wal-Mart standards, whichever are more stringent."

An Indonesian plaintiff who said she made jackets for Wal-Mart's private-label George line complained of unpaid work hours and unpaid overtime, saying that she often worked from 7 a.m. until 8 or 10 p.m. Mondays through Fridays. She said she also had to work on Saturdays from 7:30 a.m. until 3 or 4 p.m.

Another Indonesian worker said, "Wal-Mart production quotas were far higher than quotas from previous buyers, and her supervisor regularly yelled at her and her colleagues if the work was not performed quickly enough."

An apparel worker in Matsapha, Swaziland, said he sometimes had to work from 7 a.m. to 11 p.m. and once worked all night. "He was threatened with immediate dismissal if he did not work overtime, and the factory doors were locked to ensure he did not leave," the lawsuit asserted.

Mr. Scott wrote in the ethical standards report, "It is important to recognize the reality that however strong the programs we develop, violations of our standards will occur." He added that it was a point of pride with Wal-Mart when violations were discovered, action was taken.

The plaintiffs include four unionized California supermarket workers who say that they suffered cuts in pay and benefits because of competition from Wal-Mart's low prices. They argue that those prices are attributable in part to violations of the chain's suppliers' code of conduct.

Wal-Mart Accused Of Denying Workers' Rights (WP)

By Michael Barbaro

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

An American labor rights group filed a class-action lawsuit yesterday against Wal-Mart Stores Inc., alleging that suppliers in five countries violated workers' rights, including denying a minimum wage, requiring overtime and punishing union activity.

The suit, filed in California Superior Court in Los Angeles, accuses Wal-Mart of failing to enforce its standards for suppliers and, in some cases, observe local labor laws in China, Bangladesh, Swaziland, Nicaragua and Indonesia.

The International Labor Rights Fund, a District-based advocacy group, filed the suit on behalf of 15 foreign workers who claimed they were subjected to illegal working conditions, and four California grocery employees who claimed that Wal-Mart's cost-cutting measures resulted in lower wages and benefits.

The suit, which must be certified by a judge before achieving class-action status, is the latest legal salvo against the discount retailer, which faces class-action suits claiming that it discriminated against black truck drivers and female store employees. If certified, the suit could represent 200,000 to 400,000 people, said lawyer Terry Collingsworth of the International Labor Rights Fund.

Beth Keck, a spokeswoman for Wal-Mart's international division, called the case "complex" and said "it's too early for us to talk about this in detail."

Collingsworth said the suit would test whether corporate codes of conduct, which retailers such as Wal-Mart require their foreign suppliers to sign, "are simply public relations devices or whether they mean what they say."

The suit could take years to move through the courts, but in the meantime, the case is expected to add to the growing debate about Wal-Mart's business model, which has shifted the manufacturing of products including clothing and toys to foreign countries to cut labor costs. Wal-Mart is based in Bentonville, Ark.

According to one assertion in the suit, a woman at a Wal-Mart clothing manufacturer in Bangladesh worked seven days a week, from 7:45 a.m. to 10 p.m., making chalk marks on pants and did not have a day off for six months.

The four California plaintiffs are employees of unionized grocery chains, such as Ralphs and Safeway Inc., that have cut wages and benefits to better compete with Wal-Mart. All four are members of the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, which is trying to organize Wal-Mart's 1.2 million U.S. employees.

Aggressive Patent Litigants Pose Growing Threat To Big Business (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

In one of Douglas Fougnies's early business ventures, he provided phony new-vehicle titles for stolen cars. His partner, Larry Day, is a onetime blackjack dealer in Las Vegas.

Together, the two men have found a more lucrative line of work: suing cellphone companies for patent infringement. Earlier this year their company -- which consists of four employees and six patents -- won $128 million in damages from Boston Communications Group Inc. and four other companies over alleged misuse of a 1998 patent.

Messrs. Fougnies (pronounced FOON-yay) and Day are successful practitioners of a growing trade. Several large companies, including Microsoft Corp., are struggling to beat back tiny outfits armed with little more than a broad patent or two and a team of lawyers.

Lured by the potential returns, hedge funds and other institutional investors now are bankrolling businesses that buy up patent portfolios. More law firms, including some branching out from product-liability and malpractice work, are taking patent cases on a contingency basis. That means the law firms are paid a percentage of any damages awarded but little or nothing if the patent-holder loses.

Critics call the small litigants "patent trolls" and say they are parasites on successful businesses. "We finally built it up to where we started to make money at it, and the patent troll industry came along and said, 'We want a piece of that,' " says Paul Tobin, the 62-year-old founder and chairman of Boston Communications. "No one comes after you until it all works. They don't go after the failures."

Boston Communications has 400 employees and had 2004 revenue of $108 million. Its stock, which is listed on the Nasdaq Stock Market, hit $30 a share in 2001 but plummeted after the recent judgment, and traded late yesterday at $1.17.

Messrs. Fougnies and Day make no apologies. "The cause of the lawsuit is not that we are patent trolls. The cause of the lawsuit is that these defendants used our patented technology to make over $1.5 billion in revenue," says Mr. Day.

In 2003 Eolas Technologies Inc. and the University of California won a $560 million judgment against Microsoft over a patent covering features of Web browsers. (An appeals court this year ordered the case to be retried.) In March, BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. agreed to pay $450 million to NTP Inc. over wireless-email patents.

Acacia Technologies, of Newport Beach, Calif., has acquired 120 patents in areas ranging from credit-card fraud protection to hearing aids. It has filed patent-infringement lawsuits against Intel Corp., Cablevision Corp. and others. Nathan Myhrvold, Microsoft's former chief technology officer, has formed a company called Thinkfire, backed by high-tech firms and venture-capital investors, that acquires patents and manages patent licensing for others.

In response, some technology companies are supporting a House bill introduced in June by Texas Republican Rep. Lamar Smith. It would limit remedies for successful plaintiffs that don't make products. The bill faces opposition from inventors and pharmaceutical companies, and its fate is unclear.

The 48-year-old Mr. Fougnies says he worked in real-estate development and recreational-vehicle sales before getting into the cellphone business in 1990. Using $2,000 borrowed on his wife's credit card, he says, he opened a retail store in Phoenix selling cellphones and calling plans. Soon he had five outlets and became partners with Mr. Day. The former blackjack dealer and pit boss in Las Vegas had became a prosperous Phoenix insurance agent and was looking for an investment opportunity.

In 1994 Mr. Fougnies and Jack Harned, a Phoenix software engineer, filed for a patent covering a prepaid cellphone system. The patent describes in general terms a method for setting up such a system so that it can keep track of how many minutes users have left on their phones without requiring them to punch in a special access code. The system would be able to shut down cellphones that had run out of minutes.

At the time, prepaid phones were cumbersome to use because users typically had to dial a special number first and then type in a personal identification number before going on to complete their call. Companies were eager to offer prepaid calling because many people with poor credit couldn't qualify for regular cellphone plans.

Mr. Fougnies started showing the system to prospective customers, including GTE Wireless Corp. When GTE announced a prepaid plan based on a different system, his company filed a $500 million suit accusing GTE of stealing its trade secrets.

The suit went badly for Mr. Fougnies. In a deposition, he denied that he had ever stolen anything, only to be confronted later in the deposition by the record of a 1980s conviction for car theft. Mr. Fougnies says he never stole cars but in 1986 provided a ring of thieves with phony new-vehicle titles. The ring, he says, was renting cars in California and Las Vegas, reporting them stolen and driving them to Phoenix. Mr. Fougnies, who cooperated with the authorities, was convicted of a misdemeanor, which he says he thought had been expunged from the record at the time he was deposed.

The case against GTE dissolved after GTE presented testimony that another vendor was offering a similar prepaid technology. That suggested Messrs. Fougnies and Day didn't have any trade secrets that could be stolen. They eventually agreed to a settlement in which their company paid more than $90,000 to GTE for legal expenses, said GTE hadn't stolen any trade secrets, and agreed never to sue it again.

Despite the setback, the pair signed up licensees or partners in a dozen cities from Boston to San Francisco and had revenue in 1996 of $11 million. They expanded to Washington, D.C., installing a prepaid system and buying minutes from Bell Atlantic that they could resell to retail customers. But Bell Atlantic soon informed them that it would terminate the agreement. Later Mr. Fougnies discovered that Bell Atlantic was starting to sell a prepaid plan using technology from Boston Communications, whose service was more lucrative for carriers because the carriers got more of the prepaid revenue.

With the prepaid-cellphone business bringing in little profit and hopes for expansion receding, Messrs. Day and Fougnies shut it down in 1999. Having recently received the patent they had sought, they decided to start a new company called Freedom Wireless Inc. focusing solely on patent litigation. They raised several million dollars by selling their retail stores and the subscribers, and several million dollars more by selling shares in Freedom to private investors.

Freedom bought a "patent-enforcement" insurance policy through Lloyd's of London, which covered up to $5 million of any litigation costs in exchange for a premium payment that Mr. Day says was less than 12% of that sum, or less than $600,000. The policy resembled an investment: If Freedom won its lawsuit or settled, the insurer would get back its original outlay plus a 25% bonus. A Los Angeles law firm, Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges, agreed to represent Freedom Wireless in part on a contingency basis.

In 2000, Freedom filed suit against Boston Communications and many of its customers, alleging patent infringement. After mergers and out-of-court settlements, the main defendants that remain today are Boston Communications; Cingular Wireless, which is owned by SBC Communications Inc. and BellSouth Corp; and Western Wireless Corp., which is being acquired by Alltel Corp. Boston Communications is on the hook for the entire sum of any damages because it agreed to indemnify its customers against patent-infringement suits when it installed its technology.

Boston Communications had been formed in 1988 by Mr. Tobin and three other cellphone veterans. Their company started out selling technology to let a customer of one cellphone provider make calls in another provider's region -- now a common feature called roaming but then an innovation.

In 1994, according to later trial testimony, a Boston Communications executive conceived of a prepaid system that would handle calls from cellphones without requiring PIN-codes or special chips in the phones. Cellphone carriers could keep using standard telephone switches in their existing facilities. All they needed to do was load the switches with Boston Communications software that could identify prepaid callers and check them against a database so their accounts could be debited.

No patent was sought for the system. "We didn't even focus on" obtaining one, says Mr. Tobin. "The hardware was off the shelf and we were just writing software."

By the time the case went to court, Boston Communications was a leader in the field of prepaid calling with a 35% market share. It had installed switches nationwide for Bell Atlantic, now part of Verizon Communications Inc. Today, Boston Communications's service is used by about four million of the 18 million prepaid cellphone customers in the U.S.

During the patent suit, Freedom's lawyers showed to the jury evidence uncovered in an earlier Freedom case that that Bell Atlantic engineers had been in regular communication with Boston Communications engineers about Mr. Fougnies's technology. The evidence included internal Bell Atlantic memos. Mr. Day says the phone company would call Mr. Fougnies "and then call BCGI and say, 'Here's how to solve your problems with incoming calls.' "

Boston Communications says the discussions were innocent. "We certainly didn't need to steal anyone's idea," Mr. Tobin says.

Boston Communications's defense, led by Michael Keating of the big Foley Hoag law firm, centered on a central plank of patent law: No one can patent something that is already public knowledge.

Following in the footsteps of GTE's successful defense, Mr. Keating showed that before Mr. Fougnies developed his system -- and before he filed for his patents -- he had visited a Phoenix company called Banana Cellular, which already had a working prepaid system. The defense also pointed to a 1993 article in a trade publication describing technology that could be used to make a prepaid system using switches with special software.

Freedom's lawyer, William Price of Quinn Emanuel, contended that the prepaid systems discussed before 1994 didn't invalidate Mr. Fougnies's patent because they had technical differences and weren't operational.

Separately, Boston Communications maintained that even if the patent was valid, its technology was different from Freedom's and therefore didn't infringe.

After a seven-week trial, the jury backed Freedom. Moreover, the jury found the infringement willful -- apparently relying on the evidence about the conversations between Bell Atlantic and Boston Communications -- although the judge didn't triple the damage award, as he could have done.

Boston Communications says its total profits since 1998 from prepaid plans were only $24 million. But Mr. Price, Freedom's lawyer, persuaded the jurors to award damages based not on Boston Communications's prices but on the higher prices that Messrs. Fougnies and Day had charged in the days when they sold their own prepaid system.

In order to post bond for a planned appeal, Boston Communications reached an agreement with Cingular to raise whatever sums are needed. Boston Communications says it can't afford to pay the damages and might have to file for bankruptcy.

Its chairman, Mr. Tobin, says, "I'm afraid it was beyond the jury. They didn't understand the technology." He adds that he fears the case will embolden other companies with patent portfolios. The decision is "helping to foster this other emerging industry," he says.

Mr. Fougnies says the jury verdict will help make up for what he regards as the theft of his idea. He says he always dreamed of building a company that would do big business selling its products. "We never envisioned," he says, "that our whole life would be in a courtroom."

Oracle's Siebel Buyout Might Stifle Creativity (UPI)

By SHIHOKO GOTO

United Press International, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 (UPI) -- Software group Oracle's bid for Siebel Systems for a cool $5.85 billion Monday was greeted by many Wall Street analysts as a signal of the return of mega-mergers and better still -- renewed confidence in the information technology sector.

After all, earlier in the day online auction house eBay announced it will be acquiring Internet telecommunications group Skype for $2.6 billion.

As the world's biggest database-software company, the Silicon Valley-based Oracle would be acquiring a group that is one of the biggest players in customer relation management software, tracking marketing data, client information and other data that helps companies be more efficient in their sales strategies. The deal is still subject to U.S. government regulations under the auspices of the Department of Justice, but while some industry analysts have high hopes for Oracle making the most of the acquisition, others are not so certain.

One thing, however, is certain. For Thomas Siebel himself, founder and chief executive of the company and once himself an Oracle executive, the deal is a very good one as Siebel Systems was faced with a growing number of rivals, while not many companies expressed interest in taking it over. Meanwhile, for Lawrence Ellison, Oracle's chief executive, it could well be that he finally would feel vanquished after years of bitter and public animosity with Siebel following his departure from Oracle.

"The combination of Siebel applications with the development capacity of Oracle to enhance our (client relation management) product set ... is a very beneficial business combination that will allow us to be even more effective in delivering high quality, leading edge solutions," Thomas Siebel said in a news release.

Ellison too was equally ebullient about the deal, stating that "in a single step, Oracle becomes the number one CRM applications company in the world. Siebel's 4,000 applications customers and 3,400,000 CRM users strengthen our number one position in applications in North America and move us closer to the number one position in applications globally."

Analysts, however, were less effusive about the planned buyout, even when they agreed it could be a mutually beneficial deal.

Credit raters Standard & Poor's, for instance, said the deal would have "no impact" on Oracle's rating or outlook, even as it pointed out that the acquisition "is expected to significantly strengthen Oracle's global market position, especially for customer relationship management software applications."

This is, of course, not Oracle's first major acquisition. The company finally got approval to buy out PeopleSoft in a hostile takeover bid earlier this year for $10 billion, after a long transatlantic dispute between the U.S. government and the European authorities on antitrust concerns.

While the bid for Siebel will certainly not be as controversial, some analysts including Janet White at Info-Tech Research Group of London, Ontario, argued that the purchase could actually stifle Oracle's longer-term prospects.

"By purchasing Siebel, Oracle has acquired an additional 3.4 million CRM users and the maintenance fees that go with that kind of installed base. However, where Oracle may be able to compete with (German rival) SAP on numbers in the short term, they may have trouble competing longer term on product innovation," White said.

She also argued that "Oracle is an applications company and it only makes sense that they will want to eventually move acquired customers over to their technology stack. But how much time will Oracle really have to integrate its existing portfolio, or create innovative new products, when it has to spend most of its time maintaining disparate, monolithic systems acquired through its recent acquisitions of PeopleSoft, JD Edwards and now Siebel," White said.

Oracle will be paying $10.66 per share for Siebel's stock, considerably above Siebel's Friday closing price of $9.13. Thomas Siebel owns about 55 million shares, or just over 10 percent of total shares. The deal is expected to go through by early next year.

Real Estate Agents Under Fire...again (CNN)

CNN/Money, September 14, 2005

New York (CNN/Money) - Are home buyers any closer to actually saving money on commissions?

The Department of Justice last week sued the National Association of Realtors over its "opt-out" policy -- the latest shot in an ongoing war to force competition in the real-estate industry, and one that could just maybe lead to a lowering of the standard 6 percent commission.

The opt-out policy allows NAR members to keep their real-estate listings from being broadly disseminated over the Internet.

Real-estate brokers regularly share information about listings. That enables them to put together buyers and sellers more efficiently. But if an agent opts out, it means that none of his listings can be displayed on other agents' Web sites. And he cannot list other agents' properties on his.

If a buyer begins his home search on the Web, he may never see some of the properties available. That, to the Justice Department, does a disservice to consumers. Buyers would have fewer homes to choose from. Sellers would have fewer buyers bidding for their properties.

Why would a broker want to opt out? After all, it's in the agent's best interest to have as many buyers as possible see (and bid on) a property, and the agent has a fiduciary responsibility to get the seller as high a price as the home can command.

NAR spokesman Peter Cook said that the opt-out policy is simply a way to provide good service -- many clients don't want their properties widely displayed on the Internet. Some of the wealthy and the famous wish to avoid publicity and some sellers have safety or security issues.

But critics, such as Bruce MacDonald, deputy attorney general in the antitrust division of the Justice Department, said this opt-out system is designed to "elbow out" Web-based competitors.

The issue is simple, according to one of these competitors, Manuel Iraola, who founded HomeKeys, a Florida-based Internet real estate marketer: "[Realtors] are thinking, 'How do we protect the 6 percent commission?'" Past victories

Previous victories for the government agency came in Kentucky, on July 13, when the state real-estate commission agreed to allow real-estate brokers to offer rebates, discounts and other inducements to consumers to win their business.

A similar agreement was reached in South Dakota this August. The Kentucky and South Dakota cases established the policy that brokers are allowed to lower their fees to drum up business.

It all threatens to chip away at the industry's longstanding way of doing business. If the Justice Department prevails, it could mean full-commission real-estate brokers would have to operate in a more competitive world in which low-cost innovators such as Internet-based marketers would claim greater share. In a more competitive marketplace, fees for the full-service brokers would almost certainly fall.

The savings could be substantial. The standard 6 percent commission on a $300,000 home works out to $18,000. If working with a discount broker becomes a more viable option, buyers and sellers could save half of that, if not more. Clients choice

Colby Sambrotto, chief operating officer of ForSaleByOwner, said that full-service brokers shouldn't fight the future. Real-estate brokers may be wary of real-estate following the trend in some other industries, such as stock trading and travel booking where Internet business models creamed the old way of doing things.

But Sambrotto said the examples aren't exactly parallel. "You can't get around the fact that with real estate, you have a physical property," he said. "That keeps it rooted in local markets."

In other words, there should always be a need for local real-estate agents in place, on the ground, to take customers down that final road to new homeownership.

It's whether they'll still receive a 6 percent commission for doing it that may be in doubt.

Justice v Realtors (WSJ)

We've been pounding the National Association of Realtors over its anti-competitive behavior, and last week the U.S. Justice Department filed its own antitrust suit charging the Realtors with illegally squeezing low-cost Internet companies out of the market. So why aren't we thrilled? Because this is a case of right target, wrong weapon.

Justice is certainly correct that the Realtors have used their political clout to suppress competition in local real-estate markets. One charming legal barrier in about a dozen states -- called "minimum service requirements" -- prohibits such discount realty firms as realestate.com from offering home sellers a flat fee of typically $500 to post their houses on local sale listings. In today's booming market, with the median-priced home now selling at $220,000, the Internet-based firms can save "do-it-yourself" consumers about $10,000 on average in exorbitant Realtor fees. Another Realtor favorite are state laws that prohibit discount agents from providing rebates to home buyers of typically $1,000 or more on their fees.

Justice is targeting something different, however. At issue is the Realtor practice of preventing Internet competitors from having access to the properties for sale on the local "Multiple Listing Service," or MLS. The antitrust suit maintains that Realtor "policy prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting."

There is little question that traditional high-fee Realtors are as receptive to Internet discounters as horse and buggy sellers were to Henry Ford's Model T. And it's true that Web-based services in other consumer industries -- from airlines to travel agents to booksellers to stockbrokers -- have all slashed costs to the great benefit of the public.

The Realtors have acknowledged in internal memos that many of their practices are meant to limit competition and preserve their lofty commissions -- typically 5% to 6% on the sale price. As such, the Realtor response to Justice that denying Internet firms access to MLS listings is "pro-consumer, pro-competitive, and pro-innovation" fails to pass the laugh test.

At the very least, these practices violate the ethical and fiduciary duty of real-estate agents to help find the best home at the best price for their clients. Instead, Realtors use their de facto price-fixing schemes to find the best home at the best price -- so long as that home offers the highest commission fee to the agents. A study by the American Enterprise Institute and Brookings Institution estimates that the economic rents that flow from consumers to Realtors as a result of this anti-competitive behavior exceed $10 billion a year.

And yet we have to admit the Realtors have a legitimate claim that they created and own the local MLS database of homes for sale. They are thus within their rights to use their private property as they wish, even if that includes denying access to competitors. As an economic matter, there are no natural barriers to entry here; anyone can start a competing listing service if he desires. The Justice Department's lawsuit would require that all homes be listed on the MLS even if home sellers don't want them to be.

Another problem with the lawsuit is federalism. Real-estate markets are inherently local, so it's not clear there is any legitimate "interstate commerce" rationale for federal intervention. For years liberals have tried to regulate the marketplace by defining virtually every business transaction as "interstate commerce" -- a clear perversion of the Constitution's intent. The Bush Justice Department shouldn't go down this same hyper-regulatory path.

A federal lawsuit seems to be an inferior way to crack the real-estate cartel, especially since it may well lose on the legal merits. Far preferable would be for the states to repeal their laws that sustain the Realtor racket to the detriment of their own citizens and the cause of homeownership.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Senate Rejects Challenge To Mercury Emissions Rule (WSJ/AP)

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON -- The Senate on Tuesday narrowly turned back a challenge to the Bush administration's strategy on mercury pollution, leaving intact federal rules that give power plants flexibility in how they reduce emissions of the dangerous toxin.

With a 51-47 vote, the Senate defeated a resolution to void Environmental Protection Agency rules finalized last March. The Democrats and nine Republicans who supported the repeal contended the EPA approach was too slow and too weak in dealing with a pollutant that can cause serious neurological damage to newborn and young children.

The White House insisted that its market-based approach to curtailing mercury pollution is effective and founded on sound science, and warned that the president would veto any legislation that overturned the EPA rules.

"In reality this is a political exercise in futility," said Environment and Public Works Committee Chairman James Inhofe (R., Okla.). "Who in this chamber would truly believe that the president would sign legislation to repeal his own administration's rule?"

The debate highlighted two very different approaches to environmental protection. The administration rules, backed by the utility industry, would set a nationwide cap on mercury emissions and put a ceiling on allowable pollution for each state. But individual plants, through a cap-and-trade system, can avoid cleanups by buying pollution credits from plants that are under allowable levels.

The utility industry says this method was successful in reducing acid rain in the 1990s. But opponents say the rules are too weak and would prolong a health risk that leaves newborns vulnerable to birth defects and mental retardation.

Sen. James Jeffords (I., Vt.) said the EPA rules violate the Clean Air Act. "The rule is plainly illegal. It is unwise. And it is definitely unhealthy for Americans living downwind of coal-fired power plants, especially mothers and their soon-to-be-born children."

The sponsors of the resolution, Sens. Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.) and Susan Collins (R., Maine), turned to a little-used 1996 law that allows Congress to challenge agency rules with a guaranteed floor vote. The law has been successfully invoked only once, when Congress in 2001 repealed Clinton administration workplace ergonomics regulations.

By repealing the EPA rules, the Senate would compel the agency to rewrite the rules. The revisions would be in line with Clean Air Act standards requiring the use of the best available technology to reduce mercury emissions.

Sen. Leahy said the Clean Air Act would start reductions in 2008. They would achieve up to 90% reductions far sooner than the EPA rules that, according to Sen. Leahy, don't begin to cut emissions until 2018 and will not reach the goal of 70% reductions until 2030.

But supporters of the EPA rules said repealing the administration approach could have a devastating impact on the economy, forcing power plants to abandon coal for natural gas and driving up natural-gas prices. They contended it would cost $358 billion to achieve the 90% reduction in three years, as opposed to a cost of $2 billion under the administration plan.

"It just can't be justified from a cost-benefit point of view," said Sen. George Voinovich (R., Ohio).

The EPA approach "combines significant reductions in emissions with protection for energy security and consumers," said Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council. "But these senators now seek to disrupt the program."

Senate Affirms EPA's Flexible Mercury Rules (USAT)

USA Today, September 14, 2005

The Senate rejected on Tuesday a challenge to Environmental Protection Agency rules that give power plants flexibility in how they reduce emissions of mercury. The vote was 51-47 against overturning the rules that the EPA finalized in March. Mercury is a toxic metal that gets into fish, endangering the food chain.

Sen. Jim Jeffords, I-Vt., said the rules violate the Clean Air Act and are unwise. “It is definitely unhealthy for Americans living downwind of coal-fired power plants, especially mothers and their soon-to-be-born children,” he said.

When the EPA adopted the rules, it said they went as far as possible without imposing excessive costs to companies and their customers. The rules “will virtually eliminate elevated levels of mercury American women and children may face solely because of U.S. power plants,” Jeffrey Holmstead, the EPA's air director, said at the time.

Gadhafi disappointed in nuclear deal

Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi complained to Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., that Libya hasn't gotten enough in return for giving up its weapons of mass destruction and halting its nuclear development program. The decision in 2003 was made to help end Libya's international isolation. Since then, the United States has freed Libyan assets that were frozen, renewed airline service and ended many sanctions. The United States has not restored formal diplomatic relations with Libya.

Lugar said Gadhafi told him in a private meeting that officials in North Korea and Iran have asked him what he got for giving up Libya's nuclear program. Gadhafi said he told them he has received nothing.

Congressman questions memorial design

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., is asking the Interior Department to reconsider the crescent-shaped design of red and sugar maples for the Sept. 11 memorial for those aboard Flight 93. The crescent is a symbol of Islam, and the plane's hijackers were radical Islamists. The memorial honors the passengers and crew of the United Airlines flight that crashed into a field in southwestern Pennsylvania near Shanksville as its passengers tried to take control of the plane.

The park service and family members of crash victims said that the memorial's shape — a circle broken by the flight pattern of the plane — simply follows the topography of the crash site. The design still needs approval from Congress and the secretary of the Interior.

King warns of ‘clash of civilizations'

Jordan's King Abdullah II, speaking at Catholic University of America, urged interfaith cooperation to confront those trying to bring about a “clash of civilizations” among Muslims, Jews and Christians. He said responsible leaders of all religions have denounced hatred and violence, “but there are those who think otherwise; who believe that there is, or will be, a clash of civilizations. Abdullah, 43, was a soldier by profession. He was educated in Britain and the USA.

Senate Rejects Call On E.P.A. To Toughen Emission Rule (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - The Senate narrowly defeated a resolution on Tuesday that would have called on the Environmental Protection Agency to rewrite rules for mercury emissions from power plants. Health and environmental groups say the present rules are too weak.

The vote was 51 to 47, largely along party lines. The resolution was brought up for a vote through a rarely used and rarely successful procedure, the Congressional Review Act. It allows lawmakers to challenge regulatory decisions.

Even if the Senate had passed the resolution, it had little chance to go further. Such challenges require approval of the House, which was unlikely to act, as well as the president's signature.

On Monday, the Office of Management and Budget said President Bush's senior advisers would recommend that he veto the effort.

"I am extremely encouraged by the Senate's resolve to support a market-based approach to reducing mercury pollution and not to impede clean air progress by rolling back the existing regulation," said Senator James M. Inhofe, the Oklahoma Republican who is chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee and a leading opponent of the resolution.

The vote, in which 6 Democrats joined 45 Republicans for a majority, was widely viewed as a victory for power plant operators and other industry groups.

They generally prefer the current rule, the first to regulate mercury emissions from power plants. It is supposed to reduce emissions 70 percent by 2018.

The rule is based on system called cap and trade that allows a plant to exceed its permitted level of emissions by buying credits from a plant in the same region whose emissions are below what is allowed.

Supporters of the rule also argue that it will lower fuel costs.

Sponsors of the resolution to strengthen the rule argued that it would require all plants to upgrade with the best available pollution-control technologies and would achieve a greater reduction of emissions, up to 90 percent, in fewer years, creating substantial health benefits for people most vulnerable to mercury poisoning, including pregnant women and children.

"The public health community is very disappointed that members of the United States Senate voted today to protect the energy industry's financial interest over the health of our children and communities," said Robert K. Musil, chief executive of Physicians for Social Responsibility, a coalition of health organizations.

Opponents of the current rule say it fundamentally violates the Clean Air Act, which requires the best available technology to drive down all polluting emissions.

Aging Nuclear Power Plants May Affect Emissions Pact (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - A proposed agreement among nine Northeast states to cap greenhouse gas emissions from power plants casts a new light on arguments in New Jersey and Vermont about whether the licenses of two aging nuclear plants should be extended.

Community groups in both states are opposing the extensions of the licenses beyond their 40-year terms, but environmentalists are generally supportive of the proposed agreement among the governors to reduce these greenhouse gases, which contribute to global climate change. Shutting down the two reactors would mean immediate, substantial increases in the emissions, because it would increase reliance on fossil fuel plants, probably tripling emissions in Vermont and doubling them in New Jersey.

"I think the environmental community is confused right now in terms of where they want to go," said Richard A. Valentinetti, director of Vermont's air quality program, who has been deeply involved in drafting the nine-state agreement. "Obviously there's some real polarization."

Some environmentalists say the goals can be met even without the two nuclear plants, Vermont Yankee and Oyster Creek, and without other nuclear plants whose licenses will expire in the next few years.

"We just have to bust the myth that we need to be using more energy," said Rob Sargent, senior energy policy analyst for the State Public Interest Research Groups, a nonprofit consumer organization. The New Jersey affiliate of his group is a leading voice against Oyster Creek, the nation's oldest commercial nuclear plant. Mr. Sargent said that rising electricity prices would make many new energy-saving technologies practical, but he acknowledged that simply saving money would not be enough to reduce power consumption by the required amount.

Engineers and environmental experts have long predicted that planners would eventually have to choose between greater greenhouse gas emissions and heavier reliance on nuclear power. The debate has been mostly hypothetical, since nobody in the United States has ordered a new nuclear plant since the 1970's, long before global climate change was widely perceived as an issue. It was also hypothetical because there were no limits on carbon dioxide emissions in the United States.

Suddenly, both parts of the question are changing. The governors are proposing a cap on emissions, and renewal of power plant licenses has become imminent.

Oyster Creek opened near Egg Harbor, N.J., in 1969 and its license expires in 2009. A little over half the electricity produced in New Jersey comes from nuclear power, and Oyster Creek alone produces about 9 percent; in 2004 it generated 27.1 million megawatt hours.

In December 2004, the New Jersey Public Interest Research Group came out against a license extension. It said that the plant was designed to last 40 years, and that the decision by Exelon, Oyster Creek's owner, to seek a license extension was "ignoring public safety."

The plant is in a rapidly growing part of the state, the group noted, and it argued that in an emergency evacuation would be impractical.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission announced on Monday that it had evaluated the application by Exelon for a license extension, and had decided that it merited review.

Vermont Yankee, in Vernon, near the border with Massachusetts and New Hampshire, began commercial operation in November 1972, and its license expires in March 2012. Its capacity is 535 megawatts. In 2004 the reactor produced 3.9 million megawatt hours, which was about 71 percent of the electricity produced in the state. (That production was only about one-third of the electricity consumed in the state, because Vermont is a chronic importer of power.)

Just how much carbon dioxide the two reactors are saving depends on what the replacement power source would be. A megawatt-hour from a coal plant produces about one ton of carbon dioxide. In the long run, power companies could build natural gas plants, which produce only about half a ton per megawatt hour.

The governors' draft agreement gives Vermont a limit of 1.35 million tons of carbon dioxide, approximately equal to its current emissions. But if the Vermont Yankee nuclear plant's output were replaced with coal, Vermont's emissions would increase by nearly four million tons. If natural gas were used, the increase would still be nearly two million tons.

The agreement gives New Jersey a cap of 23 million tons, but if Oyster Creek's output was replaced with coal, the state's output of carbon dioxide would more than double.

Some environmentalists say that greenhouse emissions should be cut by switching to "renewable" fuels, including wind, solar and hydroelectric. Wind-produced power, in fact, is growing rapidly, but over all, electricity from renewable sources in 2004 was about 1 percent lower than in 2003, mostly because of less hydroelectric production. Environmentalists propose reducing carbon dioxide output by building wind turbines. But utility experts say that the amount of wind that a utility grid can tolerate is limited, because wind is intermittent and often unpredictable. In fact, the "capacity factor" of a wind turbine, defined as the amount of power actually produced in a year, compared with the amount that would result from around-the-clock generation, is about 33 percent.

In addition to Vermont and New Jersey, the seven other states in the accord are New York, Connecticut, Delaware, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Rhode Island.

Rising Concern Over Heating Costs (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, September 14, 2005

Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.), chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee's Energy Subcommittee, yesterday asked the administration to estimate home heating prices this winter in light of the damage done by Hurricane Katrina.

"It is becoming clear that heating homes this winter will cost quite a bit more than last year," Domenici said.

Energy experts last week told the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which Domenici also chairs, that home-heating prices could be 31 percent higher than they were a year ago because of damage done to the Gulf Coast by Katrina.

The region produces as much as one-third of the oil and one-fifth of the natural gas produced domestically.

Domenici asked Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman yesterday to estimate how much Congress should provide in so-called weatherization assistance to help low-income families deal with higher prices.

The program helps families install more efficient heating and cooling systems, such as new windows or better equipment.

Court Rules EU Can Demand Criminal Prosecution Of Polluters (FINDLAW/AP)

By Robert Wielaard, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 14, 2005

(AP) - BRUSSELS, Belgium-European governments can bring criminal prosecutions against any company that violates the European Union's environmental legislation, the bloc's high court ruled on Tuesday.

The ruling boosts the powers of the European Commission, the executive body that drafts EU legislation which the bloc's 25 member states must incorporate into domestic law.

The Commission filed a lawsuit against all EU governments in 2001 for failing to include a reference to criminal prosecution of industrial violators in an anti-pollution bill it had drafted.

The governments, keen not to be seen to be yielding more powers to the EU, argued that criminal prosecutions shouuld be left to national authorities.

But the court said the Commission was entitled to ensure the laws it drafts are as effective as possible.

It said the fight against pollution was a cross-border issue and "one of the essential objectives" of the EU.

"The ruling strengthens the effectiveness of EU legislation in the case of environmental protection," Michel Petit, the European Commission's chief legal counsel, told a news conference.

The Commission's anti-pollution law forced any EU government "to establish as criminal offences under its domestic law" the discharge of hazardous wastes and dangerous radiation. It did not set minimum penalties or jail terms, leaving that to national courts.

Officials said Tuesday's court ruling may encourage the Commission to include the possibility of criminal prosecution in other areas, such as internal trade issues.

The Commission is currently at odds with some EU governments over a bill that would force phone network operators and internet access providers to retain traffic data for up to a year or more as part of the EU's fight against terrorism.

Petit said there was no immediate desire to refer to criminal prosecutions in that legislation - which has been the source of years of difficult debate due to privacy and cost concerns.

European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said the high court ruling on the environmental law "breaks new ground. It strengthens democracy and efficiency in the European Union."

He said the Commission would draft criminal penalties "only for particularly serious offenses," and insisted the ruling would not lead to a power-grab in a sensitive battle over sovereignty between nationalists and those advocating greater centralized power in the EU.

A similar dispute arose during the drafting of the EU's proposed constitution over whether governments should cede veto rights or control of sensitive areas such as foreign or cultural policy to the EU.

No Blood For Oil (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

With $3 and $4 gas in some markets, all sorts of bad ideas are making a comeback. Price controls are the worst, but not far behind are Corporate Average Fuel Economy standards, known in the Beltway argot as CAFE. What proponents of this idea won't tell you is that they're in favor of trading blood for oil.

This notion goes back to the 1970s, and requires automakers to produce cars that get more miles per gallon across their entire fleet. The leading current proposal, promoted by environmental groups and Congressional Democrats, would raise the standard to 40 mpg by 2010 from 27.5 mpg today.

This might save gas, but we know for sure it will cost lives. That's because a primary way auto companies meet CAFE standards is to reduce the weight of their cars. Auto weight fell by about 500 pounds per vehicle after CAFE rules were introduced in 1975. Research has consistently confirmed that the lighter the vehicle the more dangerous it is in a crash because there is less survival space and less physical structure to absorb impact. A 2001 National Research Council study concluded that CAFE contributed to 2,000 additional deaths on the highways each year. Raising the standards to 40 mpg could raise to 5,000 the number of annual CAFE-related fatalities, according to a study by the Competitive Enterprise Institute.

Ralph Nader also knows lighter cars are more dangerous, though he too is a CAFE advocate. His 1972 book, "Small on Safety," described the lightweight Volkswagen Beetle as a death trap. One of the Beetle's primary attractions was its ultra-fuel efficiency. One cause of the Ford-Firestone defective tire episode of some years back was that Ford attempted to increase the fuel economy of the Explorer by making the tires lower in weight, thus contributing to the rollover effect, according to an analysis by none other than Joan Claybrook's Naderite offshoot, Public Citizen.

Under political pressure to do something, the Bush Administration proposed its own overhaul of fuel standards last month. The plan creates six categories of "light truck" vehicles and sets standards ranging from 21 mpg to 28 mpg according to size. This would increase fuel efficiency of SUVs, minivans and pickup trucks by about 6% starting in 2008. At least these rules were designed to balance fuel conservation against the dangers to passenger safety and the additional costs to struggling U.S. automakers. But it's a sign of the political times that the plan was ridiculed by the environmental lobby for not going far enough.

In fact, CAFE won't do much more to reduce gasoline use than higher prices are already doing. As oil prices have soared, cost-conscious drivers haven't needed politicians to tell them to look for more fuel-efficient cars. Sales of hybrids and high-gas-mileage cars are rising, and SUV sales have fallen off the cliff. Economist Robert Crandall of the Brookings Institution, a long-time student of CAFE, has concluded that during the 1970s high gas prices had a far greater impact on reducing fuel consumption in the U.S. than did fuel regulations.

Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta says CAFE standards are "preferable to raising taxes on consumers." It's more accurate to say that CAFE is a hidden tax on consumers, with even the new modest standards eventually raising the costs of an SUV or minivan by another $250.

Imagine the media and Sierra Club uproar if a private manufacturer put a new product on the market that knowingly killed 2,000 people every year. Yet CAFE supporters ignore the scientific evidence and pretend that no trade-off between safety and fuel efficiency even exists. If Congress really wanted to help American drivers, it would repeal CAFE.

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

Los Angeles squirmed with uncertainty Monday afternoon while its Department of Water and Power tried to pinpoint the source of a burgeoning outage, which spread from neighborhood to neighborhood like a fire tearing through a dry forest. The cause, once found, generated guffaws of relief. It wasn't a well-placed bomb, it was just a Three Stooges moment — some guy with cable cutters who got too enthusiastic.

That's the way it used to be with power outages. We would sit in the dark and wait to hear what dimwit in which power station hit the wrong switch. But after California's 2000-2001 energy crisis and its seemingly endless rolling blackouts, and then the terror attacks of 9/11, our assumptions turned darker.

When the power suddenly cut off Monday, minds leaped to the extremes. Was it the handiwork of Osama bin Laden's minions, as a former Riverside County farm boy turned Al Qaeda mouthpiece had threatened on Sunday? Was it Armageddon for an overloaded and aged transmission system?

In fact, it was neither. Instead, it was a comeuppance for a city that smugly evaded not only the rolling blackouts of the state energy crisis but also the outages caused last month by a glitch at the DWP's own power transfer station in Sylmar.

The incident reminded Angelenos that their seemingly sturdy, self-contained municipal power system can still be brought to its knees in seconds by a single human error.

That's not a comforting thought in the post-9/11 era, when we have to worry about misdeeds as well as mishaps.

The outage leaves plenty of reliability issues to ponder for DWP chief Ron Deaton, the city's former chief legislative analyst who's had the post for less than a year. By Tuesday, Deaton was already promising the City Council that he would hire independent engineers to design a new system that would do a better job of isolating problems, rather than triggering broad shutdowns. Ironically, the worker who triggered Monday's outage was installing equipment that would help the DWP trace and respond more quickly to problems.

Still, such an overhaul won't be cheap. What's more, it would be prohibitively expensive to build an electrical grid with so many backups and safeguards that it would resist any and all human errors.

The real tragedy is how reassuring human error can be when the nation is reeling from a natural disaster and unnerved by the specter of terrorism. Monday's blackout harkened back to a more innocent time: Curly holds the cable, Moe makes the cut and Larry smacks his forehead.

FBI Probes Three Firms Tied To Catawbas (TSSC)

By Clif Leblanc

The State (SC), September 14, 2005

The Justice Department is investigating allegations of election fraud involving federal campaign contributions raised through organizations tied to the Catawba Indian Nation.

The FBI last month searched the offices of three Columbia companies, one of which is owned primarily by the York County tribe, according to investigative documents obtained by The State newspaper.

The inquiry is being run out of Washington and the Justice Department's Public Integrity section, court records show.

The Aug. 31 raid of New River Management & Development, SPM (formerly South Property Management) and Kapp Investment Management yielded 24 boxes of financial records, evidence of political contributions, computers, and business and tax documents, according to an inventory of the seized items.

In seeking the search warrant, FBI agent Amylynn Miller told a federal magistrate judge the government believes evidence was being concealed in the offices.

Jay Bender, a longtime attorney for the Catawbas, said Tuesday the tribe is not a target of the probe.

"Nobody has communicated in any way that the tribe is involved in an investigation," he said.

Bender is a Columbia attorney who specializes in media law and First Amendment issues. Among his clients are The State newspaper and the South Carolina Press Association; The State is a member of the press association.

He was contacted for this article in his capacity as a lawyer for the tribe.

Attempts to reach SPM chairman Terry Collier on Tuesday were unsuccessful.

An attorney for Kapp Investment, Jan Strifling, confirmed the investigation but would not comment.

Strifling said Lloyd Kapp no longer shares office space with SPM or New River.

New River manages the Catawbas' bingo and real estate development activities, Bender said.

SPM is owned by Collier but partners with the tribe through New River, Bender said.

He was unsure of Kapp's ties to the Catawbas.

In Miller's application for a search warrant, she says the government is looking into possible violations of the federal campaign contribution law.

A list of items agents sought includes "contributions of anything of value to political candidates or organizations" since January 2000.

Agents also sought bank account records, canceled checks, deposit slips or wire transfers involving the tribe's dealings with New River, SPM and Kapp Investments.

In addition, agents were looking for payments or reimbursements that funded political contributions.

The records, released by Magistrate Judge Bristow Marchant after the newspaper petitioned for access, do not indicate which races are in question.

Miller's search warrant application cites federal law that sets contribution limits for individuals and political action committees.

Generally, individuals can't contribute more than $2,000 per election to any federal candidate, $5,000 per calendar year to any PAC, $10,000 per calendar year to each state or local party committee, and $25,000 per calendar year to any national party committee.

The application also cites the federal law prohibiting a person from making a campaign contribution in the name of another person.

A conviction under that section carries a maximum sentence of five years in federal prison if the total contribution amount is at least $25,000 during a calendar year, and two years in prison if the total amount is less than $25,000 but more than $10,000 in a calendar year.

Heroin's Journey Traces Coke Trail: Colombia Joins Trade (BOSH)

By Laura Crimaldi and O'Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, September 14, 2005

Once shuttled into New England from Burma, Thailand or Afghanistan, a cheaper, purer heroin is now being sent to the Hub from Colombia via established cocaine trafficking routes, drug enforcement agents say.

``They had routes they used for cocaine and just like any other organization, if it was successful, why not use it for another drug," said Tony Pettigrew, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration's New England Field Division.

While drug enforcement agents say there is no single heroin trafficking route, smack typically makes its way to Massachusetts through Florida and then New York City.

Smugglers stash heroin in cargo shipments, send it in the mail or fill condoms with it and swallow them. Once the heroin is within U.S. borders, it arrives at its final destination by motor vehicle, said state police Lt. Dennis Brooks, who is assigned to the Middlesex District Attorney's Office.

``What we're seeing is more heroin at a cheaper price and the purity is some of the highest because it's not being cut," said Brooks.

The number of Massachusetts residents being treated for heroin addiction has climbed from 44,000 to 56,000 in recent years, he said, attributing the spike to the OxyContin craze, which is addicting people to opiates at a younger age.

Heroin hits the street in a rock form that is broken down into a powder and sold for as little as $4 to $6 per bag. The DEA classifies heroin into four categories depending on where it comes from: South American, Mexican, Southeast Asian and Southwest Asian.

The presence of South American heroin manufactured in Colombia has been on the rise since 1993, and is most prevalent in New England and along the East Coast, according to the DEA's Web site.

The South American heroin is brought in onboard commercial flights by couriers who carry about a pound to 2 pounds at a time. That region's heroin sellers broke into an already saturated Northeastern drug market by offering higher purity at lower prices than the competition, the DEA states. [continue]

Appeals Court Cancels Medical Marijuana Case (OPB)

By Colin Fogarty, OPB News

Oregon Public Broadcasting, September 14, 2005

PORTLAND, OR 2005-09-13 - The Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals cancelled oral arguments Tuesday in an Oregon medical marijuana case.

The lawsuit was filed by LeRoy Stubblefield of Sweet Home. In 2002, federal drug agents seized marijuana plants that he was growing under Oregon's 1998 medical marijuana law. In a separate case, the U-S Supreme Court in June sided with the federal government's efforts to crack down on medical marijuana in California.

Paul Stanford, with the Portland-based Hemp and Cannabis Foundation, says the California decision may be why the appeals court cancelled oral arguments in the Oregon case.

Paul Stanford: Well, generally, it does not bode well for the litigant, that being us in this case. So I don't know if they're going to write a ruling unanimously in our favor or unanimously in the governments favor. But I think the odds are definitely in the government's court at this point.

In the California case, the U.S. Supreme Court said the Drug Enforcement Agency has the authority to prosecute marijuana users under federal law, even if states allow the use of pot to treat medical ailments.

9th Circuit Mulls Pot-Smoking Celeb's Appeal (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

Law.com, September 14, 2005

It was unclear why there was no drum circle on the third floor of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Tuesday morning.

The dozen or so people assembled outside Courtroom One were certainly loud enough -- despite repeated exhortations by security guards to keep the noise level down -- and the top thing on their minds was smoking pot.

And these are people who take their weed seriously: pot lawyers, pot lobbyists, pot activists, pot smokers, a pot reporter and the requisite pot publicists -- a middle-aged assembly that ranged from besuited to bedraggled.

As the group waited for a 9th Circuit panel to finish hearing more conventional arguments -- a qui tam case, for example -- they had lots to say about marijuana.

"If you smoke pot, you have less of a chance of getting cancer than if you don't," explained Ed Rosenthal, the focal point of the group.

Rosenthal is a pot celebrity, as well as an author and publisher of pot books. ("'The Big Book of Buds,' volume one and volume two, are probably our best-sellers," said the primly suited Jane Klein, Rosenthal's business partner and wife. "They treat marijuana like you would roses," she said, referring to pictures and descriptions of growing conditions.)

In 2003, Rosenthal's celebrity moved beyond the pot community when he was convicted in San Francisco federal court of growing marijuana, despite the fact that the city of Oakland had licensed him to do so.

Rosenthal appealed that verdict -- even though U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer sentenced him to just one day in jail -- because Breyer refused to let the jury hear that the pot was grown for locally sanctioned medicinal use.

"The trial was grossly unfair," Rosenthal said Tuesday in the middle of the passionate group outside the courtroom.

His lawyer, Dennis Riordan, stood a good distance away as the group waited. In court, Riordan used softer language than his client's in his oral argument before a 9th Circuit panel of Judge Marsha Berzon, Senior Judge Betty Fletcher, and, sitting by designation, 8th Circuit Senior Judge John Gibson.

Riordan said that since his client was a city officer -- by virtue of his medical-marijuana license -- he was immune from prosecution.

He likened the prosecution to the federal government arresting local law enforcement officials for possessing drugs while they are working on an undercover investigation, and pointed out that federal law gives immunity to officials "lawfully engaged" in law enforcement.

While the judges -- especially Berzon -- seemed somewhat skeptical of that argument (she wrestled several times with the meaning of "lawfully engaged"), they had few questions about a narrower defense by Riordan: that Rosenthal, because he could have reasonably thought his pot growing was legal, should have been acquitted. Or, at the very least, the jury should have been allowed to hear the medical marijuana argument, Riordan said.

"Due process requires simply that a jury hear that defense," he told the panel. Amber Rosen, an assistant U.S. attorney, argued the case for the government. She said that a city may not deputize someone to act in violation of federal law, challenging the assertion that Rosenthal was lawfully engaged. Rosen also spent time challenging Rosenthal's one-day sentence, which deviated from optional sentencing guidelines. That argument didn't go over well with the judges.

"If it's not mandatory, [Breyer] doesn't have to justify a departure from the guidelines," Berzon said. "So why are we looking at a departure from the guidelines?"

After the hearing, Riordan -- an appellate specialist with Riordan & Horgan -- said that while he hopes to win on the immunity issue, he's more confident that the judges will order a new trial based on the entrapment argument.

"We could go down like a rock on the immunity issue and win hands down on the entrapment-by-estoppel issue," he said.

In addition to Riordan, Joseph Elford, a lawyer with Americans for Safe Access, argued that prosecutors misled the grand jury that indicted Rosenthal.

After the arguments, which ran nearly a half-hour longer than scheduled, the judges didn't seem swayed by either side. The same could not be said for the pro-pot contingent, which stood outside the courtroom expounding on the need to legalize marijuana -- though that was not the issue before the 9th Circuit.

"If there's any justice in the universe," insisted Bruce Mirken of the Marijuana Policy Project, "Ed Rosenthal will win his appeal."

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2005

MIAMI -- FBI agents arrested eight men in New York and New Jersey on Tuesday on racketeering, money laundering and other charges stemming from an alleged conspiracy to distribute large quantities of marijuana and cocaine.

The eight were named in an indictment returned by a grand jury in Florida that also seeks forfeiture of $75 million in profits from the alleged illegal drug sales, some of which involved truckloads of marijuana shipped from the U.S.-Mexican border to New York, New Jersey, Florida, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kansas and other states.

One of those charged was identified as John Leto, also known as "Johnny Balls" and allegedly a member of an organized crime family in New Jersey. Leto, 39, allegedly used his connections as a "La Cosa Nostra associate" and his construction business to protect the marijuana business and help distribute the drugs, according to the indictment.

Leto and the seven other defendants had their initial appearances before a judge Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Newark, N.J. It could not immediately be learned if any of the defendants had hired a lawyer or whether any would fight extradition to face the charges in Florida.

County Men Target Of Grand Jury Probe (VCNB)

By Scott Sandlin

Valencia County News-Bulletin, September 14, 2005

A state court grand jury is scheduled to take up potential death penalty charges against three alleged members of a Valencia County drug gang this month.

The target notice sent to the three men shifts the focus away from a pending drug prosecution in U.S. District Court.

Ben Gallegos, 33, Frankie Gallegos, 28, and Juan Calles, 31, alleged members of the East Side Locos, are being investigated for seven slayings, including shootings and strangulations. Investigators believe the shootings are either gang- or drug-related.

The three received target notices last week, telling them they have a right to testify at a Sept. 23 grand jury.

The grand jury is looking at a string of charges that include kidnapping, racketeering, witness intimidation, tampering with evidence and murder related to the following:

Dec. 20, 2000, death of Philip Silva, whose body was found with a rope around his neck and a bag on his head on a South Valley ditchbank.

Dec. 12, 2004, shooting death of Elizabeth Gonzales, 26, of Belen.

Nov. 26, 2004, strangulation deaths of Cruse Rael, 31; his girlfriend Deanna Sais, 43, and her son Jason Slade, 22, on Isleta SW.

The three men, along with eight others, were indicted by a federal grand jury in March for methamphetamine distribution. The indictment also seeks forfeiture of $63,900 in cash seized during a series of raids March 10. A superseding indictment was handed up in July charging Ben Gallegos with operating a continuing criminal enterprise, conspiracy and distribution of methamphetamine.

Attorneys for the three in the federal case want to postpone pretrial matters because of the potential death penalty charges in state court.

The attorneys, Bob Cooper, Jacquelyn Robins and Assistant Federal Defender John Butcher, said they have asked the New Mexico Public Defender Office to make immediate arrangements to appoint death-qualified counsel in state court.

The East Side Locos is believed to have been active in the Belen and Los Lunas area since the early 1990s.

Agent Details Bomb Charges (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, September 14, 2005

James Rankin, 19, of 3175 U.S. 80 East is charged with possession of an unregistered firearm, transfer of an unregistered firearm and the manufacture of an unregistered firearm.

If convicted, Rankin faces up to 30 years in prison. The case continues today in U.S. District Court in Jackson.

"The defendant made a bomb, not a firework," U.S. Assistant Attorney David Fulcher said in his opening statement. "It's simple. The defendant made a bomb that was designed to kill and with the intent for it to kill."

Rankin's attorney, U.S. Public Defender Dennis Joiner, told the jury he would delay his opening statement until after the prosecution concludes its case.

Rankin was arrested Nov. 9, 2004, after he allegedly tried to sell a bomb to an undercover agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

"He asked if I wanted a large pipe bomb, a small pipe bomb or a hand-held grenade," ATF special agent Connie Wilson testified.

Wilson said she posed as someone wanting to harm an ex-husband in Texas after a confidential informant told her Rankin could make a bomb.

In the Oct. 28, 2004, meeting, Wilson said Rankin described a wide range of explosive devices, including pipe bombs, briefcase bombs like the one he allegedly delivered to Wilson, one that could be detonated with a mercury switch or one that could be attached to the bottom of a car.

Wilson said she called Rankin on Nov. 8 and arranged to purchase a bomb from Rankin for $130. Wilson met Rankin at about 3:30 p.m. Nov. 9 in The Home Depot parking lot.

A circuit judge revoked Rankin's probation in a car-theft case and sentenced him to five years in a state prison after his arrest on the federal weapon charges.

Ex-Marshal Gets 15 Years For Rockville Killing (WP)

By Fredrick Kunkle

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

A former deputy U.S. marshal who killed a young Navy seaman in a road rage incident last year at a Rockville shopping plaza was sentenced yesterday to 15 years in prison.

Arthur L. Lloyd, 54, who was convicted in June of voluntary manslaughter in the Oct. 29 shooting of Ryan T. Stowers, probably will serve about 11 years before he is eligible for parole, prosecutors said.

Calling the shooting "an enormous tragedy" for both families, Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge Ann S. Harrington tailored a sentence that satisfied neither side completely. She went beyond state guidelines calling for a five- to 10-year sentence, but she declined to impose the maximum 35-year term requested by prosecutors.

Holding a collection of family photographs, Tricia Stowers told the court she believes Lloyd should serve the same amount of time she had been allowed with her son before his life was cut short.

"Your honor, this whole time I've had to listen to the defense's version of what happened, I never hear, 'I'm sorry.' I never hear, 'I was wrong,' " Stowers said. "That's not going to bring Ryan back, and putting Mr. Lloyd in jail will never bring Ryan back. But he needs to realize that he was wrong. He needs to sit there and think about it every day, every day for at least 20 years. Twenty years -- that's what I had with my son."

When it was his turn to speak, Lloyd asked the family to forgive him. Then, in remarks that drifted over several subjects, he placed some blame for the deadly encounter on Stowers's intoxication. He said that all law enforcement officers have been on edge in the post-Sept. 11 world and that he became fearful for himself and his family when Stowers followed him into the shopping plaza.

He claimed that he had no choice but to take action against a driver who made "racially profane" remarks and menaced him and his family. Lloyd is black; Stowers was white.

"Just between me and God, and to the family, especially the mother, and all the brothers and sisters, I have to ask forgiveness. And I have to ask forgiveness because a young man lost his life," Lloyd told the court.

The shooting occurred at the Mid-Pike Plaza in front of dozens of horrified witnesses, many of whom were shopping with children for Halloween costumes. That was why Lloyd, off duty and accompanied by his wife and five young children, headed to the shopping plaza in his black SUV. Then he encountered Stowers. A state toxicology report determined later that Stowers had a blood alcohol concentration nearly three times Maryland's legal driving limit.

Their traffic dispute became a fistfight. Dozens of shoppers dialed 911 on cell phones. Witnesses testified that, as Lloyd's wife tried to hold him back, Lloyd went to his vehicle for his .40-caliber Glock service weapon, vowing: "I'm going to show him."

Lloyd shot Stowers in the leg, saying he feared for his life and wanted only to disable a crazed adversary. Lloyd said he felt that his life was in danger when Stowers attempted to drive away in his red Camaro. Lloyd fired three shots into Stowers's car, one of which clipped Stowers's aorta.

Witnesses -- some of whom returned to court yesterday to address the judge -- said Lloyd looked more like an enraged motorist waving a gun around than a trained law enforcement officer. They said they, too, had been afraid.

Eugenia Hull, a Silver Spring woman who was buying Halloween costumes with her two boys, recalled holding her arms out to shield them, later realizing how absurd the gesture was.

"I had no way to protect my children from this man with a gun," said Hull, 44.

Marshal Gets 15 Years In Killing Of Calif. Navy Seaman (AP)

By JACOB ADELMAN, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2005

ROCKVILLE, Md. (AP) - Family members watching from both sides of the courtroom remained still and silent Tuesday as a Montgomery County judge handed the former U.S. Marshal convicted in the shooting death of a Navy seaman from California a 15-year sentence.

Arthur L. Lloyd, who sat beside his lawyers in a green prison jumpsuit, showed little emotion as Circuit Court Judge Ann Harrington sentenced him to 25 years, then suspended 10.

"I have to process it so I can deal with it," Lloyd's sister Beryl Stanley said of the decision as she stood outside the courtroom looking dazed.

During their testimony, members of Lloyd's family portrayed the 54-year-old as a peaceful man distraught over his actions in the Oct. 28 shooting and asked the judge to be lenient.

"There was no intent to purposefully do harm," said his brother Glenn Lloyd. "He is very sorry it happened."

"Just trying to deal with the whole situation is punishment enough," Stanley said.

Lloyd's family members were followed by those of his victim, Ryan T. Stowers, 20, of Redding, Calif. They offered teary testimony and asked for the judge to issue the harshest punishment she could.

"If he didn't shoot my grandson in the back, he would still be here," said Stowers' grandmother Sharon Barnes. "(Lloyd's) family would not be suffering. Our family would not be suffering."

Barnes said she wanted to see Lloyd in jail for life, but Stowers' mother, Tricia Stowers, said Lloyd should spend 20 years in prison - one for each year that her son had lived.

"He needs to realize he was wrong," Tricia Stowers said. "He needs to sit and he needs to think about it every day for at least 20 years. That's what I had with my son."

"God will forgive him. I don't think we can," she said.

When Lloyd was offered the chance to speak on his own behalf, he sought to explain his actions in the Rockville shopping center parking lot. He said law enforcement officers like him are skittish since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and that he was incensed by a barrage of profanities and racial epithets that Stowers subjected him to. He also said he feared that Stowers might be someone he helped put in jail as a marshal, who was now seeking revenge.

"I'm sorry if my reaction was an overreaction," said Lloyd, who shot Stowers in the leg during their altercation before killing him with a bullet to his back as he drove away.

Harrington delivered her sentence, which she explained had to be consistent with the verdicts jurors issued in June. Lloyd received 10 years for involuntary manslaughter, which would run concurrently with a 20-year sentence for committing a felony with a handgun. Harrington also sentenced Lloyd to five years for reckless endangerment, then reduced the 25 years of total jail time to 15 years.

Defense lawyers said they plan to appeal because it hadn't been argued during his trial that he was acting on his responsibilities as a marshal during the altercation. Harrington had denied a defense request for a retrial on that basis at the start of the sentencing hearing. Lloyd has since retired from the Marshals Service.

AP, September 14, 2005

COVINGTON, Ky. — Cab driver Mike Wagers, credited with the tip that led to the capture of two Tennessee fugitives wanted in the killing of a corrections officer, was rewarded Tuesday with $10,000.

John Clark, acting director of the U.S. Marshals Service, presented the check for information leading to the arrest of George and Jennifer Hyatte, charging in the fatal shooting of a guard during George Hyatte's escape outside a courthouse in Kingston, Tenn.

"I'm just overwhelmed," said Wagers, 33, who said he plans to split the money with a friend whose wife recently died, and will take a vacation.

Wagers picked up the couple Aug. 10 at a hotel in nearby Erlanger, Ky. Wagers drove them about 115 miles to a motel in Columbus, Ohio, registered for the couple, then headed home. They paid cash.

Alerted by another cab driver about the Tennessee fugitives, Wagers made the connection to the shootings and called authorities, who arrested the Hyattes in Columbus without a struggle. They were returned to Tennessee last month.

The arrest came about 36 hours after authorities say Jennifer Hyatte ambushed two corrections officers while they were escorting her husband from the courthouse to a van to take him back to prison.

Taxi Driver Collects Reward For Fugitive Tip (CINE)

By Jim Hannah, Enquirer staff writer

The Cincinnati Enquirer, September 14, 2005

COVINGTON – A Northern Kentucky taxi cab driver today received a $10,000 reward for turning in two Tennessee fugitives last month.

Mike Wagers, 33, of Taylor Mill, received the check from John Clark, the acting director of the U.S. Marshals Service, at 11 a.m. at the U.S. District Courthouse in Covington.

Wagers said he will give half the money to his best friend, whose wife recently died. He will use the other half to take a two-week vacation from Community Yellow Cab of Newport.

"I really don't have any comments other than I'm just overwhelmed," Wagers said.

The couple went on the run after George Hyatte made a daring Aug. 9 jail escape from Tennessee. He was being taken back to jail after a court hearing when his wife allegedly shot and killed corrections officer Wayne Morgan. During the shootout, Jennifer Hyatte received a bullet wound in the leg but was able to escape with her husband. The couple made their way north to Erlanger, where they stayed overnight at an EconoLodge and then hailed Wagers' cab to Columbus the following morning.

Wagers called authorities after realizing the fugitives' description matched his two passengers. His tip led police to the hotel room in Columbus where the couple was staying.

The couple had told Wagers that they were Amway salespeople who needed to get to Columbus for a convention. Wagers said he never suspected the two were fugitives, but he became suspicious of their Amway claim when they didn't try to sell him anything.

Clark, who traveled from Washington, D.C., to present the check, said Wagers' tip helped lead to the capture without anyone else getting hurt.

"My motivation was to do the right thing," said Wagers. "These are bad people that need to be held accountable."

IMMIGRATION:

Politicians Duck 'Amnesty' Label (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

It's "the A-Word," and it can damn any immigration bill to oblivion.

The word is "amnesty," or as one immigration-control advocate calls it, "the death word." It's a charge that a lot of people want to make and nobody wants to hear.

As the immigration debate warms up over the next few months, President Bush and congressional lawmakers will try to prevent their legislation from being tagged with the "amnesty" label.

"For some, you would think amnesty is in the eye of the beholder because there are some critics who have nothing constructive to offer who criticize every proposal as amnesty or amnesty light," says Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican.

He finds himself defending against those who say his plan, which would enable illegal aliens to come forward and remain in the country for up to five years in a work program before they are required to return home, is an amnesty.

Craig Nelson, founder of Project USA, an immigration control advocacy group, has placed billboards in some congressional districts announcing that the local officeholder "supports amnesty." He takes some credit for giving a sting to the word.

"I very, very consciously set out to do that," he says. "Everything we put out was always using that word in an accusatory way."

The president says his own guest-worker proposal doesn't qualify.

"Now I've heard all kinds of talk about amnesty," Mr. Bush said last month. "I'm against amnesty. I think amnesty would be a mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0005253

The president demonstrated the power of the word during last year's campaign when he leveled the charge against his Democratic challenger, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts: "Here is where my opponent and I differ. In September 2003, he supported amnesty for illegal aliens."

Some Republicans, however, say the president's guest-worker plan is an amnesty that he doesn't want to call an amnesty.

"I've seen no guest-worker program that didn't include amnesty -- amnesty defined by Webster's," says Rep. Steve King. He debated the issue with White House political adviser Karl Rove in early January 2004, just before Mr. Bush announced his plan.

"Karl Rove argued it wasn't amnesty if you simply fined them $1,000, or $1,500," he says. "That way there'd be a punishment."

That makes no difference to the Iowa Republican. "The penalty for illegal entry into the United States is, in part, deportation. In all cases, if the law's applied, they have to return to their home country. Anything short of that is amnesty."

Mr. Cornyn says his immigration reform bill is not amnesty because amnesty would be "forgiving illegal conduct and putting people on a pathway to legal permanent residency or citizenship."

Another major proposal -- from Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat -- does put illegal aliens on a path to citizenship.

Mr. Kennedy calls it not amnesty, but "earned legalization," because the aliens would pay a fine and have to pass a security check.

Tamar Jacoby, a research fellow at Manhattan Institute, says the only workable solution has to include legalization. She says the McCain-Kennedy bill is more akin to "probation" than amnesty.

"The point is what it is. Not what kind of euphemistic term is used," she says. "Sure, we can all play with the terms -- both sides play with the terms. But the point of the American people is, is it unfairly rewarding people or is it a transition that is in our national interest?"

Mr. Nelson of Project USA has challenged Mr. McCain to submit his bill to an arbitration panel. "If they said yeah, this bill is not an amnesty, it really is a step-by-step path to whatever euphemism, then we would apologize publicly to Senator McCain and put up billboards saying, 'Senator McCain does not support amnesty for illegal aliens,' " he says.

If the panel says it's amnesty, "then he would put up 10 billboards around Phoenix saying, 'I, John McCain, support amnesty for illegal aliens.' " So far, he says, he has not heard from Mr. McCain.

TAX:

Jury Selection Delays Schiff Trial (LVS)

By David Kihara, LAS VEGAS SUN

Las Vegas Sun, September 14, 2005

Jury selection in the tax fraud case of anti-tax advocate Irwin Schiff was stalled Monday after potential jurors who were waiting outside the courtroom said a man tried to talk to them about the case.

A potential juror told U.S. District Judge Kent Dawson that John Anthony Malan told prospective jurors outside an elevator on the sixth floor of the George Federal Building to "just remember to listen to the facts" and not to listen to opinions. At least seven more potential jurors also heard comments from Malan and were called into a private sidebar individually with the attorneys from both sides and Dawson.

The interruption came during jury selection in the criminal case against Schiff, a local author and businessman, and two other defendants, Cynthia Neun and Lawrence Cohen.

All three were indicted in federal court in March of attempting to evade paying taxes, aiding and assisting in filing false tax returns and conspiring to defraud the government, among other charges.

Opening arguments in the trial were expected to begin this morning.

Malan was brought before the judge and initially denied speaking to the jurors.

"I'm a little bit confused as to what's going on," Malan said. "I didn't say nothing to the group -- I was speaking to someone else."

After Dawson further inquired as to whether Malan attempted to communicate with prospective jurors about the case and asked if he was attempting to influence the potential jurors, Malan replied, "I object to this entire proceeding."

Dawson, after calling for a hearing for Malan on Wednesday, ordered U.S. marshals to eject Malan from the federal courthouse.

Attorney Michael Cristalli, who is representing Schiff's former girlfriend Neun, denied that his client had anything to do with Malan. Attorney Chad Bowers, who is representing Cohen, also distanced his client from Malan.

Schiff said that while he knew Malan, he was not a close acquaintance with him and attempted to disassociate himself from him.

"This is not a buddy of mine or a friend of mine," Schiff said. "I had nothing to do with this."

The defendants are accused of filing false tax returns and preparing false returns on behalf of other clients of Freedom Books, which Schiff has owned and operated since 1995, according to the indictment.

The indictment alleges that the defendants and others filed almost 5,000 false tax returns from 2000 to 2002.

Cristalli said that Neun essentially believed that she was rejecting the tax law.

"We're not here to argue the legality of her beliefs -- we're going to prove that she holds the beliefs in good faith," Cristalli said.

Bowers is mounting a similar defense for Cohen, saying outside the courtroom that "the basis of the (government's) case is that our clients willfully violated the law. They didn't," he said.

Schiff said outside the courtroom that "there is no law that makes you liable for tax," that there is essentially no law that makes an individual responsible for paying income tax. He added that no court has jurisdiction over these matters.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Fields Questions On Privacy And Precedents (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Adam Liptak

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - In a day punctuated by flashes of hostility and humor, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. on Tuesday acknowledged a constitutional right to privacy and said overturning precedent was a "jolt to the legal system."

But he artfully sidestepped the contentious question that has dogged him as a Supreme Court nominee, whether he opposes Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision that established a constitutional right to abortion. [Excerpts, Page A26.]

Roe became an issue minutes after the start of the second day of the first Supreme Court confirmation hearing in 11 years and one in which Judge Roberts, President Bush's nominee to be the nation's 17th chief justice, was also questioned on his views on civil rights, gender discrimination, presidential authority and the proper role of judges.

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, asked Judge Roberts a series of questions intended to draw him out on whether he believes the right to abortion is so embedded in the fabric of American life that it must not be overturned.

The nominee wasted little time in drawing the line against answering questions that, he said, could come before the court. Four minutes into the hearing, he told Mr. Specter, "I feel the need to stay away from a discussion of particular cases."

He reiterated that phrase in one form or another throughout the day on subjects as varied as the right to die and the treatment of foreign detainees.

Democrats kept a tally of the number of questions they said Judge Roberts refused to answer, putting the number at 60.

Judge Roberts told the senators that he did not have a specific legal philosophy, and he resisted comparisons to William H. Rehnquist, the late chief justice for whom he once clerked, telling senators that he would be "my own man."

He also flatly rejected the idea that his Roman Catholic religion played a role in his court decisions, saying: "I look to the law books and always have. I don't look to the Bible or any other religious source."

The session, which began at 9:30 a.m. and continued until nearly 8 p.m., was the panel's first unscripted public exchange with Judge Roberts.

It offered Senate Democrats, who have complained bitterly that they know too little about the nominee's personal views, their first chance to question Judge Roberts on his judicial philosophy and legal record.

Drawing on thousands of documents from the nominee's days as a young lawyer with the Reagan administration, the Democrats peppered Judge Roberts with questions on presidential authority, civil rights and gender discrimination.

Perhaps the sharpest clash involved memorandums that Judge Roberts wrote in the early 1980's that argued that the Reagan administration was correct in opposing new provisions in a law that extended the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The bill, which passed the House with an overwhelming majority, made it easier to prove voting rights violations.

"I'm deeply troubled by a narrow and cramped and, perhaps, even a mean-spirited view of the law that appears in some of your writings," Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who was a chief architect of the extension, said.

In a terse back and forth, Judge Roberts said he supported the Voting Rights Act, noting that the Supreme Court had previously agreed with the Reagan administration,

Later, when Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, pressed the issue again, the nominee could barely contain his exasperation. "Senator," Judge Roberts, 50 years old, said, "you keep referring to what I supported and what I wanted to do. I was a 26-year-old staff lawyer. It was my first job as a lawyer, after my clerkships. I was not shaping administration policy."

There were similar exchanges throughout the day. In one, Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, pressed Judge Roberts about his writings on women's rights, saying, "You speak about modesty and humility, and yet none of these comments are modest or humble."

At another point, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, accused Judge Roberts of being misleading in answering a question about equal treatment for female prisoners, an accusation the judge firmly denied. Mr. Biden repeatedly cut off Judge Roberts, prompting Mr. Specter to interject and instruct his Democratic colleague to let the nominee speak.

"He's filibustering, Senator," Mr. Biden said. Then, to Judge Roberts, he said: "Go ahead. Go ahead and continue not to answer."

There were light moments, as well, as when Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, read Judge Roberts a lengthy quotation from Benjamin N. Cardozo, the Supreme Court justice in the 1930's, in which the justice said, "A judge, even when he is free, is still not wholly free."

Mr. Grassley asked what the passage meant and whether he agreed with it.

"I know I agree with it," Judge Roberts responded. "Now let me figure out what he meant by it."

Another humorous moment occurred when Judge Roberts was asked about a 1983 memorandum in which he advocated term limits for judges.

"You know," he said, "that would be one of those memos that I no longer agree with."

Despite his often-stated reluctance to discuss particular Supreme Court cases, Judge Roberts did not avoid them entirely. He said he agreed with the ruling in Brown v. Board of Education, the 1954 case that declared racial segregation in public schools unconstitutional.

He allowed himself an answer, albeit a careful one, when Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the panel, asked about the 1944 case, Korematsu v. United States, in which the Supreme Court upheld the right of the federal government to place people of Japanese ancestry in internment camps.

Mr. Leahy, saying he wanted to assure himself that Judge Roberts would not "be a Korematsu justice," asked the nominee whether he would consider such internment unconstitutional.

"I suppose a case like that could come before the court," Judge Roberts replied. "I would be surprised to see it. And I would be surprised if there were any arguments that could support it."

The day began with a bang, when Mr. Specter, whose support for abortion rights is well known, delved straight into that topic, pressing Judge Roberts on questions of precedent and the legal principle of stare decisis, a Latin term that means "to stand by things decided."

Mr. Specter quickly introduced the only prop of the day, a large chart that, he said, demonstrated that the Supreme Court had the opportunity to overrule Roe v. Wade on 38 occasions and had not done so.

He reminded the nominee of a remark that Judge Roberts made in 2003, when the Senate was considering him for the seat he has on the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, in which he said Roe was "settled law."

"Do you mean settled for you?" Mr. Specter asked. "Settled only for your capacity as a circuit judge? Or settled beyond that?"

"Well, beyond that," Judge Roberts replied. "It's settled as a precedent of the court, entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis."

Conservatives and liberals said the line of questioning was smart strategy on Mr. Specter's part.

"I think it takes some of the wind out of the Democrats' sails later," said Leonard Leo, who is on leave from a position at the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group, to coordinate support for Judge Roberts.

Some of the most freewheeling exchanges involved Mr. Biden, a potential presidential candidate, who elicited from the nominee that there is a right to privacy to be found in the liberty clause of the 14th Amendment and that the right extends to women.

But Judge Roberts was careful as he made the remark, telling the senators that all the current Supreme Court justices would agree that there was a right to privacy "to some extent or another."

Judge Roberts parted company with some of the justices he will join, if he is confirmed, by expressing reservations about the Supreme Court's recent use of foreign judicial decisions in cases that involved constitutional questions.

In cases in the last few years involving the death penalty and gay rights, several justices have looked to decisions from courts abroad to help justify the rulings.

"The trend," Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, said, "if it is to become one, is greatly troubling to me and to many of my colleagues."

Judge Roberts seemed to agree, citing two concerns. "The first," he said, "has to do with democratic theory."

Because foreign judges are not chosen by the elected representatives of the American people, he said, those judges are not accountable to them.

Moreover, he added, foreign decisions do not confine or constrain American judges.

"Looking at foreign law for support," Judge Roberts said, "is like looking out over a crowd and picking out your friends. You can find them. They're there. And that actually expands the discretion of the judge."

Judge Roberts's position on that point aligns him with Justice Antonin Scalia, who has been harshly dismissive of taking account of international precedents, and against Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Stephen G. Breyer.

In the afternoon, Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, asked Judge Roberts how he hoped historians would remember him.

"I'd like them to start by saying," Judge Roberts said, " 'He was confirmed.' "

Roberts Avoids Specifics On Abortion Issue (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

John G. Roberts Jr. testified yesterday that he believes that the Constitution protects the right to privacy, the legal underpinning of the nation's landmark abortion law, but he refused to say whether he would vote to uphold Roe v. Wade if he is confirmed as chief justice of the United States.

In a day of sometimes testy exchanges with senators, Roberts distanced himself repeatedly from his conservative writings as a young legal adviser to President Ronald Reagan, including a memo in which he had disparaged privacy as "amorphous" and a "so-called right" not spelled out in the Constitution.

Democrats pressed him aggressively, seeking to elicit his views on abortion and a range of other volatile civil rights issues by reminding him of stances he had advocated in the past. But time and again throughout the first full day of questioning at his Senate confirmation hearing, Roberts refused to divulge the way he would rule on matters of voting rights, gender equity, fair housing and the role of religion in public life.

He deflected some questions by asserting it would be improper to foreshadow his views on cases that might come before the Supreme Court. At other times, he shielded his personal views by saying his early writings simply mirrored the policies of two Republican presidents for whom he worked.

"Senator, I was a staff lawyer; I didn't have a position," Roberts said in a typical exchange, when asked about a memo from the early 1980s advocating a policy that would have allowed colleges to receive federal funds even if some of their programs discriminated against women.

The eight-hour hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee gave senators their first chance to publicly grill Roberts, 50, nominated by President Bush to succeed the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. Republicans, who control the committee and the full Senate, praised Roberts and defended his refusal to answer questions because the issues they involve could someday come before the high court.

With the political fallout of Hurricane Katrina hovering over the proceedings, amid evidence that poor people and minorities have suffered the most in the disaster, Republicans also sought to portray Bush's nominee as a former lawyer who had at times displayed compassion for the dispossessed.

But Democrats suggested that Roberts might be a stealth nominee who would shift the court more sharply rightward than his careful testimony suggests. They repeatedly read to him his own words from government memos he had written in the 1980s -- excerpts from tens of thousands of documents released in recent weeks from his time as a federal lawyer -- and demanded to know whether they reflected his personal views, then and now.

"They may be misleading," Specter shot back, "but they are his answers." When the laughter in the marble hearing room died down, Roberts said: "With respect, they are my answers. And, with respect, they're not misleading, they're accurate."

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) sought to persuade a reluctant Roberts to say that he would be the ideological heir to Rehnquist, for whom the nominee once worked as a law clerk. Finally, Roberts agreed that his nomination would not lead to "a dramatic departure" from the Rehnquist court.

Specter, who supports abortion rights, and several Democrats challenged Roberts especially hard on his views of Roe , the 1973 decision establishing that women have a constitutional right to privacy that includes the right to an abortion. Because Roe has stood for 32 years, much of the discussion centered on when and why a settled ruling should be overturned.

Roberts told Specter that he respected the doctrine of stare decisis -- letting decided issues stand -- adding, "I do think it is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent." But some long-standing cases deserve to be overturned, he said, such as those that legalized slavery in the 19th century and racial segregation in the 20th century.

Roberts set forth criteria that he said judges and justices should use to determine whether to "revisit" a precedent, saying they include "settled expectations," the court's legitimacy and whether a precedent is workable or has been "eroded by subsequent developments."

"It is not enough that you may think the prior decision was wrongly decided," said Roberts, who during the 1980s signed a memo saying that Roe was "wrongly decided" and should be overturned.

When Specter asked whether the decision's legal legs have been eroded, Roberts replied: "I feel the need to stay away from a discussion of particular cases."

Later, Biden asked whether "there is a right of privacy to be found in the liberty clause of the 14th Amendment?" Roberts replied, "I do, Senator. I think that the court's expressions, and I think if my reading of the precedent is correct, I think every justice on the court believes that, to some extent or another." The answer appeared ambiguous because some of the current justices have made it clear they would support overturning Roe .

With each senator allotted 30 minutes yesterday to question the nominee, Democrats divided up issues on which they believed Roberts is vulnerable.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), the only woman on the panel, cited portions of half a dozen 1980s-era memos by Roberts that she said reflected a lack of support for women's rights. In one of the memos, regarding the nomination for a prize by the Clairol company of a female government lawyer who had been a homemaker before entering law school, he wrote: "Some might question whether encouraging homemakers to become lawyers contributes to the common good, but I suppose that's for the judges to decide."

"I mention these examples to highlight what appears to be either a very acerbic pen or else you really thought that way," Feinstein said. Roberts replied that he has consistently supported "equal rights for women, particularly in the workplace" and said that he had merely been joking with his boss, former White House counsel Fred F. Fielding, "that there are too many lawyers today. . . . It has nothing to do with homemakers."

Roberts, however, did not say whether he currently favors an equal rights amendment or an expansive interpretation of Title IX, a federal law to promote equality for women in higher education -- both of which the Reagan administration opposed.

Feinstein also questioned Roberts, a Roman Catholic who has argued in past writings for an expanded role of religion in public life, about his views on the separation of church and state. "I don't know what that means when you say absolute separation," Roberts replied. "I do know this: that my faith and my religious beliefs do not play a role in judging. When it comes to judging, I look to the law books and always have. I don't look to the Bible or any other religious source."

The panel's senior Democrat, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) challenged Roberts on civil rights, including his memos on voting rights, which reflected Reagan's opposition to broadened federal protections that ultimately were approved by Congress. Roberts responded that the current Voting Rights Act has been found constitutional, saying, "I don't have any issue with that." But he declined to comment on any extension of the law, saying questions about that could come before the court.

Later, Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) pressed Roberts on why he backed a policy that would have made it harder to prove that states were limiting minorities' voting rights. "I was a 26-year-old staff lawyer," Roberts replied. "I was not shaping administration policy." When Feingold asked whether the policy looked wise in hindsight, the nominee said, "I haven't followed the issue of the particular litigation."

One of the few issues on which Roberts dissented yesterday from Reagan-era policy involved the case of Bob Jones University, in which that administration unsuccessfully argued that the fundamentalist school qualified for federal tax breaks under a law passed by Congress despite its ban on interracial dating. In a 1983 memo, Roberts wrote that the administration "did not feel Congress had given the IRS the authority" to remove the school's tax-exempt status. Yesterday, he told senators he did not believe the Reagan administration had taken "the correct position" on Bob Jones.

Biden accused Roberts of misleading the committee in part by suggesting that his Reagan-era memos simply parroted his superiors' views even though the vigor and detail of the writings suggested the author heartily endorsed them. The senator cited a Feb. 12, 1982, memo in which Roberts defended a Kentucky prison system that provided more services for male inmates than for women. If the system were challenged, the 1982 memo said, Kentucky might end the programs for men, Biden said.

"Explain to me your thinking there," Biden said. Roberts said he did not recall the memo, and when given a copy, he said he was reflecting his boss's views, an example of "good staff work."

"I would regard it as very poor staff work, with all due respect, Judge, because it seems to me you insert your views very strongly in here," Biden said.

Outside the hearing room, Roberts's handling of the abortion issue appeared to frustrate abortion rights proponents, while pleasing antiabortion groups. In front of the Capitol, about a dozen Planned Parenthood Protesters wore shirts emblazoned with the words "Answer the Question." Kate Michelman, the former president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, said, "I don't think we have any clarity yet on his views about Roe and privacy as it relates to reproductive freedom as a fundamental right."

Jay Sekulow of the conservative American Center for Law and Justice said Roberts's description of when courts should be willing to rethink precedents "left the door open" to the possibility he might vote to overturn Roe. "As someone who takes a pro-life position, I was extremely pleased with the answers he gave," he said.

Roberts Focuses On Precedent, Avoids Personal Views (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Chief justice nominee John G. Roberts Jr., addressing one of the nation's most contentious issues, indicated Tuesday that it would be hard for the Supreme Court to overturn the Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion, but he refused to say whether he would support efforts to do so.

Roe and the legal arguments behind it -- especially privacy rights and the rule of precedent -- came to the fore repeatedly during more than 10 hours of questioning by the Senate Judiciary Committee on its first day of grilling Roberts, whom President Bush nominated to lead the nation's highest court.

The hearing provided Democrats their first chance to publicly confront Roberts, a lawyer who currently is an appellate court judge, after weeks of poring through tens of thousands of pages of memos, opinions and other documents he wrote. They used the opportunity to inquire into the nominee's views on issues central to their party's legacy over the last half-century -- abortion rights, civil rights and environmental regulation, among others.

It was Roberts' first time in the full glare of public scrutiny. The 50-year-old former appellate lawyer kept his voice measured, his face placid and his manner deferential. A more deeply furrowed brow was his only sign of discomfort.

Roberts repeatedly reaffirmed his commitment to follow legal precedents. He said more than once that he considered Roe v. Wade, the controversial 1973 decision legalizing abortion nationwide, "settled" under the law.

He also discussed factors that could lead the court to overturn precedents -- and he was careful not to say whether any of those arguments might one day be applied to Roe.

"I do think that it is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent," Roberts said under questioning by the committee chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., a moderate Republican who favors abortion rights.

But Roberts added: "There are situations when that's a price that has to be paid."

Roberts was equally guarded on other issues, but he managed to inject a note or two of humor. Asked by Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., whether he would support the nomination of an equally qualified woman to his same position -- a question hinting at the rationale for affirmative action -- Roberts demurred.

"I don't think it's appropriate for me to comment in any way about the president's future selections, other than to say that I am happy with his past ones," Roberts said to laughter from the audience of senators, aides, reporters and members of the public.

Senate Democrats have expressed reservations about Roberts, but they have indicated they would not block his confirmation, which would require a filibuster in the Republican-controlled Senate. Still, the committee's questioning is likely to be crucial to the way many Democrats ultimately will vote for a nominee who is politically conservative but who has pledged repeatedly to keep an open mind in deciding cases.

"The ideal in the American justice system is epitomized by the fact that judges ... wear the black robes," Roberts said. "That is meant to symbolize the fact that they are not individuals promoting their own particular views, but they are supposed to be doing their best to interpret the law, to interpret the Constitution, according to the rule of law, not their own preferences, not their own personal beliefs."

Roberts will spend Wednesday answering more questions from senators. Thursday, friends and experts are scheduled to testify about Roberts' character and qualifications.

The Judiciary Committee is expected to vote by the end of next week on Roberts' nomination, and the full Senate is scheduled to vote by the end of the month. With his expected confirmation, he would take over leadership of the court when its session begins Oct. 3.

Each committee member was allotted 30 minutes to question the nominee. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., used his time to ask Roberts about his writings on civil rights.

"I am deeply troubled by a narrow and cramped and perhaps even a mean-spirited view of the law that appears in some of your writings," Kennedy said. "In the only documents that have been made available to us, it appears that you did not fully appreciate the problem of discrimination in our society."

Kennedy grew exasperated when Roberts defended the views of the Reagan administration on the Voting Rights Act, for which Kennedy was a central supporter. Specter intervened, asking Kennedy to "let him finish his answer."

The memo "represented my effort to articulate the views of the administration and the position of the administration for whom I worked ... 23 years ago," Roberts said. It was a line of defense he used repeatedly when questioned about his writings from that era.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., asked Roberts to explain several instances in which he appeared to write disparagingly of women or women's rights, including one instance in which he asked -- apparently tongue-in-cheek -- "whether encouraging homemakers to become lawyers contributes to the common good."

Roberts replied that the joke was intended to disparage lawyers, not homemakers.

He said the suggestion that he believed women should remain homemakers "is totally inconsistent and rebutted by my life."

"I married a lawyer," he said. "I was raised with three sisters who work outside the home. I have a daughter for whom I will insist at every turn she has equal citizenship rights with her brother."

During one testy exchange, Specter asked Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., to let Roberts finish, prompting Biden to retort, "His answers are misleading, with all due respect."

"Wait a minute. They may be misleading, but they are his answers," Specter responded. "You may finish, Judge Roberts."

As the day wore on, Democrats at times seemed disarmed by the nominee's genial and sometimes self-effacing testimony.

"I have to say I have been pleasantly surprised by some of your answers today," said Sen Charles E. Schumer, D.-N.Y. He cited Roberts' statement that he agreed there was a right to privacy under the law.

But Democrats also expressed frustration at what they viewed as his lack of responsiveness. Aides to committee Democrats said they counted 21 occasions in which Roberts declined to answer questions, including his views of cases that already had been decided.

"I think you have answered some questions, but not answered a whole lot of others," Schumer said later. "I hope you will be thinking about that overnight."

Roberts defended his reticence, saying he had decided to draw a distinction between discussing legal precedents long established in the law and those that remained the subject of debate. He said he felt free to talk about the former but ethically constrained from discussing the latter.

As he adjourned the hearing shortly before 8 p.m, Specter declared first day "dignified generally, contentious at times, but productive."

Roberts Avoids Specifics On Abortion (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — In a sometimes testy hearing marked by tart exchanges with Democrats, chief justice nominee John Roberts would not say Tuesday if he'd vote to overturn the 1973 ruling that legalized abortion nationwide.

But Roberts did say he believes there is a constitutional right to privacy, and he said the Roe v. Wade ruling is “settled as precedent” that must be viewed with respect by judges.

Appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Roberts repeatedly declined to answer specific questions about his views on several issues, including civil rights and limits on presidential power. He said he was following the precedent of prior nominees.

At one point, Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., accused Roberts of “filibustering.” Roberts, cool under fire, argued that he should not answer specific questions on issues that he might have to rule on if he is confirmed to the Supreme Court.

Doing so would be a “total distortion and a perversion” of the judicial process, Roberts said during the second day of Senate hearings on his nomination to succeed the late William Rehnquist.

Biden, whose exchange with Roberts was one of the most spirited of the hearing, told the nominee at one point: “Go ahead and continue not to answer.” Biden also complained that Roberts' answers were “misleading.”

Snapped panel Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa.: “They may be misleading, but they are his answers.” Roberts' retort: “With respect, they are my answers, and … they are not misleading.”

The combative tone of the hearing led two of the committee's Republicans — Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Jeff Sessions of Alabama — to question whether any of the panel's eight Democrats would vote for Roberts.

Graham said the nomination may mark the end of an era in which most Supreme Court nominees won strong bipartisan approval. He noted that liberal Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg was confirmed in 1993 with 96 of the 100 votes in the Senate. Graham said Republicans, who hold 55 Senate seats, will retaliate “if the Democratic Party votes against him (Roberts) en masse because of his (conservative) philosophy.”

On abortion, Roberts said he regards Roe v. Wade and a 1992 ruling that upheld a woman's right to end a pregnancy as settled precedent. He endorsed stare decisis, the concept that long-established precedents should settle an issue except in special circumstances. “I do think it is a jolt to the legal system” when the high court reverses a precedent, Roberts said.

But Roberts left the door open to overturning Roe v. Wade or Planned Parenthood v. Casey, the 1992 ruling. Specter, a Republican who supports abortion rights, tried to get Roberts to affirm Roe as a “super-duper precedent” in light of Casey and other cases that reinforced Roe. Roberts declined.

Roberts drew complaints from Biden and other Democrats, but Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., an abortion rights supporter, said he was encouraged that Roberts said there is a constitutional right to privacy, a pillar of the Roe decision. Durbin said Roberts left open the possibility that he, unlike Rehnquist, might back abortion rights.

Roberts opponent Nan Aron of the Alliance for Justice, however, said the nominee said nothing that “would give any woman who believes in reproductive rights and freedom any comfort.”

Of the eight remaining justices, six have backed abortion rights. One of those — Sandra Day O'Connor — is retiring. President Bush is likely to nominate a replacement for her after the Senate votes on Roberts. Specter wants a Senate vote this month. If approved, Roberts could take office by Oct. 3, the start of the high court's annual term.

Roberts Fields Hours Of Questions (AJC/AP)

By Nancy Benac, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — For a man who likens the job he wants to calling balls and strikes, John Roberts surely could have used a catcher's mask as he fielded hours of questions Tuesday from the Senate Judiciary Committee.

From the first question of the day — on abortion — right through the alphabet to the Zimmer case on voting rights, Roberts held his own as senators tried to goad him into revealing more of his thoughts than he wanted on the controversial issues of the day.

The artful dodger employed a mix of humor, history and humility as he found 50 ways to defend his views and politely demur when he didn't want to discuss them.

When Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., complained that Roberts was filibustering, the judge lightly scolded, "That's a bad word, senator."

But when Biden later complained, "His answers are misleading, with all respect," Roberts' response was more pointed.

"With respect, they are my answers," he said. "And, with respect, they're not misleading, they're accurate."

On Day Two of the hearings on Roberts' nomination to be chief justice of the United States, there was a lot of "respect" getting flung around.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., differing with Roberts' take on a war powers case, began, "Judge, with all due respect, the cases in Vietnam were not based on a specific law passed by Congress to get out ..."

A few minutes later, Roberts, differing with Leahy's interpretation of a memorandum he once wrote, began, "With respect, senator, you're vastly over-reading the memorandum."

There also were a lot of baseball metaphors, playing off Roberts' declaration a day earlier that a justice should be like an umpire, making sure everyone plays by the rules.

Biden complained that questioning Roberts was "like pitching to Ken Griffey Jr.," adding that the judge had hit a home run in his opening statement Monday.

Nodding toward actor-turned-senator-turned-actor Fred Thompson, who is helping guide Roberts through the nomination process, Biden added, "I'd much rather be pitching to Arthur Branch, sitting behind you there, on 'Law and Order,' than you."

"No two umpires, or no two referees, have the same strike zone or call the same kind of a basketball game," said Kohl, who knows a thing or two about basketball as owner of the NBA's Milwaukee Bucks. "And ballplayers and basketball players understand that, depending upon who the umpire is and who the referee is, the game can be called entirely differently."

Tuesday's televised hearing gave many Americans perhaps their first and last best chance to see Roberts describe his views on the law, given that the Supreme Court itself operates largely as a closed shop.

"If you are confirmed, you will essentially disappear from public view," said Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., a Harvard Law classmate of Roberts. "This hearing will, in some ways, be the last time that the nation will see you at work." He urged Roberts to support televising the court's public proceedings.

Roberts tried to display humility, making several references to the possibility that he still could wind up back on the federal appeals court if his nomination were not approved.

When Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, questioned Roberts about a comment that Justice David Souter had made during his confirmation hearing, Roberts nimbly sidestepped, saying: "Well, I don't want to directly comment on what Justice Souter said. He is either going to be a colleague or continue to be one of my bosses. So I want to maintain good relations in either case."

But at other times, it was as if Roberts couldn't help but come across as the smartest kid in the class.

Biden cut Roberts off mid-sentence as he launched into an explanation of the Supreme Court's three-tiered analysis of the equal protection clause, saying, "I know what that is."

At another point, though, Roberts, holding one lifetime appointment and in line for another, was smart enough to disavow his own words from two decades ago in which he questioned life tenures.

"You know, that would be one of those memos I no longer agree with," he said, with a sly grin.

Nominee's Answers Get Mixed Reviews (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

Republicans and conservatives said John G. Roberts Jr. acquitted himself perfectly before the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday, but Democrats and liberal activists said he ducked questions and probably lost support for his nomination to be chief justice of the United States.

Conservatives from Leonard Leo, the executive vice president on leave from the Federalist Society, to the Family Research Council and Concerned Women for America said Judge Roberts expertly handled questions on abortion, in particular.

But Democratic senators said he was being evasive.

"I think you've answered some questions but not answered a whole lot of others," Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, told the judge in the afternoon session.

"I think it's a game so far," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, who noted Democrats were not treating the hearings as "a game of gotcha."

"The American people are entitled to know what this guy thinks and he will affect your life more than anything Senator Biden will ever do," he said.

Liberal advocates were even harsher.

"Yesterday he spoke about baseball and today he played dodgeball all day," said Ralph G. Neas, president of People for the American Way. "He gave the illusion of candor and the appearance of openness, but he spent the entire day responding to direct questions with evasive answers."

Mr. Neas said Judge Roberts has lost support among Senate Democrats.

"I think he did not do himself any favors with a lot of key votes on that committee," he said. "I do think on the basis, especially of the last several days, there's been momentum, over the last several weeks, as senators reviewed documents and found the portrait the White House painted over the first few days was not accurate."

Judge Roberts, who now sits on the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, faced his first day of questions yesterday.

As of 6 p.m. he had faced 35 questions on civil rights, 10 on following precedent, 40 questions on the role of a judge and 25 on abortion and privacy, according to Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, who said Judge Roberts handled them correctly by declining to answer some.

"I understand the line you're walking and I think it's really a constitutional standard you're trying to observe, and I applaud you for it," Mr. Cornyn said.

"I have never seen a better nominee for the court," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican. "I just don't see why the Democrats don't fold up their tents."

Conservative groups also praised him.

"We firmly believe that Judge Roberts' statements and opinions demonstrate his unequivocal belief in and deference to the text of the Constitution and the intent of the Founders," said Jan LaRue, Concerned Women for America's chief counsel.

Some Democrats have said publicly they do not think Judge Roberts' nomination can be defeated on an up-or-down vote, and as of now there is little talk of a filibuster.

"Is the goal to lay down a marker for next time or is it to try to maximize the number of no votes, or some combination of the two? That decision has not been made yet," said one Democratic aide who has been following the hearings.

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, said Judge Roberts was articulate but not very informative.

"Anybody who's argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court is going to do very well in front of a panel of senators," he said. "I don't think it's any surprise he's been articulate and quick and has developed what most lawyers and politicians share, which is the ability to say not much in an elegant and lengthy way."

Liberal activists fear that Democrats may have already hindered their efforts in the early days after Judge Roberts' nomination to the court was announced.

"I think the Democrats shot themselves in the foot by basically saying this guy's going to pass anyway so what can we really do. That hurt their ability to just have an honest inquiry," said Democratic strategist David Sirota.

He said Democrats must show they are interested in a serious inquiry of the nominee, and use that as a way to show what they as a party stand for.

'Go Ahead ... Continue Not To Answer' (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 14, 2005

John Roberts ceded precious little ground yesterday to a series of senators intent on prodding him into revealing how he might rule in the future, as the Judiciary Committee began its inquisition of the president's nominee to become chief justice of the United States.

Roberts repeatedly, pointedly — and, to critics, selectively — refused to answer whether he supported specific rulings of the Supreme Court.

"I feel a need to stay away from decisions on particular cases," Roberts told Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) when the senator questioned him about abortion, considered by many to be the central issue in judicial nominations.

Roberts offered slight variations on that phrase repeatedly through the day. Quoting current Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Roberts said he intended to give "no hints, no forecasts, no previews" on future rulings if he is confirmed.

Democrats argued that nothing should prevent Roberts from giving his opinions on past cases and provided examples of previous nominees' having done so for the Judiciary Committee. Several committee Republicans, however, encouraged Roberts to keep his positions on specific cases to himself.

Despite a few testy early exchanges with Democratic Sens. Edward Kennedy (Mass.) and Joseph Biden (Del.) over his views on voting rights and sex discrimination, Roberts demonstrated a level of composure rare among high-profile nominees facing adversarial senators.

The 50-year-old nominee seemed so at home before the panel that Biden complained to Specter at one point that Roberts was filibustering. "Go ahead and continue not to answer," a frustrated Biden told Roberts after Specter had interjected in an exchange to give Roberts more time to speak.

In contrast to some past nomination proceedings, senators limited themselves mostly to questions about jurisprudence, rather than Roberts's character or personal qualifications — perhaps yet another indication that Democrats do not intend to use all means necessary to defeat his nomination.

"I'm glad to see that the questions are on substantive subjects and the intellectual level of the discourse has been high," said former Solicitor General Ted Olson, who attended yesterday's hearing. He said that was refreshing.

Some said Roberts's ability to tiptoe carefully around the abortion issue left them unsatisfied. "That he is essentially not sharing his current views about Roe v. Wade continues to be extremely problematic," said Nan Aron, head of the liberal Alliance for Justice.

Though those on either side of the political divide said they could not parse specifically how he would rule from his comments at the hearing, some conservatives expressed optimism that a Roberts-led court would revisit abortion rights.

Gary Bauer, a former Republican presidential candidate who attended the hearing, said there was "a decent chance of him being part of a new majority."

Inside the Hart Building hearing room — a larger and more modern version of the ornate caucus room that housed Monday's opening hearing — the abortion debate was cloaked in case names and legal principles, such as "stare decisis," which means to stand by previous decisions. Roberts acknowledged precedents in both Roe v. Wade and the 1992 case Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, in which the court reaffirmed the central holding of Roe but rejected portions of its framework.

Roberts, who prides himself on offering "stability," said, "It is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent."

He laid out several standards, including whether public expectations rely upon the stability of the law, for considering whether to upend precedents.

"It's not enough that you might think the precedent is flawed," Roberts said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), the lone woman on the panel, asked the nominee about his intentions in a memo suggesting that encouraging homemakers to become lawyers would not serve the common good.

Roberts dismissed his writing as playing on a "common joke" that had more to do with limiting the number of lawyers than maintaining the number of homemakers. During the day, he repeatedly embraced a commitment to equality for his three sisters, his wife — who is also a lawyer — and his young daughter.

The early questioning of Roberts was particularly tame when compared to the often-explosive Supreme Court confirmation hearings of the past two decades. Democrats appear to be holding their fire for President Bush's pick to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who is seen as a swing vote on the court.

"It depends on who he nominates," Durbin said.

Roberts Challenged By Democratic Senators (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman And Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Law.com, September 14, 2005

The Senate Judiciary Committee's second day of hearings into the nomination of John Roberts Jr. for chief justice was marked by withering criticism by some Democrats upset over Roberts' refusal to disavow comments he made while a Justice Department lawyer and as an assistant White House counsel.

Roberts also very carefully -- and repeatedly -- refused to answer questions Tuesday about any specific cases, pointing to what he said was the "precedent of prior nominees."

Said Roberts to Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., "That is something where I will have to draw the line."

In the course of his testimony, Roberts insisted that language in several memos concerning civil rights and discrimination issues that he wrote during the 1980s, when he was a special assistant in the Justice Department and an assistant White House counsel, was simply the work of a diligent staffer.

"I was a staff lawyer; I didn't have a position," he told Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., whose exchange with Roberts was the most spirited in the morning round of questioning.

"His answers are misleading," Biden said at one point to Specter, who had pointedly asked Biden to let Roberts answer his questions.

"With all due respect, they are my answers, and they are not misleading," Roberts shot back, shedding, if only briefly, his characteristic coolness.

Specter, who led off the questioning, dived straight into the abortion debate, with what he called "the central issue of Roe v. Wade and a woman's right to choose."

But rather than ask Roberts directly whether he would vote to overturn Roe, Specter pressed Roberts on his views of precedent and how he would apply them.

"I do think it is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent," said Roberts, seated alone before the 18 Judiciary Committee members, at a table draped with a red cloth.

Roberts added that overturning precedent was something that would never take place in a vacuum. "It's not enough if you may think the prior decision is a wrong decision," he told the committee. "That doesn't answer the question, that poses the question."

Specter did probe Roberts' views on privacy -- one of the few ways senators have of getting a sense of a position on Roe, without an explicit answer on the case itself.

"Personal privacy," said Roberts, "is a component of liberty protected by the due process clause, going back 80 years."

Roberts' comments on Roe did not appear to shake the support of at least some conservatives who oppose the decision. Gary Bauer, president of the conservative American Values, said that based on Roberts' comments Tuesday, "I don't believe either side can come to any conclusion" about whether he would vote to overturn Roe. He added, "I'm willing to take a chance."

In one of his more definitive answers Tuesday, Roberts took sides in an ongoing debate within the Court over the use of foreign laws and precedents in deciding cases. Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., raised the issue, citing last spring's decision Roper v. Simmons, in which Justice Anthony Kennedy invoked worldwide trends in support of his vote to strike down the death penalty for those who were under 18 when they committed their crimes.

Roberts said the use of foreign precedent troubled him because "with foreign law, you can find anything you want." Given the wide range of global laws and norms, Roberts likened the use of foreign law to "looking out on a crowd and picking out your friends." He also said it violates democratic principles, because it makes use of material that was written and decided by authorities who are not accountable to U.S. voters.

Roberts' position would place him strongly alongside Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, and at odds with justices such as Kennedy, Sandra Day O'Connor, and Stephen Breyer, who have said foreign materials are useful, though not dispositive.

Roberts was less decisive on an issue that media organizations were hoping he would be asked about: cameras in the Supreme Court. The Court has repeatedly resisted efforts to allow broadcast coverage of its proceedings.

"It's not something I have a settled view on," Roberts said in answer to a question from Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis.. "I certainly understand the interest." He said that in the past the issue has been referred to the whole Court, not just the chief justice, and he indicated he wanted to hear from other justices before taking a position.

Again and again, Roberts returned to familiar themes throughout the full day of hearings: that courts should judge, not legislate; that the right to be left alone is a fundamental American right, even though it is not specifically mentioned in the Constitution; that he would not answer specifics about any particular cases; and that his religious beliefs would not play any role in his decision-making.

"I do know this, that my faith and religious beliefs don't play a role in my judging," Roberts said in response to questions from Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., about his impartiality. "When it comes to judging, I look to the law ... I don't look to the Bible."

Roberts also sidestepped a question from Feinstein about whether the federal courts should become involved in end-of-life decisions. His response: "An abstract opinion [on that subject] that would pre-judge that case is inappropriate."

Feinstein quizzed Roberts on another memo, this one from July 31, 1985, in which Roberts noted that "Some might question whether encouraging homemakers to become lawyers contributes to the common good ... "

Roberts insisted that the point of the memo was a humorous attempt to point out that there were too many lawyers, an idea, he noted at the hearing, "that goes back to Shakespeare... . It had nothing to do with homemakers."

Much of Roberts' discussion with Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., focused on the nominee's views on the balance between the president and Congress concerning war powers. Leahy cited a Reagan-era memo in which Roberts raised a red flag over a provision in a proposed law that would have given Congress the power to declare when a war was over‹for the purposes of allocating veterans' benefits.

Leahy, his voice rising, asked Roberts if his memo meant that he felt Congress did not have the power to stop a war.

"Senator, you are vastly overreading the memo," Roberts said, adding that the memo concerned a technical matter and that Congress retained the "power of the purse" in funding wars.

By late afternoon some conservative blogs were expressing dismay that Roberts had not been critical of Roe. "If there is a sense of disappointment in the conservative community, it's more of a dissatisfaction with the state of the law than the nominee," said Leonard Leo, the executive director of the Federalist Society and a leading conservative voice on judicial nominations, in an interview.

In fact, Leo said, "the testimony proffered by Clarence Thomas [on Roe] is not that different."

Advocates on the other side were far more critical.

"How many questions can he avoid answering?" wondered Elliot Mincberg, the legal director at People For the American Way.

And Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., interviewed outside the hearing room, had his own explanation for Roberts' insistence on keeping far away from even the remotest comment on a specific case or issue that is likely to come before the Court.

"I've seen it among candidates before," said Kennedy, a member of the Senate since 1963. "When they begin to feel they have the votes, they begin to get more and more vague -- and we're seeing it on the Judiciary Committee."

With a 10-8 split on the committee, Roberts does not need any Democratic votes if, as is widely expected, he maintains the support of all 10 committee Republicans.

In Complex Dance, Roberts Pays Tribute To Years Of Precedent Behind Roe V. Wade (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - Nowhere were Judge John G. Roberts Jr.'s words framed more carefully - or listened to more closely - than on the subject of abortion.

In what advocates on both sides of the issue described as a complex dance, on the first day of questioning by the Senate Judiciary Committee, Judge Roberts paid full tribute to the weight of 32 years of precedent behind Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision establishing abortion rights. "It's settled as a precedent of the court, entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis," he said, referring to the idea that decisions of prior courts are entitled to substantial deference.

In a long colloquy with Senator Arlen Specter, the chairman of the committee, Judge Roberts said, in general, that it was a "jolt to the legal system" when a precedent was overturned. Moreover, he noted, Roe had been explicitly reaffirmed by the court in 1992, in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, and thus had additional protection as precedent. And, at several points during the day, the nominee expressed his support for a constitutional right to privacy, which was the basis for Roe.

But Judge Roberts stopped short, again and again, of endorsing Roe itself. "I think I should stay away from discussions of particular issues that are likely to come before the court again," he said, in a typical exchange. "And in the area of abortion, there are cases on the court's docket, of course."

At another point, when Mr. Specter, a supporter of abortion rights, asked Judge Roberts whether "a woman's right to choose is so embedded that it's become a part of our national culture?" Mr. Roberts again demurred.

"Well, I think that gets to the application of the principles in a particular case," he said. "And based on my review of the prior transcripts of every nominee sitting on the court today, that's where they've generally declined to answer: when it gets to the application of legal principles to particular cases."

Abortion rights advocates, who were overwhelmingly opposed to the Roberts nomination before the hearing began, said his testimony Tuesday affirmed their fears.

"He's clearly embraced the right to privacy, which is the underpinning of the right to choose," said Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, a liberal advocacy group. "But he refuses to say it encompasses the right to choose."

Nancy Keenan, president of Naral Pro-Choice America, said, "He continues to avoid the fundamental question." She asserted that Judge Roberts's position on privacy was "privacy for some but maybe not for all."

Abortion opponents and social conservatives were praising Judge Roberts's testimony as appropriate and - by implication - politically acceptable. "We were pleased with Judge Roberts's answers about Roe v. Wade," said Cathy Cleaver Ruse, senior legal fellow to the conservative Family Research Council. "Judge Roberts refused to give hints or projections about how he might evaluate a future abortion case before the court, but carefully stated what the law is on the matter of stare decisis and repeatedly pledged to follow "the rule of law."

Gary Bauer, president of American Values, said Judge Roberts's answers were carefully scripted by the White House and thus "less than satisfying." But Mr. Bauer added, "A careful reading of the transcript shows he committed to nothing once he is on the court. We are left with what we always had - a hope and an expectation, based on the totality of his record, that if confirmed he will be part of a new conservative majority."

Mr. Specter turned his questioning into a tutorial on stare decisis, all in the context of Roe. He produced a huge chart showing the number of times the court had dealt with Roe-related cases over the years - 38 by his count - and suggested that by now "Roe might be a super-duper precedent."

He noted that the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who did not agree with the Miranda decision requiring criminal defendants to be informed of their rights, nevertheless ultimately voted to uphold it years later because it had become so "embedded" in the culture. Mr. Roberts agreed that the Rehnquist decision to uphold reflected the values of "stare decisis," but again, added a caveat, noting that sometimes courts make a decision that they could reverse a precedent.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, revisited the issue in her questioning, noting that, "there are now entire generations of women who know a world only where their reproductive rights are protected." Was that not, she argued, the kind of "settled expectations" about the law that make "stare decisis" so important?

But again Judge Roberts confined himself to the generalities. Mrs. Feinstein pressed on the Casey decision, and whether he agreed with its ruling that a state could not require a pregnant woman to notify her husband before obtaining an abortion.

"That is what Casey held, yes," he said, carefully. "And that's, as I said before, a precedent of the court, like any other precedent of the court, entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis."

Roberts Rebuffs Democrats' Questions (AJC/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0005266

By David Espo, Ap Special Correspondent

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — Chief Justice-nominee John Roberts repeatedly refused to answer questions about abortion and other contentious issues at his confirmation hearing Tuesday, telling frustrated Democrats he would not discuss matters that could come before the Supreme Court.

"I think nominees have to draw the line where they are most comfortable," said Roberts, who also sidestepped questions about civil rights, voting rights and the limits of presidential power in a long, occasionally antagonistic day in the witness chair.

Appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, he said past Supreme Court rulings carry weight, including the Roe v. Wade decision that legalized abortion in 1973. But he quickly balanced that by adding that the same principle allows for overturning rulings, as well.

Over and over, he assured lawmakers he would be guided by his understanding of the facts of cases, the law and the Constitution, not by his personal views.

"My faith and my religious beliefs do not play a role," added Roberts, who is Catholic.

"I will be my own man," he said later in a daylong session that Republicans said had firmly established his prospects for swift confirmation.

The 50-year-old appeals court judge and former Reagan administration lawyer fielded questions about dozens of legal precedents without benefit of notes. His wife, Jane Roberts, also an attorney, sat behind him, flanked by a delegation of aides the White Houses assembled to assist him.

Roberts flashed his wit occasionally, announcing with a smile that he had reconsidered his long-ago support for term limits for judges. If confirmed, his appointment will be for life.

In a more serious vein, he disavowed the Reagan administration's support for a tax exemption for a university that banned racial dating — but also said he hadn't been involved in discussions on the issue.

He twice rebuffed Democratic attempts to draw him into a discussion of his views on lawsuits under the Voting Rights Act — whether a showing of discrimination should be sufficient to prevail as opposed to a more difficult-to-establish intent to discriminate.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and the committee chairman, raised the question of abortion moments after the hearing began, and the issue reverberated again and again.

"The right to privacy is protected under the Constitution in various ways," Roberts said at one point. Hours later, he said he agreed with a 38-year-old high court ruling in a case involving contraceptives for married couples, a decision often cited as the underpinning for abortion rights.

He said that if confronted with an abortion case — as seems likely in the high court's upcoming term — he would give full weight to the precedent of the landmark ruling that established a woman's right to end her pregnancy.

The legal principle of "stare decisis" requires that, he said — but he also said the same principle allows past rulings to be overturned.

Roberts struck sparks when he indicated his refusal to answer certain questions was based in part on a precedent of "no hints, no forecasts, no previews" that Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg set at her hearings a dozen years ago.

"That is not true, judge," interrupted Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., telling Roberts that Ginsburg had been far more forthcoming, particularly about abortion.

Specter broke in at that point — one of several times he did so during the day — telling Biden to let Roberts finish his answer.

Biden said Roberts wasn't answering at all, then said to the witness seated a few feet away: "Go ahead and continue not to answer."

Despite the Democratic unhappiness, it appeared Roberts' had done nothing to diminish his strong chances for confirmation to replace the late William H. Rehnquist before the high court convenes on Oct. 3.

"We're reliving the '80s," Sen. Lindsey Graham, R,-S.C., muttered during one break, a reference to numerous questions from Democrats about conservative views Roberts expressed in memos he wrote as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration. Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., said he was glad Bush had picked Roberts for the job — and happy, too, that the nominee had rebuffed Biden's questions.

If approved, Roberts would become the nation's 17th chief justice and the youngest in more than 200 years.

President Bush originally named him to replace Sandra Day O'Connor when she announced her retirement earlier this summer. She has been a pivotal vote in recent years on cases that upheld abortion rights and affirmative action, and Roberts is seen by supporters and critics alike as a young, conservative successor with the potential to move the court rightward.

DOJ_NMG_0005267

That changed with Rehnquist's death. Unlike O'Connor, the late chief justice dissented in rulings that upheld a woman's right to abortion, for example. As a result, some of the intensity seems to have been drained from Roberts' confirmation proceedings but is likely to resurface when Bush names a new successor to O'Connor.

Confronted by Democrats with memos he wrote as a Reagan lawyer, Roberts stepped carefully: "In some instances they were consistent with personal views, in other instances they may not be."

Roberts sparred briefly with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., who referred to some of the memos in asking about the views expressed in some that have been made public.

"If your position prevailed, it would have been legal in many cases to discriminate in athletics for girls, women. It would have been legal to discriminate in the hiring of teachers," Kennedy said.

"You have not accurately represented my opinion," Roberts replied.

"Those are your words," Kennedy retorted, but Roberts was unrelenting. "Senator, you did not accurately represent my opinion," he said.

Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the panel, asked about the limits of presidential power, specifically if the chief executive would be obligated to heed a law calling for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from foreign soil by a fixed date.

"I don't want to answer a particular hypothetical that could come before the court," Roberts replied.

Abortion Is The `600-pound Elephant' At Confirmation Hearing (MERCN/KRT)

By Jill Zuckman, Chicago Tribune

The San Jose Mercury News, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - More than civil rights, more than property rights, more than environmental rights, the issue of abortion has insinuated itself into every aspect of the Supreme Court confirmation process. And Tuesday, it seemed to be frustrating nearly everyone.

Perhaps because abortion touches on such core issues as life and death, women's autonomy, personal health and morality, it seems to have a power unmatched by any other subject in American political life.

That helps explain why Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, asked chief justice nominee John G. Roberts Jr. about the landmark abortion case Roe v. Wade in the very first set of questions. And why senators on both sides kept coming back to abortion, notably Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., the only woman on the 18-member committee.

"That is the central issue," Specter, who favors abortion rights, said later. "If you have to pick one important issue that America is hanging on, it's a woman's right to choose."

Not surprisingly, Roberts' answers did not entirely satisfy advocates on either side. This, after all, is a battle of absolutes: One camp considers abortion murder and says it should be forbidden, while the other sees it as a basic human right that should be guaranteed. On top of that, abortion has become perhaps the biggest proxy for the nation's bitter political divisions.

Roberts' answers to questions about Roe v. Wade gave no comfort to liberals, who wanted - though they could hardly have expected - an explicit promise of support for high court ruling that legalized abortion nationwide. But neither did it give comfort to social conservatives who hoped Roberts would vote to overturn the decision.

Still, the politicians who must continually confront the abortion issue in Congress and on the campaign trail used the hearing to push Roberts, and push him hard, for an answer.

The pressure was particularly great on the Democratic side because of fears that Roberts could vote to overturn Roe v. Wade and undo a 32-year-old victory by the abortion-rights movement.

"Even though everyone knows Roberts is going to be confirmed, they have to engage in a good-faith effort to satisfy the groups on the left," said Linda Fowler, a Dartmouth College government professor.

But Roberts, driven by both political and legal considerations, responded in a noncommittal way, paying homage to the importance of precedent and offering a tribute to "settled expectations" among the public.

"It is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent," Roberts said.

While that might seem to be reassuring to those who want Roe v. Wade to stand, Brownback said, "It seemed to me he left open that issue, how he would rule on it."

Gary Bauer, the prominent conservative activist, said he was left with little more than a feeling that Roberts might be on the side of those trying to derail abortion rights.

"Decent chance," said Bauer, noting that neither side can know for sure where Roberts will come down.

By many measures, American society has utterly failed to resolve the abortion issue. Courts have tried to settle it, with Roe v. Wade in 1973 and the Casey decision in 1992 - both essentially guaranteeing the right to abortion within certain limits - but few consider the matter closed.

Many legal scholars question the reasoning in Roe, which is based on the finding of an implied right of privacy in the Constitution. And a significant portion of the population will no doubt be angry and unhappy no matter the legal outcome.

In political campaigns and judicial nominations, the question of abortion is a litmus test of sorts for many candidates and nominees. That, said advocates, is because abortion is not an abstract matter.

"It is such a fundamental issue because it is concrete, it is specific and people understand how it affects their lives every day," said Marcia Greenberger, co-president of the National Women's Law Center.

In her opening statement at the hearing and in a private conversation with Roberts, Feinstein said she was worried about women losing to politicians the ability to control their reproductive systems.

"I remember - and many of the young women here don't - what it was like when abortion was illegal in America," Feinstein said. She could not vote for Roberts, she said, if she thought his vote would send women back to the time of back-alley abortions and trips to Mexico.

But with the Supreme Court poised to address the abortion issue in its upcoming term, and with the justices split 5-4 in past cases, Roberts stayed away from specifics, prompting an angry Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., to accuse him of "filibustering."

Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, accused Roberts of playing "dodge ball." And Debra Ness, president of the National Partnership for Women and Families, said he used "carefully calibrated words" that "shed no light" on whether he would protect a woman's right to privacy or allow government to intrude in family decisions.

Many senators have said they would vote against Roberts - not because of his position on an issue, but because he refuses to explain what his position is.

But judicial nominees have a tradition of declining to answer questions on issues that may come before them on the court. And during a break in the proceedings, Specter said it is not surprising or unreasonable for Roberts to avoid answering his questions.

"I thought he went about as far as he could go," Specter said.

Asked if that means he and other senators will be voting on Roberts' nomination without knowing Roberts' views of Roe v. Wade, Specter said that was correct: "He cannot be required to answer how he's going to decide a case that is going to come before the court."

Unclear On Abortion, Critics Say (WP)

By Jo Becker

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

Nearly a quarter of a century ago, John G. Roberts Jr. wrote skeptically about the legal concept that underpins a woman's right to an abortion, calling it "the so-called right to privacy." Yesterday, when pressed by a Republican senator about his writing, the Supreme Court nominee said he believes that the Constitution contains such a right, but he refused to say whether it covers the termination of a pregnancy.

At issue was a Dec. 11, 1981, memo that Roberts wrote to then-Attorney General William French Smith, in which he referred to "the so-called right to privacy" and said that a speech by former solicitor general Erwin N. Griswold showed that he believed, "as we do," that such an amorphous right does not exist in the Constitution.

"Do you believe today that the right to privacy does exist in the Constitution?" asked Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Roberts replied: "Senator, I do." Asked to square that statement with what he had written more than two decades ago, Roberts replied that he had merely summarized the views of the former solicitor general.

Roberts did not mention, however, that Griswold's speech did not refer, as he did, to the "so-called right to privacy." And Roberts did not say yesterday whether he believes that the right to privacy applies to abortion.

Instead, he repeatedly parried such questions by saying that it would be inappropriate for him to discuss issues that could come before the court.

"We still do not have clarity on his views," said Kate Michelman, former president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, which opposes Roberts's nomination.

Roberts Defends Roe As 'A Precedent' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005269

Federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr. said yesterday that he respects the legal precedence of Roe v. Wade -- the landmark case that established federal abortion rights -- and said that overturning it would "jolt" the stability of the judiciary.

Throughout more than nine hours of testimony yesterday, President Bush's nominee to be chief justice of the United States repeatedly declined to answer questions about specific cases such as Roe, but said Supreme Court precedents in general should not be overturned just because a case has been wrongly decided.

"It is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent," Judge Roberts told senators. "Precedent plays an important role in promoting stability and evenhandedness. It is not enough -- and the court has emphasized this on several occasions -- it is not enough that you may think the prior decision was wrongly decided."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, a pro-choice Pennsylvania Republican, wasted no time getting right to the heart of the Supreme Court nomination fight with an opening salvo of tough questions about abortion. Mr. Specter inquired whether the Constitution contains a "right to privacy," an unwritten phrase that is the basis of abortion rights.

"The right to privacy is protected under the Constitution in various ways," Judge Roberts said. "It's protected by the Fourth Amendment, which provides that the right of people to be secure in their persons, houses, effects and papers is protected.

"It's protected under the First Amendment dealing with the prohibition on establishment of a religion and guarantee of free exercise," he added. "It protects privacy in matters of conscience."

Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican who thinks Roe is "a lawless decision that should be overturned," said he has no confidence that Judge Roberts will overturn Roe if given the opportunity.

"I don't know how to read it," he said of Judge Roberts' testimony. "It made me realize that I don't know what he'll do."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat and leading Roberts inquisitor, told the judge that he was "pleasantly surprised by some of your answers today."

Several Democrats took issue with Judge Roberts' analogy during an opening statement Monday comparing judges to umpires who call the game but don't make the rules.

"As much as I respect your metaphor," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, "it's not very apt because you get to determine the strike zone."

Sen. Herb Kohl, Wisconsin Democrat, advised the nominee that judges are not "automatons."

Judge Roberts agreed, but said judges should not "look to your own values and beliefs," but rather to the Constitution.

"Judges wear black robes because it doesn't matter who they are as individuals," he said. "That's not going to shape their decisions. It's their understanding of the law that will shape their decisions."

Judge Roberts' trademark modesty -- a term he often uses to describe his judicial philosophy -- was evident yesterday when he reminded the committee several times that he might not be confirmed, in which case he would continue in his present position on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit.

Asked about a statement made by Supreme Court Justice David H. Souter during his confirmation hearings, Judge Roberts demurred.

"Well, I don't want to directly comment on what Justice Souter said," he explained. "He's either going to be a colleague or continue to be one of my bosses. So, I want to maintain good relations in either case."

Judge Roberts' quick wit surfaced several times during the long day, such as when he was asked what he'd like history to say about him.

"I'd like them to start by saying he was confirmed," he shot back.

When asked whether he thought Mr. Bush should nominate a woman to the high court, Judge Roberts replied: "I don't think it's appropriate for me to comment in any way about the president's future selections other than to say that I am happy with his past ones."

Mr. Kohl, who had asked the question, smiled and said amid the laughter, "You're not an automaton."

But that's not to say that yesterday's proceedings didn't have sharp moments.

At one point, Judge Roberts emphatically told Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, that the senator did "not accurately represent my position."

In another exchange, Judge Roberts took deep exception to the suggestion by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, that he doesn't believe in equality for women. She quoted from a memo in which he wrote, "Some might question whether encouraging homemakers to become lawyers contributes to the common good."

Judge Roberts dismissed the line as an insult to lawyers -- of which he said there are too many.

"That's a common joke that goes back to Shakespeare," he said. "It had nothing to do with homemakers."

DOJ_NMG_0005270

Any hostility to women's rights "is totally inconsistent and rebutted by my life," he added. "I married a lawyer. I was raised with three sisters who work outside the home. I have a daughter for whom I will insist at every turn she has equal citizenship rights with her brother."

Mrs. Feinstein said she didn't "want to belabor it" -- and moved on to other questions.

Abortion A `settled Precedent,' Roberts Says (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson And James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON - Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts gave strong indications Tuesday that he'd be reluctant to overturn court precedents such as Roe v. Wade, and he voiced support for a right to privacy - which underpins court rulings on gay rights and other individual liberties - that's much broader than his previously known stance.

On the first day of questioning during his confirmation hearings for chief justice, Roberts bluntly described the landmark 1973 ruling that legalized abortion as "settled precedent." He said he would apply a complicated set of criteria to any effort to overturn such a precedent. A judge's personal disagreement with precedent, he said, isn't enough to justify a vote to reverse it.

"I do think that it is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent. Precedent plays an important role in promoting stability and evenhandedness," Roberts said.

That view dovetails with Roberts' insistence that judges play a limited role, and that restraint, rather than activism, is his preferred approach to cases.

Roberts was even more effusive about the right to privacy, saying it's supported in several different clauses of the Constitution and tied to fundamental notions of liberty. That idea puts him at odds with many conservatives - including Justice Antonin Scalia, one of President Bush's favorites - who argue that no such right to privacy exists.

"The court has ... recognized that personal privacy is a component of the liberty protected by the due process clause," Roberts said in answer to a question from Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa. "The court has explained that the liberty protected is not limited to freedom from physical restraint, and that it's protected not simply procedurally, but as a substantive matter as well."

Specter, a moderate conservative and the committee's first questioner, pushed Roberts on abortion and privacy issues. He tried several times to get Roberts to commit to upholding Roe and Casey v. Planned Parenthood of Pennsylvania, the 1992 case that upheld it.

But Roberts said he didn't feel comfortable commenting on specific issues that might come before the court.

Specter said he was satisfied with Roberts' answers.

"He did not give a definitive answer because obviously that question is going to be before the court again; it's going to be on the next term," Specter said. "But I think he - as they said in the old song, `Kansas City,' he went about as far as he could go."

Both liberal and conservative interest groups said Roberts' comments gave no definitive sense of what he might do on the court. Liberals said his statements weren't committed enough to the right to privacy or the right to abortion. Conservatives said he hadn't ruled out any action, particularly concerning abortion.

"He gave no assurance that he believes there is a right to privacy," said Nancy Northup, president of the Center for Reproductive Rights, which supports abortion rights.

"He didn't give any answers," said Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla. "What else can you want out of a judge? He's not going to answer where he is. It's wrong to make him answer where he is."

Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., a staunch opponent of Roe, said Roberts' answers left him in the dark. "I don't know how to read him. I don't know what he's going to do. It just made me know that we don't know what he's going to do. I don't think the president knows what he's going to do.

Asked whether Roberts' answers could raise questions among religious conservatives about his stance on abortion, Sessions said: "They could misinterpret ... and believe that he was making some sort of commitment that I don't think he made. I'm not sure that I could disagree with much of what he said."

Roberts' comments came on a long day of interrogation by senators. It was mostly cordial, but at times got testy. Roberts gave lengthy answers to many questions and mostly maintained the calm, cool demeanor that's his mark in Washington, where, as a private attorney, he's argued 39 cases at the Supreme Court, winning 25.

His refusal to address some queries caused several senators to complain that he was being evasive. Specter cautioned Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., to let Roberts answer their questions before jumping in with commentary or new queries.

"His answers are misleading, with all due respect," Biden replied at one point after Specter tried to silence him.

"They may be misleading," Specter replied, "but they are his answers."

DOJ_NMG_0005271

Roberts interrupted quickly. "With respect, they are my answers. And, with respect, they are not misleading. They're accurate."

Roberts also addressed dozens of other issues during the questioning - some with substantive answers, some with deft evasion and others with polite demurral.

Several times, he suggested that many of the memos he wrote as a young lawyer in Republican administrations were reflective more of presidential policies than his views. But Democratic senators were skeptical.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., zeroed in on a memo that Roberts wrote suggesting that a teenager whose teacher abused her couldn't sue school district officials who did nothing to help her.

Leahy noted that the court unanimously rejected the administration's position, and he asked Roberts whether the memo's intent was to suggest sexual harassment was OK.

"There was no issue about condoning the behavior," Roberts said. "I found it abhorrent then, and I find it abhorrent now." The issue was whether Congress has intended for victims to be able to sue, and the administration believed it hadn't, Roberts said.

Kennedy asked him about his writings on the Voting Rights Act in the early 1980s, which Democrats have said showed hostility to voter participation. As a lawyer in the Reagan White House, Roberts wrote a memo advising the administration to support the act, but not expand it to make it easier to prove voter discrimination in some states.

Ultimately, a congressional compromise accepted the expansion.

Roberts insisted that he believed voting rights were the Constitution's single most important liberty, calling them "preservative of all the other rights."

Then he said the memo was reflective of a different view from Kennedy's - not an indication of a lack of support for voting rights.

"I agreed that the Voting Rights Act should be extended," Roberts said. "There was never a dispute about the basic proposition."

Roberts addressed the question of support for civil rights more directly in response to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

"Opposition to quotas is not opposition to civil rights," Roberts said.

Sen. Herbert Kohl, D-Wis., asked Roberts whether some of the memos he wrote - some of which carried dismissive or acerbic tones - reflected a youthful arrogance that he's since outgrown.

"There are many areas where it appears I knew a lot more when I was 25 than I know now, when I'm 50," Roberts said. "I certainly wouldn't write everything today as I wrote it back then, but I don't think any of us would do things or write things today as we did when we were 25 and had all the answers."

Democrats tried to turn the tide of public opinion by tying Roberts' confirmation to the hurricane victims in New Orleans, saying his view of civil rights and the limited role of Congress and the courts in that area helps explain the plight of the people left behind.

"The question is whether judicial restraint is used as a stalking horse for a kind of quiet activism that seeks to restrict the application of laws designed by the legislature to address particular problems," said Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the nation's largest group of civil rights organizations.

Still, no one's predicting that Roberts won't be confirmed. The only question is by what margin. Rehnquist was confirmed 65-33, the smallest margin for any chief justice. Republicans seemed to be lowering expectations on what Roberts' margin would be.

"If this guy with his qualifications and legal experience cannot get one Democrat to vote for him, we've lost our way," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

Roberts Leaves Fate Of Roe Open (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings and Jess Bravin

WASHINGTON -- Chief justice nominee John Roberts raised concerns among conservatives by telling senators that he recognized a constitutional right to privacy, and backed the 1965 Supreme Court opinion that was later invoked to justify abortion rights -- a central battleground in the current ideological debate over the direction of the judiciary.

But in his first day of questioning by the Senate Judiciary Committee, President Bush's choice to lead the high court left open the fate of the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision on abortion rights -- often linked to the privacy case -- which he suggested rested on different reasoning.

Judge Roberts's embrace of the privacy right underlying Roe rejected the arguments of some prominent conservative legal scholars, and unsettled some religious activists who have made overturning the landmark abortion ruling a centerpiece of their political agenda. He seemed to repudiate a 1981 memo he wrote as a lawyer in the Reagan Justice Department in which he referred to a "so-called 'right-of-privacy.' "

Phyllis Schlafly, president of the conservative Eagle Forum lobbying group, said Judge Roberts's comments yesterday were "a source of concern," but not enough to damp enthusiasm for the nominee. "Bush led us to believe he would appoint a Scalia or Thomas, and he's not a Scalia or Thomas," she said, referring to Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the two most conservative on the bench. "But he'll probably be a Rehnquist and a pretty good judge," she added, referring to the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, whom Mr. Bush chose Judge Roberts to succeed.

On the other side of the spectrum, Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) -- a leader of the liberal fights against President Bush's judicial nominations -- told Judge Roberts that he was "pleasantly surprised" by the privacy comments. Mr. Schumer added that he was disappointed by the nominee's refusal to elaborate on other issues, notably civil rights, which are expected to become a major focus of the second round of questioning today.

The confirmation hearings are scheduled to end by the weekend, and the committee is planning to vote Sept. 22. Barring any bombshells -- which the hearings have yet to produce -- Judge Roberts is expected to win confirmation from the Senate, though a large number of Democrats are likely to vote against him.

During a day of questioning that began at 9:30 a.m. and nearly stretched to 8 p.m. Judge Roberts, who sits on the federal appeals court here, largely stuck to the script most judicial nominees follow, affirming commitments to fairness and respect for precedent, but steering clear of views on specific issues that could trigger opposition.

He sought to distance himself from the memorandums he wrote as a lawyer in the Reagan administration, suggesting that he functioned mainly as a staff lawyer rather than policy maker, and that his views had broadened since he was "25 and had all the answers."

Such replies didn't satisfy Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.), who confronted Judge Roberts about his early-1980s memorandums suggesting ways to narrow the scope of civil-rights laws the liberal senator has backed for decades. Mr. Kennedy said that Judge Roberts didn't grasp "that if his views from that time were actually enacted... there would be less opportunity and more discrimination."

In addition to his comments on privacy, Judge Roberts may have stirred some unease on the right when he talked about helping gay-rights advocates prepare for arguments before the Supreme Court, as a favor to a law partner who was working on the case. When pressed, Judge Roberts said that he wouldn't have done so had he considered it "morally objectionable."

While many cases and issues were covered in the 10-hour-long session, the one that got significant attention was Griswold v. Connecticut, the 1965 case that struck down a state ban on contraceptives. Both conservatives and liberals see that case as the precursor to Roe, and in the 1980s the Reagan administration identified the case as wrongly decided.

But responding to Sen. Herb Kohl (D., Wis.), Judge Roberts said he agreed with the Griswold opinion, where Justice William O. Douglas wrote that the "specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights have penumbras" encompassing unenumerated rights, including "marital privacy."

Moreover, Judge Roberts acknowledged that the court has affirmed Roe's central holding and that precedents shouldn't lightly be disturbed, as sometimes it can be damaging to reverse a questionable precedent if society has come to rely on it.

Judge Roberts's position on what the privacy right entailed, beyond access to contraceptives, remained unclear. He told Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D., Calif.) that privacy "is part of the liberty that is protected under the due-process clause" of the 14th Amendment. He took pains to separate the "penumbras" reasoning on which Griswold relied from the basis of Roe, which found that privacy was protected under the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause. That distinction could allow Judge Roberts to reverse Roe on those grounds, while leaving Griswold undisturbed.

In his comments on Griswold and privacy, Judge Roberts differed from the arguments made by Robert Bork, a Reagan nominee, rejected by the Senate in 1987 in part for denying a constitutional-privacy right. Judge Roberts's remarks were similar to support for Griswold offered by Justice Thomas in his 1991 hearings.

Feinstein: Disappointed Roberts Not More Forthcoming (MERCN)

By Erica Werner

The San Jose Mercury News, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON - Sen. Dianne Feinstein said she was disappointed John Roberts wasn't more forthcoming in discussing abortion, women's rights and other issues during the first day of questioning Tuesday in his Supreme Court nomination hearings.

"I actually felt he made up his mind not to answer my questions, knowing what I might ask," Feinstein, D-Calif., the only woman on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said in a statement after questioning the nominee for her allotted 30 minutes.

"What I was trying to do today is to get a sense of who Judge Roberts is. I'm disappointed that Judge Roberts was not more forthcoming," she said.

Feinstein and the other 17 members of the Judiciary Committee will get another chance Wednesday for more rounds of questioning. During Tuesday's session the nominee to replace Chief Justice William Rehnquist avoided specifics on cases including Roe v. Wade, the case that established the right to abortion.

He said he believed the Constitution contains a right to privacy - the legal concept underpinning the Roe v. Wade decision. But he declined to say whether he thought it extended to abortion, which many abortion opponents believe it does not.

"The exact scope of it, with respect to the beginning of life and the end of life, those are issues that are coming before the court in both respects, and I don't think that I should go further," Roberts told Feinstein in one typical response.

Feinstein is a moderate, but a strong abortion-rights supporter who has repeatedly said it would be difficult for her to support someone she believes would overturn Roe v. Wade. Tuesday's questioning may not have settled the issue for her.

She asked Roberts what weight he would give to the reliance of generations of women on the right to legal abortion.

"Well, again, I think that's asking me whether I think the decision was correct or not on that point," Roberts said, declining to respond.

Feinstein opened her questioning by reading back to Roberts a series of arguably unflattering comments he'd written about women.

Why did he write as an associate White House counsel that, "'Some might question whether encouraging homemakers to become lawyers contributes to the common good?'" Feinstein asked.

Why write in response to female lawmakers concerned about the pay gap, "'Their slogan may as well be, from each according to his ability, to each according to her gender?'"

"I mention these examples to highlight what appears to be either a very acerbic pen, or else you really thought that way. Did you really think that way, and do you think that way today?" Feinstein asked.

"Sen., I have always supported, and support today, equal rights for women, particularly in the workplace," Roberts responded.

He said the first comment was a joke about whether it was good to have more lawyers. The second, he said, was written in the context of a memo making clear the administration's support for equal pay for equal work.

Roberts Sticks To Script On Abortion Questions (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — Since Ronald Reagan's election as president in 1980, Republicans have run on a platform that calls for overturning the right to abortion established in Roe vs. Wade.

And whenever a Republican president's Supreme Court nominees come before the Senate for confirmation, defenders of the right to choose abortion want to know whether the justice-to-be supports the GOP's view on Roe vs. Wade.

Candor in answering that question can be dangerous.

Judge Robert H. Bork, Reagan's third nominee to the high court, had written that Roe vs. Wade was an illegitimate decision and that its right to privacy appeared nowhere in the Constitution.

When asked about that opinion during his 1987 confirmation hearings, he restated his view. And the Senate defeated his nomination.

Since then, Republican nominees have responded to the senators' questions without directly answering whether they would uphold or reverse Roe vs. Wade.

On Tuesday, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. followed that script, assuring pro-choice senators that the court's precedents were the building blocks of the law and should not be knocked down without good reason. It is a jolt to the legal system to overturn a precedent, he said.

Moreover, the 1973 Roe decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court in 1992, he said: It is now a "settled precedent."

And when asked, he readily agreed that the Constitution included a right of personal privacy, the doctrine that formed the foundation for Roe vs. Wade.

But in the end, Roberts did not say that as chief justice he would uphold abortion rights. He simply assured the senators that he would not casually overturn Roe vs. Wade.

When pressed, Roberts refused to go further.

He would not agree with Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, that the right to abortion was "embedded" in American law and culture.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist had used that word to describe the Miranda ruling and its famous right to remain silent. Though Rehnquist had long opposed the Miranda decision, he wrote an opinion upholding it because it was now embedded in American life.

When Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) asked during Tuesday's hearings whether Roe vs. Wade had proven unworkable, Roberts refused to state his view. Earlier, he had said the court should reverse rulings that proved to be unworkable in practice, but he would not say whether the abortion right fit that category.

His careful comments on privacy and precedent sounded similar to the words used by other Republican nominees to the high court.

After Bork's defeat in 1987, Reagan nominated Judge Anthony M. Kennedy of California. He assured senators that he believed the Constitution protected a marital right to privacy, and he was confirmed unanimously.

Judge David H. Souter of New Hampshire said the same in 1990, and he too won easy confirmation.

Judge Clarence Thomas had to overcome a hurdle when he was nominated in 1991. In speeches and articles, he had derided the right to privacy as an invented right, and he had praised authors who spoke of abortion as a holocaust.

During his confirmation hearings, Thomas disavowed many of his earlier writings, and he said he was not committed to following the strict original history of the Constitution.

The liberty protected by the Constitution was "not frozen in time. Our notion of what liberty means evolves with the country. It moves with our history and our traditions," Thomas said.

Nine months later, after he was narrowly confirmed to the high court, Thomas voted to overturn Roe vs. Wade.

As Questioning Begins, Euphemisms Abound (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

Early in yesterday's hearing into his nomination to be chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr. took the Senate Judiciary Committee in an unexpected direction, praising Justice Robert H. Jackson, who served as Franklin D. Roosevelt's attorney general before joining the high court.

"As he went on the court," Roberts told the senators, "he took an entirely different view of a lot of issues, in one famous case even disagreeing with one of his own prior opinions. He wrote a long opinion about how he can't believe he once held those views."

The committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), was puzzled. "Are you sending us a message?" the senator asked. Laughter bubbled from the gallery.

Roberts added that Jackson "recognized, when he became a member of the Supreme Court, that his job had changed And he took a different perspective. And that's, again, one reason many admire him, including myself." A couple of the conservatives on the committee looked up anxiously.

The exchange was emblematic of Roberts's performance on the first day fielding questions. Roberts, star litigator, adviser to presidents and top-flight jurist, showed that he could be something else: the very model of an enigmatic nominee. The Roberts who answered questions for eight hours yesterday was very much the Roberts who emerged in his writings released over the summer. He maddened the committee's Democrats, delighted its Republicans and charmed most of both.

He was sharp-tongued. When Leahy made a skeptical query about one of Roberts's Reagan administration memos, the nominee retorted: "Senator, you're vastly over-reading the memorandum."

He was quick on his feet. When Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) fired off a series of questions without allowing Roberts to answer, the nominee finally replied: "Well, I was about to lay it out. You said you didn't want to hear about it." The room filled with laughter. Biden did not smile.

And he showed flashes of wit. Asked about an old memo he wrote supporting judicial term limits, he admitted: "You know, that would be one of those memos that I no longer agree with, senator. I didn't fully appreciate what was involved in the confirmation process when I wrote that."

Asked about the views of Justice David H. Souter, Roberts replied: "Well, I don't want to directly comment on what Justice Souter said. He is either going to be a colleague or continue to be one of my bosses."

In constitutional matters, the nominee proved deft at saying much and giving away little. The only time Roberts seemed flustered was when Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) dropped the legalese. "I think it stinks that somebody can burn the flag, and that's called speech. What do you think about that?"

"Well," Roberts began, then paused, searching for words.

What Roberts did best -- or, at least, most -- was deflect questions on charged issues.

Roe v. Wade ? "I think I should stay away from discussions of particular issues that are likely to come before the court again."

DOJ_NMG_0005275

Voting rights? "Those cases come up all the time, and I do need to avoid expressing an opinion."

Sitting at a folding table dressed up with red felt, Roberts, his bald spot exposed under the studio lights, offered a stream of such evasions: "I don't think I should express a determinative view. . . . I should not respond. . . . I can't answer that. . . . I do not feel it appropriate for me to comment."

The most inflammatory subject -- abortion -- was essentially off-limits. Both sides claim they have no "litmus test" and therefore cannot ask Roberts his views on abortion. "It's the 600-pound elephant in the room," Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) told reporters during a break. Instead, they got at the subject elliptically, asking Roberts about his view of stare decisis , the Latin term for letting precedent -- in this case, Roe v. Wade -- stand. The word abortion was uttered only six times in the first four hours of the hearing; stare decisis was cited 34 times.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, started things off with a query about "the issue of stare decisis and the issue of precedents."

Roberts knew where this was going. "While I'm happy to talk about stare decisis and the importance of precedent, I don't think I should get into the application of those principles in a particular area," he said.

Specter, shifting from the Latin, wondered whether " Roe might be a super-duper precedent."

Roberts finally showed some leg on stare decisis . Roe "is settled as a precedent of the court," he said, "entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis ."

That was about the most the senators could get out of Roberts.

Roberts told Biden that the 14th Amendment protected a right to privacy -- an apparent nod to abortion rights -- but immediately qualified that by saying: "I think every justice on the court believes that, to some extent or another."

He seemed to take pleasure in the ambiguity. Recalling his clerkship for Judge J. Henry Friendly, he mentioned, approvingly: "He liked the fact that the editorialists of the day couldn't decide whether he was a liberal or a conservative."

Even Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), conqueror of Robert H. Bork, drew little blood. Roberts brushed off Kennedy's complaints about his 1980s memos questioning voting rights laws. "This was 23 years ago," the judge replied. "It was the position of the Reagan administration."

When Kennedy accused him of opposing a civil rights act, Roberts gave no ground. "No, Senator," he said. "You have not accurately represented my position."

With Goal Clear, Nominee Is Profile In Caution (NYT)

By Todd S. Purdum

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - His face never scowled. His level tone seldom varied. He answered questions he found useful to his cause and avoided those he did not. Above all, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. explained his views and defended his honor with the force and fluidity of an advocate who has argued often before tougher judges than those he faced on the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday.

But as he parried a sympathetic Republican's question about how careful the Supreme Court should be in overturning an act of Congress, Judge Roberts also acknowledged a political reality that hung over his confirmation hearings: "All judges are acutely aware of the fact that millions and millions of people have voted for you and not one has voted for any of us."

His job this week is to persuade a filibuster-proof majority of at least 60 senators to vote for him, and under hours of relentless and sometimes hostile questioning, Judge Roberts never lost sight of that goal. He listened. He smiled. He nodded. He spoke of the power of precedent and the importance of humility, using plain language with senators who sometimes got tangled in legal shorthand, jargon and precedents.

The committee chairman, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, drew laughter when he declared: "Now, wait a minute, wait a minute. They may be misleading, but they are his answers."

Judge Roberts calmly replied: "With respect, they are my answers. And, with respect, they're not misleading; they're accurate."

That was about as agitated as Judge Roberts ever got. On Monday, Mr. Specter, a veteran of such hearings, said it was his experience that nominees generally answered just enough questions to be confirmed, and Judge Roberts proved no exception.

He assured senators that he believed the Constitution embraced a right to privacy that has produced Supreme Court precedents protecting the right to contraceptives and abortion. But he declined to specify how such a right might apply to future cases on abortion or the right to die.

He agreed that the Supreme Court was right to outlaw public school segregation in Brown v. Board of Education and said there was new historical evidence to suggest that the framers of the 14th Amendment had envisioned just such a result. But he declined to say just what he thought of some more recent - and more controversial - civil rights rulings, on the ground that similar cases might come before him.

He said he had learned much since the days when he was "25 and had all the answers" as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration. But he declined to specify whether he still agreed with some of the most forceful critiques of pending civil rights legislation he wrote then, or even to confirm whether they represented his own views.

Asked by Senator Herb Kohl, Democrat of Wisconsin, whether he still supported the notion of term limits for federal judges, as he once had in 1983, he answered: "You know, that would be one of those memos that I no longer agree with, Senator. I didn't fully appreciate what was involved in the confirmation process when I wrote that."

In short, he was Delphic, and his supporters and critics each ended the day saying his performance had hardened their enthusiasm or their doubts. Judge Roberts himself said that one of the qualities he most admired in his first judicial mentor, Judge Henry J. Friendly of the Federal Appeals Court in New York, was that his "devotion to the rule of law" made him hard to pin down.

"He liked the fact that the editorialists of the day couldn't decide whether he was a liberal or a conservative," Judge Roberts told Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona. "And he would be chastised for the same opinion, depending on which paper had read it, as either 'that conservative judge' or 'that liberal judge.' And because he wasn't adhering to a political ideology; he was adhering to the rule of law."

At times, Judge Roberts's responses were so bland as to tremble on the precipice of platitude, as when he answered a question from Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, about the meaning of the phrase "Reagan revolution," by saying it meant "a change in attitude" and renewed national optimism.

At other moments, he seemed pained to have to rebut charges that he was insensitive to women. He assured Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, that his long-ago question about "whether encouraging homemakers to become lawyers contributes to the common good" was a joke about lawyers, not wives.

"That's a common joke that goes back to Shakespeare," Judge Roberts said, his face lightly flushed. "It has nothing to do with homemakers. The notion that that was my view is totally inconsistent and rebutted by my life. I married a lawyer. I was raised with three sisters who work outside the home. I have a daughter for whom I will insist at every turn that she has equal citizenship rights with her brother."

Ms. Feinstein frowned but said, "I don't want to belabor it."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, has been among the committee's most vocal skeptics about Judge Roberts in recent weeks, but even he allowed: "I have to say, I've been pleasantly surprised by some of your answers today," and at one point, consciously or not, declared: "You will be chief justice."

That was a luxury that Judge Roberts never allowed himself, invariably employing the conditional voice. When Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, asked him if he agreed with Justice David H. Souter's contention in his own confirmation hearings that the courts sometime fill vacuums in the law left by Congress, Judge Roberts, who now sits on an appeals court, replied: "Well, I don't want to directly comment on what Justice Souter said. He is either going to be a colleague, or continue to be one of my bosses."

By Invoking A Former Justice, The Nominee Says Much But Gives Away Little (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - For those senators who were busy excavating his past for hints of his future, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. had a history lesson of his own to offer on his first day under questioning by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Judge Roberts, who formerly worked in the Justice Department and has now been nominated to be chief justice, invoked the memory of a man who more than 60 years ago made a similar journey between two branches of government and who shed some of his earlier views in the process.

Robert H. Jackson was attorney general when President Franklin D. Roosevelt named him to the Supreme Court in 1941. As Judge Roberts pointed out in a colloquy with Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the committee's senior Democrat, Justice Jackson then changed from "someone whose job it was to promote and defend an expansive view of executive powers" to someone who "took an entirely different view of a lot of issues," including the scope of presidential power.

The nominee's message was oblique, but clear: Do not judge me by the hundreds of memorandums I wrote as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration. Or, as Justice Jackson once said in an opinion to which Judge Roberts alluded, repudiating as a Supreme Court justice a position he had advocated as attorney general: "The matter does not appear to me now as it appears to have appeared to me then."

Justice Jackson himself borrowed that line, which appeared in a 1950 opinion, McGrath v. Kristensen, from a famous judicial recantation by a 19th-century English jurist, Baron Bramwell. And Judge Roberts, speaking to Senator Herb Kohl, Democrat of Wisconsin, offered his own nonspecific variant: "I certainly wouldn't write everything today as I wrote it back then, but I don't think any of us would do things or write things today as we did when we were 25 and had all the answers."

Late in the afternoon, Judge Roberts returned to Justice Jackson in a discussion with Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin. To resolve one of the recurrent clashes over presidential authority, he said, he would turn first to the framework set out in Justice Jackson's concurring opinion in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, the 1952 case that overturned President Harry S. Truman's seizure of the nation's steel mills during the Korean War.

The Jackson theme appeared both heartfelt and strategic, even more so given that Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, Judge Roberts's mentor, who died 10 days ago, had been Justice Jackson's law clerk.

"He's in a sense a descendant of Jackson's court family tree," John Q. Barrett, a professor at St. John's University School of Law who is writing a biography of Justice Jackson, said of Judge Roberts. "It's obviously something he's been thinking about for a long time."

Indeed, in his Senate Judiciary Committee questionnaire for his confirmation to the federal appeals court here in 2003, Judge Roberts answered a question about the justices he most admired. "I admire the judicial restraint of Holmes and Brandeis, the intellectual rigor of Frankfurter, the common sense and pragmatism of Jackson, the vision of John Marshall," he said then.

Robert Jackson was a major figure in his time, at one point considered a potential presidential contender. His evolving view of presidential authority was due to more than his change of venue from the Justice Department to the court. The year he spent, while a Supreme Court justice, as the chief United States prosecutor at the Nuremberg war crimes trials had a formative effect, said Prof. Dennis J. Hutchinson of the University of Chicago, who wrote an article on the subject 10 years ago for The Journal of Supreme Court History.

From his close-up view of the Nazi regime, "Jackson became worried about pervasive national power," Professor Hutchinson said in an interview. "He told his law clerks when he came back that the first step to tyranny was to centralize control of the police and the courts."

In invoking Justice Jackson, Judge Roberts was sufficiently opaque as to leave his performance open to a variety of interpretations. He gave away little of substance. Nor did he quote from a book with which he is undoubtedly familiar, "The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy," an account of Roosevelt's failed court-packing plan. In the introduction, the author asked, as a liberal, a question that many conservatives have asked more recently as they pondered their seeming inability to gain firm control of the Supreme Court. "Why is it," Robert Jackson wondered, "that the court influences appointees more consistently than appointees influence the court?"

Explicit Endorsements Of Some Decisions (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - Judge John G. Roberts Jr. was generally careful not to comment on the correctness of specific Supreme Court cases on the first day of questioning at his confirmation hearings on Tuesday. But not always.

Judge Roberts was willing to discuss decisions concerning school desegregation, the privacy of the marital relationship, the internment of Japanese-Americans and the limits of presidential power. His willingness to comment on cases seemed to increase in direct proportion to his assessment of the extent to which they have become fundamental to an understanding of American constitutional law.

He was unequivocal in accepting the reasoning in Brown v. Board of Education, the landmark 1954 school desegregation case, and the result in Griswold v. Connecticut, a 1965 decision that struck down a law that made the use of contraceptives a crime and served as a basis for later cases protecting abortion and gay rights.

He explained how he had drawn the line between cases he was willing to discuss and those that were off limits in the context of Griswold.

"I feel comfortable commenting on Griswold and the result in Griswold," he said, "because that does not appear to me to be an area that is going to come before the court again."

He was slightly less categorical in discussing Korematsu v. United States, the 1944 decision that upheld an executive order under which 120,000 Americans of Japanese ancestry were removed from their homes and confined in detention camps. It is widely viewed as a low point in the Supreme Court's history.

"Can I assume," Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont asked, "that you will hold the internment of all residents of this country who are interned just because they have a particular nationality or ethnic or religious group - you would hold that to be unconstitutional?"

Judge Roberts seemed to be of mixed minds about answering, and he gave a carefully modulated answer.

"I suppose a case like that could come before the court," he said. "I would be surprised to see it. And I would be surprised if there were any arguments that could support it."

Later in the day, he noted that while Korematsu had not been formally overruled it was widely considered discredited.

Fred T. Korematsu, the plaintiff in the case, who died this year, filed a supporting brief in the Supreme Court arguing that the detention of prisoners in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, resembled his case.

Mr. Leahy, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, also asked Judge Roberts about a 1952 decision known as Youngstown. It rejected the argument that President Harry S. Truman had authority to seize private steel mills.

"Would you consider Youngstown settled law?" Mr. Leahy asked.

Judge Roberts chose his words carefully. "I think," he said, "the approach in the case is one that has guided the court in this area since 1954, '52, whatever it was."

Roberts Criticizes Foreign Law Used As Precedent (WT)

By James G. Lakely

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

Supreme Court chief justice nominee Judge John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday rebuked a recent high-court decision that relied on foreign law, calling it a "misuse of precedent" that substitutes a judge's "personal preferences" for the Constitution.

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, asked Judge Roberts what, "if anything, is the proper role of foreign law in U.S. Supreme Court decisions?"

The question was a reference to the Roper v. Simmons decision by the Supreme Court in March, in which the majority cited foreign law to overturn a death-penalty sentence for a 17-year-old murderer.

That 5-4 decision is cited by conservative legal scholars as one reason it is important for President Bush to appoint a reliable conservative to the Supreme Court.

One justice Mr. Bush has cited as a model for his appointments, Antonin Scalia, wrote a scathing dissent of Roper, declaring that when it comes to the court, "the views of our own citizens are essentially irrelevant," while "the views of other countries and the so-called international community take center stage."

Judge Roberts maintained that he didn't want to comment on any particular case decided by the court.

"I would say, as a general matter, that there are a couple of things that cause concern on my part about the use of foreign law as precedent," said Judge Roberts, beginning his critique by noting that while U.S. judges are not held directly accountable by the people, the politicians who appoint them are.

"In that way, the role of a judge is consistent with democratic theory," Judge Roberts said.

But a Supreme Court ruling that cites foreign statutes, as the majority decision did, he said, circumvents that accountability.

"If we're relying on a decision from a German judge about what our Constitution means, no president accountable to the people appointed that judge and no Senate accountable to the people confirmed that judge," he said. "And yet he's playing a role in shaping the law that binds the people in this country. I think that's a concern that has to be addressed."

Mark R. Levin, president of the conservative Landmark Legal Foundation and author of "Men in Black: How the Supreme Court Is Destroying America," said Judge Roberts was "right on."

At yesterday's hearing, Judge Roberts called the "little debate" this year at American University between Justice Scalia -- who disagreed with the Roper decision -- and Justice Stephen G. Breyer -- who supported it -- "very illuminating."

It was clear, however, that Judge Roberts sided with Justice Scalia.

He said "domestic precedent" has the ability to "confine and shape the discretion of judges," while noting that the precedent of foreign countries wrongly "expands the discretion of the judge."

Ed Whelan, president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center, said it is unusual for a prospective justice to criticize directly a recent court decision. And while noting that Judge Roberts was careful not to cite Roper specifically, he said the nominee's critique of its justification was correct.

"There is no legitimate basis for the Supreme Court to rely on contemporary foreign laws or decisions in determining the meaning of provisions of the Constitution," Mr. Whelan said.

Roberts Probed On Overturning Past Rulings (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

How much weight should a Supreme Court justice give to "stare decisis," the Latin phrase meaning to let stand what has already been decided?

The Senate Judiciary Committee's Chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, wasted no time yesterday probing Judge John G. Roberts Jr.'s view on the doctrine.

Specifically, Mr. Specter asked how stare decisis applies to Roe v. Wade, which legalized abortion in 1973, and a subsequent case which upheld it in 1992.

Judge Roberts said he wished not to discuss abortion since it is likely to come before the Supreme Court again, but asserted that past rulings may indeed warrant reconsideration under special circumstances.

"It is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent," he said, adding that "the principles of stare decisis recognize that there are situations when that's a price that has to be paid."

Judge Roberts cited the historic 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education, which revisited and overturned the "separate but equal" Plessy v. Ferguson ruling of 1896, paving the way for racially integrated public schools.

Legal scholars say stare decisis carries more weight than any other single judicial philosophy adhered to by the Supreme Court, but that it is by no means carved in stone.

Edward P. Lazarus, an appellate lawyer in Los Angeles, noted the high court's revisiting of issues related to sexuality in recent years.

In 1986, the court upheld a Georgia law criminalizing privately conducted oral and anal sex between consenting adults. The court revisited and overturned the ruling in 2003, finding such laws are unconstitutional.

"The notion that this is a court that will not revisit past precedent, that's not true," Mr. Lazarus said.

He added, however, that "there is a relationship between how long a case has been around and the court's willingness to revisit it."

"The degree to which society has organized itself around a decision is a well-acknowledged factor in the stare decisis calculus," Mr. Lazarus said.

Disagreements over the extent to which society has organized itself around legalized abortion are at the core of the debate over whether stare decisis should apply to Roe v. Wade.

After nearly two decades on the books, the Supreme Court revisited the ruling in 1992 and upheld it with Planned Parenthood v. Casey. Moments into yesterday's hearing, Mr. Specter, the lone pro-choice Republican on the committee, asked Judge Roberts whether stare decisis shall apply to Roe and Casey.

"For two decades of economic and social developments, people have organized intimate relationships in reliance on the availability of abortion in the event contraception should fail," said Mr. Specter, directly quoting the Casey ruling.

"Would you agree with that?" he asked.

"The importance of settled expectations in the application of stare decisis is a very important consideration," Judge Roberts said.

"Whether the doctrinal bases of a decision have been eroded by subsequent developments," he said, "may be a basis for reconsidering the prior precedent."

Probed further, Judge Roberts said: "I do feel compelled to point out that I should not, based on the precedent of prior nominees, agree or disagree with particular decisions."

Roberts Minimizes His Role (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

Federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr. downplayed his pro-bono legal work to help a homosexual rights group win one of the most significant Supreme Court cases regarding such rights.

"I was asked frequently by other partners to help out, particularly in my area of expertise," he told Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican. "And I never turned down a request."

The 1996 decision in Romer v. Evans ruled unconstitutional a voter-approved constitutional amendment that barred municipalities from granting homosexuals a protected class under civil rights laws.

Mr. Specter read a quote from a former colleague of Mr. Roberts' who said the nominee played a significant role in preparing the case.

"Every good lawyer knows that if there is something in his client's cause that so personally offends you, morally, religiously, or if it so offends you that you think it would undermine your ability to do your duty as a lawyer, then you shouldn't take it on," said Mr. Specter, quoting former Hogan & Hartson lawyer Walter A. Smith. "And John -- referring to you -- wouldn't have. So at a minimum, he had no concerns that would rise to that level."

"I think it's right that if there had been something morally objectionable, I suppose I would have" avoided involvement, Judge Roberts said. "But it was my view that lawyers don't stand in the shoes of their clients and that good lawyers can give advice and argue any side of a case."

While Judge Roberts did not write briefs or become deeply involved in preparing the case, he did review files and help prepare oral arguments for Lambda Legal without charge. He also played the role of conservative Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia in the mock trial.

Liberal Groups Focus On 'Flipping' Centrists (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 14, 2005

Liberal interest groups are focusing on flipping three centrist Republican senators from the Northeast as the key to their strategy at least to tarnish the confirmation of Supreme Court nominee John Roberts.

Many Democratic Senate aides, strategists and journalists believe that Roberts's confirmation is a foregone conclusion. But liberal activists such as Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, insist the battle is not over and the committee and floor votes will be close.

The outlook is not encouraging for liberals. No Democratic senator has stated that he or she would oppose Roberts, though Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) a senior member of the Judiciary Committee, said he would vote no based on the nominee's writings.

Democratic lobbyists who advise Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) have said that as many as 25 centrist and mainstream Democrats may vote for Roberts.

Liberal leaders are frustrated that the press has in some cases already called the fight a win for Republicans.

"You've said we've given up," Neas said with a tone of exasperation to a reporter at yesterday's hearing. "You've written your stories too soon."

Liberal strategists say that if they can turn a Republican against Roberts it would embolden Democrats to follow suit. Accordingly, they are focusing their lobbying efforts on Sens. Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island.

"They're critical," said Llenda Jackson-Leslie, president of the National Women's Political Caucus, a self-described bipartisan grassroots organization with 22 state chapters dedicated to supporting female candidates. "Conservative Democrats will look to them."

Jackson-Leslie said her organization's staff has met aides to Collins and Snowe. Though the National Women's Political Caucus has yet to take a position on Roberts, Jackson-Leslie said she is becoming impatient because she believes he is being evasive. That echoes a theme sounded by committee Democrats yesterday.

Snowe, Collins and Chafee are considered ripe targets for several reasons.

In the 2004 election, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) defeated President Bush in Maine and Rhode Island. Chafee and Snowe face reelection next year. All three lawmakers voted this year against the confirmation of Judge Bill Pryor to the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Chafee also voted against former Texas Supreme Court Justice Priscilla Owen's nomination to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. He is considered one of the most vulnerable Senate Republicans and has already picked up the endorsement of NARAL Pro-Choice America, an abortion-rights pressure group strongly opposed to Roberts.

"We certainly want to reach Senators Chafee, Collins and Snowe," said Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, who with Neas is leading a coalition of liberal groups opposing Roberts. "Those are the three I can think of off the top of my head. We certainly begin with them, and we've provided our report to them."

Hilary Shelton, director of the Washington bureau of the NAACP, said his group would target Republicans who support the group's position on civil rights. He named Collins, Snowe and Chafee, as well as Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Mike DeWine (R-Ohio).

But Chafee and Collins, in particular, may be difficult to persuade.

Collins said on a Maine radio station yesterday that she was leaning strongly in favor of voting for Roberts but was waiting until the end of the hearing to decide.

DOJ_NMG_0005281

And the Providence Journal reported yesterday that Chafee was also leaning toward supporting Roberts, pending the outcome of the hearing.

That is despite heavy pressure in Maine and Rhode Island from liberal groups.

Liberal leaders in Washington began coordinating with local activists in Maine last year, when the effort to flip Snowe and Collins started, said Sarah Standiford, head of Maine Women's Lobby. They contacted activists in Rhode Island in June, said Marti Rosenberg, executive director of Ocean State Action, which is coordinating Rhode Islanders for a Fair Judiciary.

Standiford's group is part of a coalition of some 40 local groups in Maine concerned about Roberts's nomination. She said a substantial number of those groups have already decided to oppose Roberts. Members of the groups have participated in media events and have scheduled meetings with Collins and Snowe during the next two weeks, she added

The Maine coalition has received materials and other assistance from the Washington-based national coalition of liberal groups opposing Roberts, Standiford said.

Rosenberg said more than 20 local groups are affiliated with Rhode Islanders for a Fair Judiciary. The activists are encouraging Rhode Islanders to contact Chafee and Sen. Jack Reid (D-R.I.) and urge them to oppose Roberts. Rosenberg said she and liberal leaders in Washington have discussed strategies for lobbying Chafee on Roberts since June.

The Judicial Confirmation Network, a pro-Roberts conservative organization, is countering the efforts of liberal groups in Maine. The group is working with local activists, running phone campaigns and sending letters to editors in order to put pressure on Snowe and Collins. The group is not active in Rhode Island.

Roe Ruling: More Than Its Author Intended (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — In mid-1971, the Supreme Court agreed for the first time to hear a constitutional challenge to the long-standing state laws limiting abortion. Its decision to do so reverberates today.

At that time, Texas and 30 other states had laws, dating from the 19th century, that made an abortion a crime unless it was performed to save the mother's life.

Georgia, like California, had revised its laws in the late 1960s to permit abortion in specific circumstances: if the mother's health was endangered, if the pregnancy was caused by rape or if the fetus had a severe defect.

The newest member of the Supreme Court, Justice Harry A. Blackmun, saw much to like in the revised abortion laws. A lawyer who greatly admired doctors, he had been general counsel for the Mayo Clinic in his home state of Minnesota before becoming a federal appellate judge.

He believed that doctors needed to have leeway to do medically necessary abortions. In the court's first private conference on the issue, he described Georgia's law as "a fine statute [that] strikes a balance that is fair."

Yet, a year later, Blackmun wrote an opinion for the court that struck down all of the nation's abortion laws. Equally important, his opinion made virtually all abortions legal as a matter of a constitutional right.

That opinion, in the case of Roe vs. Wade, remains the court's most disputed decision of recent decades. By abruptly voiding all laws against abortion, it galvanized a powerful antiabortion movement that has transformed American politics.

It also dominates public debate over the court and its future. The Senate confirmation hearing for Judge John G. Roberts Jr., like those of all recent nominees, is focusing on one question: Will he vote to uphold or to reverse Roe vs. Wade?

Blackmun's Story

Last year, on the fifth anniversary of Blackmun's death, the Library of Congress opened his papers to the public. His thick files on the abortion cases tell the little-known story of how Roe vs. Wade came to be. It is the story of a rookie justice, unsure of himself and his abilities, who set out to write a narrow ruling that would reform abortion laws, not repeal them.

It is also the story of a sometimes rudderless court led by Chief Justice Warren Burger. On the day the ruling was announced, Burger said, "Plainly, the court today rejects any claim that the Constitution requires abortion on demand."

Blackmun proposed to issue a news release to accompany the decision, issued Jan. 22, 1973. "I fear what the headlines may be," he wrote in a memo. His statement, never issued, emphasized that the court was not giving women "an absolute right to abortion," nor was it saying that the "Constitution compels abortion on demand."

In reality, the court did just that.

Blackmun had said that abortion "must be left to the medical judgment of the pregnant woman's attending physician." So long as doctors were willing to perform abortions — and clinics soon opened solely to do so — the court's ruling said they could not be restricted from doing so, at least through the first six months of pregnancy.

DOJ_NMG_0005282

But the most important sentence appears not in the Texas case of Roe vs. Wade, but in the Georgia case of Doe vs. Bolton, decided the same day. In deciding whether an abortion is necessary, Blackmun wrote, doctors may consider "all factors — physical, emotional, psychological, familial and the woman's age — relevant to the well-being of the patient."

It soon became clear that if a patient's "emotional well-being" was reason enough to justify an abortion, then any abortion could be justified.

Legal scholars have long pointed to the shaky constitutional basis for a right to abortion. Blackmun referred to the 14th Amendment, which says that a state may not "deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

In earlier opinions, the court had said that liberty included the concept of personal privacy. "This right to privacy … is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy," Blackmun declared.

Earlier this year, 11 legal scholars, led by Yale's Jack Balkin, tried to write a better opinion. Their book of essays, "What Roe v. Wade Should Have Said," proposed several alternatives, such as saying sexual equality for women required a right to abortion.

Far less attention has focused on the all-or-nothing nature of the Roe vs. Wade ruling.

Today, as in the early 1970s, the American public appears to have decidedly mixed views on abortion. In a Gallup poll in May, for instance, only 23% of those surveyed said abortion should be "legal under any circumstances," the rule set by Roe vs. Wade.

Only 22% said abortion should be "illegal in all circumstances," the rule that could take effect in many states if the Supreme Court were to overturn Roe vs. Wade.

The largest group — 53% — said abortion should be "legal only under certain circumstances."

But Roe vs. Wade foreclosed this middle course — for the states as well as for the court. It does not give states the room to adopt what might be a popular compromise: permitting abortions during the first three months of a pregnancy, but not afterward. Nor does it permit states to authorize only "medically necessary" abortions, a reform idea of the late 1960s.

How did Blackmun and the Supreme Court produce such a broad ruling on abortion, while professing to do no such thing?

Court scholars and law clerks from the Roe era say there is no single explanation. Some say Blackmun naively thought that doctors would perform abortions only for medical reasons.

"He was thinking of this in the medical framework of Rochester, Minn. He imagined abortions would be performed by a family physician or in a hospital," said historian David J. Garrow, the author of a scholarly history of the abortion-rights movement.

The justices did not foresee the full impact of the ruling or the backlash it would set off, said Georgetown University law professor Mark V. Tushnet, who was a clerk for Justice Thurgood Marshall when Roe was decided. They focused on striking down the Texas-type laws that outlawed all abortions, he said.

"All they wanted was to get those laws off the books," Tushnet said. "They were not thinking long-term with an overall vision."

In Burger's Footsteps

Blackmun made it to the Supreme Court because of his boyhood friend, Burger.

In 1969, President Richard Nixon chose Burger to be chief justice of the United States. A year later, after Nixon tried and failed to get two Southern judges confirmed, Burger suggested his old friend. Burger and Blackmun were soon dubbed the "Minnesota Twins."

In June 1971, five justices (but neither Burger nor Blackmun) voted to hear abortion cases from Texas and Georgia.

When those cases came before the court in December 1971, only seven justices were seated. Justices Hugo Black and John Marshall Harlan, both ailing and near death, had suddenly retired. Their Nixon-appointed successors — Lewis F. Powell Jr. and William H. Rehnquist — would not join the court until January and thus would not participate in abortion deliberations that term.

At the court's private conference, the seven justices agreed that the Texas law was extreme and unconstitutional, according to the notes of several justices. Even Byron R. White, a critic of abortion, said doctors must be permitted to act when there were "health problems."

Blackmun voiced disdain for feminists who said women deserved control over their bodies. "There is no absolute right to do with one's body what you like," he said. But he agreed that the Texas law was extreme and said it did "not go far enough to protect doctors."

The Georgia law was much better, the justices said, except for a requirement that three doctors approve an abortion.

Days later, the liberal justices were irked to receive a memo from Burger saying he had chosen Blackmun to write both opinions. With little guidance from colleagues, Blackmun and his clerks began research.

Meanwhile, the court turned its attention to the death penalty. Capital punishment had been under attack, and in January 1972 the full court voted 5 to 4 to strike it down.

The ruling, handed down in June, described the states' death penalty laws as arbitrary; they sometimes treated rapists the same way they treated mass murderers. But it left room for states to try again. Most states rewrote laws to focus on those thought most deserving of execution. By 1976, the high court had upheld the revised laws and restored capital punishment.

Had abortion cases followed a similar course, the court would have required states to reform their laws to give more leeway to doctors and to pregnant women. But it would have also left states the power to prohibit abortions in some circumstances.

Blackmun's final opinion left no room for prohibitions on abortion. That was not apparent in the spring of 1972, however.

In mid-May, Blackmun wrote "a first and tentative draft" for Roe vs. Wade that stopped well short of declaring a constitutional right to abortion. Instead, it said the Texas law did not give doctors enough guidance.

Criminal laws must be clear, the court had emphasized, so people don't unwittingly commit a crime. Blackmun said Texas physicians could not be sure whether they were committing a crime by performing an abortion on a patient whose troubled pregnancy might risk her life.

"I come out on the theory that the Texas statute … is unconstitutionally vague," he said in a memo to his colleagues on May 18, 1972. "I think that this [finding] would be all that is necessary for the disposition of the case, and that we need not get into the more complex" issues.

In retrospect, this proved to be a crucial time in the court's handling of the abortion issue. Blackmun had proposed issuing a short opinion that would have struck down the Texas law and the 30 others like it. However, it would have also left the states ample room to revise their laws.

His proposal set off a flurry of memos on what to do next.

Justices William O. Douglas and William J. Brennan, mindful that Nixon's new appointees would join the deliberations if the cases were reargued in the fall, wanted quick action and a stronger opinion.

Burger, however, wanted to go slowly. He knew the Brennan-led majority was about to announce the striking down of the death penalty on a 5-4 vote. Burger and Blackmun had dissented, as had the new Nixon appointees, Powell and Rehnquist. Burger expected the votes on abortion to line up the same way.

If the abortion cases were carried over until the fall, Powell and Rehnquist would cast their votes, and the chief justice — with Blackmun and White also on board — could envision a new 5-4 majority that would uphold most of the state abortion laws.

"This is as sensitive and difficult an issue as any in this court in my time," Burger wrote. "Hence, I vote to reargue early in the next term."

A Miscalculation

But Burger miscalculated by seeking a delay. Had Blackmun's draft opinion been adopted, it would have left states free to prohibit abortions for nonmedical reasons. However, Blackmun reluctantly joined Burger in seeking a delay, and the majority voted to put off a decision on the abortion cases until the fall.

Blackmun spent the summer working in the Mayo Clinic's library in Minnesota. He researched the history of abortion in Persian, Greek and Roman times. He also studied abortion laws adopted in 19th century America and concluded that the bans were driven not by moral imperatives but by the reality that, before antibiotics, abortion — like other medical procedures — was dangerous.

When Blackmun returned to Washington, he had a long draft. It was a thorough work of medical history, but short on constitutional law. It also was hazy on just when abortion would be permitted or prohibited.

In October, the nine justices sat through the arguments again. When they met to discuss the cases, there was a surprise. Powell, the soft-spoken Virginian who was new to the court, firmly supported a woman's right to abortion. He urged Blackmun to say it directly rather than attack the laws as vague.

For Powell, the issue was personal: When he was a lawyer in Richmond, Va., a young man came to him in despair. His pregnant girlfriend had tried to abort her fetus with his help, and she had bled to death. Powell went to the authorities to explain what happened. Thereafter, he was determined to see abortion made safe and legal.

Suddenly, there were six solid votes to strike down the Texas and Georgia laws, and Blackmun had the backing to write a broader opinion in favor of a right to abortion. The liberals, who had worried about the delay, found they had a stronger hand, and Burger found himself with no room to maneuver.

On Nov. 21, two weeks after Nixon's reelection, Blackmun sent around revised drafts of the majority opinions. The Roe opinion said that for the first three months of a pregnancy, states must "leave the abortion decision to the best medical judgment of the pregnant woman's attending physician."

In a memo to his colleagues, however, he voiced uncertainty.

"This has proved for me to be both difficult and elusive…. You will observe that I have concluded that the end of the first trimester is critical," he wrote, referring to a cutoff date for permitting abortions. "This is arbitrary, but perhaps any other selected point, such as quickening or viability, is equally arbitrary." The first trimester is the first three months of a pregnancy.

Brennan, Marshall and Powell wrote back to say that allowing abortions until "viability" — when a fetus has developed enough to live outside the womb — at six months made more sense.

Douglas disagreed. "I favor the first trimester, rather than viability," he said. He was outvoted, however, and Blackmun said he would revise the opinion over the Christmas holidays. In his final draft, states were told they could not restrict abortions through the second trimester.

That change would become the focus of today's legal and political battles. Opponents have especially condemned a procedure they call partial-birth abortion, which usually takes place in the fifth or sixth month of a pregnancy.

Blackmun's opinion ends by saying: "The decision vindicates the right of the physician to administer medical treatment according to his professional judgment…. The abortion decision in all its aspects is inherently, and primarily, a medical decision…. If an individual practitioner abuses the privilege of exercising proper medical judgment, the usual remedies, judicial and intra-professional, are available."

As some scholars later said, his opinion treated the pregnant woman as a bit player in a doctor's drama.

White and Rehnquist filed dissents, but Burger delayed casting his vote. His colleagues suspected that he did not want the opinion released before Nixon's second inauguration, set for Jan. 20.

As that day approached, Burger filed a short concurrence and predicted the ruling would not have "sweeping consequences."

Blackmun's proposed press release also downplayed the potential effects of the ruling, stressing that it would not mean "abortion on demand." His court colleagues convinced him that it would be inappropriate to issue a statement that commented on a ruling.

So, on Jan. 22, 1973, Roe vs. Wade and Doe vs. Bolton were handed down as 7-2 rulings in favor of a new right to abortion. That afternoon, former President Lyndon B. Johnson died, pushing aside the abortion decisions as the biggest news story of the day.

Sounding Less Conservative But Still Noncommittal (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

Under detailed public questioning for the first time since President Bush tapped him for a seat on the Supreme Court, John G. Roberts Jr. appeared to sound a less conservative note on abortion-related issues than he had in the memos and briefs he wrote as a lawyer in the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations.

He offered a surprisingly emphatic endorsement of a constitutional right to privacy -- the basis of the Roe v. Wade decision recognizing a right to abortion, which he seemed to disparage as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration.

And, as if repeating a carefully formulated phrase, he referred time and again to a 1992 Supreme Court ruling upholding Roe as "a precedent entitled to respect."

Yet, ever the careful lawyer, Roberts committed himself to nothing more tangible than a promise to think hard before voting either to uphold or overturn the abortion precedents about which so much controversy revolves. Each time a senator pressed him for a clear statement, up or down, on abortion rights, Roberts refused, saying that to do so would be to declare his views on an issue that the court may face in the future.

The overall impression was of a talented nominee who used his skills to avoid twin perils: revealing nothing of his views or revealing too much.

Tacitly acknowledging that he would have far more latitude to make changes in the law as chief justice than he has now as an appeals court judge, Roberts offered a list of factors he would weigh in deciding whether to overturn a precedent of the court.

Stare decisis is the legal term for the principle that courts should let existing decisions stand for the sake of stability in the law -- and discussion of stare decisis took up much of the hearing, basically as a proxy for the larger issue of abortion.

Roberts told Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, that established precedents, including both Roe and the court's 1992 affirmance of Roe in Planned Parenthood v. Casey , should be overturned only when they have proved "unworkable," or when they have been "eroded" by intervening decisions of the court.

As examples of cases in which he thought the court was right to overturn precedent, Roberts cited the court's New Deal-era abandonment of its past cases invalidating economic regulations, and Brown v. Board of Education , the school desegregation case that overturned the court's 1896 validation of racial separation in public facilities.

But those reversals by the court, much debated in their day, are no longer controversial. Roberts's criteria, "while superficially specific, are in fact highly elastic and could be used to overturn Roe and Casey , or to uphold them, depending upon his proclivities," said Michael J. Glennon, a professor of constitutional and international law at Tufts University's Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy.

No sooner had Specter, a strong supporter of Roe , gaveled the proceedings to order at 9:30 a.m. than he began boring in on Roberts about the abortion precedents, asking whether he agreed with the Supreme Court's view, expressed in Casey , that so many women had come to rely on the abortion right that Roe had to be upheld.

Roberts did not answer directly, but did concede that Casey is a valid precedent "entitled to respect" and that "it is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent."

Yet he repeatedly brushed aside invitations to say whether overturning Roe -- after being upheld in Casey -- would be too big a jolt.

Specter invoked a change of heart by Roberts's mentor, the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, for whom Roberts clerked in the court's 1980-1981 term. He noted that Rehnquist, a life-long critic of the 1966 Miranda decision that recognized a suspect's "right to remain silent" when questioned by police, ultimately voted to uphold it in 2000.

Rehnquist had concluded that Miranda was "embedded" in the "national culture," and Specter asked whether the same could be said for "a woman's right to choose."

Roberts demurred.

"I think that gets to the application of the principles in a particular case," he said. Like previous nominees to the court, Roberts said, he would refuse to say how he would rule.

In the coming term, the high court will hear a challenge to a New Hampshire law that requires teenagers to notify their parents before they can get an abortion. The question for the court is whether Roe and Casey require the state to permit an exception to the law in cases in which a girl's health may be in danger.

Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) seemed pleasantly surprised when Roberts told him that he agrees with a 1965 Supreme Court decision declaring "that there is a fundamental right to privacy as it relates to contraception."

Kohl said he was "delighted" to learn that Roberts had just endorsed an opinion which, Kohl said, leads logically to "a woman's right to choose to terminate her pregnancy," the right recognized in Roe v. Wade .

But, once again, Roberts slipped the punch. "That's an area that I do not feel it appropriate for me to comment on," he said.

Roberts Proves To Be A Cool, Savvy Witness (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic And Toni Locy

USA Today, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee John Roberts was a deft witness Tuesday, showing himself to be a smart, articulate, by-the-book jurist while offering only minimal answers to senators' questions.

When Democrats tried to put him on the defensive about his past positions as a Reagan administration lawyer or his current reluctance to explain his views, the conservative federal judge countered their assertions without losing his cool. It was senators such as Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Joseph Biden, D-Del., who became visibly frustrated.

On the substance of the law, Roberts gave them little to chew on. He said he believed in a constitutional right of privacy and that he regarded Supreme Court rulings that upheld a woman's right to end a pregnancy as settled precedent. But he declined to tip his hand on how he, as U.S. chief justice, would vote on cases involving abortion rights.

Again and again, Roberts' answers were to the point and dispassionate. When Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., asked what Roberts could do for the victims of Hurricane Katrina if he were on the high court, Roberts said the most important task would be “to uphold the rule of law.” Roberts said he expected some lawsuits related to the hurricane's aftermath to end up in federal court, and did not comment further on the tragedy.

The confident, Harvard-trained lawyer who became wealthy arguing cases before the Supreme Court also declined to express regret for certain memos he wrote as a young, wise-cracking counsel to the Reagan administration. At one point, Kennedy told Roberts that his writings on voting rights lacked an appreciation for problems related to racial discrimination. “I'm deeply troubled by a narrow and cramped and perhaps even a mean-spirited view of the law that appears in some of your writings,” Kennedy said, citing memos in which Roberts had argued for narrow interpretations of laws that protect racial minorities from discrimination. Roberts later told Kennedy that “you have not accurately represented my position.”

At another point during Tuesday's hearing, Biden accused Roberts of “filibustering” and called his answers “misleading.” Roberts' response: “With respect, they are my answers. And, with respect, they're not misleading, they're accurate.”

Biden later told reporters that questioning Roberts was “a little like pitching to Ken Griffey Jr.,” the Cincinnati Reds slugger.

DOJ_NMG_0005286

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., pressed Roberts for his views on the separation of church and state. Roberts eluded the question. But the nominee, a Roman Catholic, emphasized that his faith is not a factor in how he decides cases. He said he looks to “law books … not the Bible” in resolving disputes.

Roberts' remarks about privacy partially opened a window on his thinking, but they did not reveal how he would vote on questions of abortion rights.

During an exchange with Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., Roberts expressed respect for past decisions. He acknowledged the significance of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 ruling that made abortion legal nationwide, and a 1992 ruling in which the high court upheld Roe. Roberts did not, however, say whether he would support those decisions.

“I do think that it is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent,” he said. “It is not enough that you may think the prior decision was wrongly decided.” He said he would weigh many factors when considering whether to overturn a case, including stability in the law, public expectations and whether a prior court ruling had worked. Roberts declined to apply his view of precedent to abortion.

His remarks on privacy separate him from Robert Bork, the failed 1987 court nominee who rejected constitutional privacy. Bork said that a 1965 ruling that first found a right to sexual privacy was wrong.

But Roberts' comments also are distinct from those of David Souter, the 1990 nominee of the first President Bush. During his confirmation hearings, Souter vigorously embraced a broad right of privacy. Once on the court, he wound up casting a crucial vote to uphold Roe in the 1992 ruling.

Roberts Stays Solid Favorite Without Firm Answers (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — John G. Roberts Jr. exuded the quiet confidence of a man who knew that he was ahead in the game during a lengthy but mostly sedate confirmation hearing Tuesday.

He left the long first day of questioning before the Senate Judiciary Committee the same way he entered it: a clear favorite for confirmation as the youngest chief justice of the United States in two centuries.

By firmly refusing to answer questions on specific cases he might face on the bench — including the 1973 Supreme Court decision guaranteeing the right to abortion — Roberts may have provided Democrats already inclined to reject him more grounds to do so. But most analysts agree that he said little that was likely to enlarge the circle of senators opposed to him.

Indeed, with his conciliatory comments on the right to privacy and the importance of precedent, Roberts appeared to provide centrist Democrats with greater "cover to vote for him," said Marshall Wittmann, a senior fellow at the centrist Democratic Leadership Council.

"Just on grounds of being evasive, he will probably get a core of Democrats who will vote against him," Wittmann said. "But his nomination is not imperiled by any means."

Roberts' performance marked a bright spot for a White House battered by criticism of its response to Hurricane Katrina, and demonstrated the inherent vitality of presidential power.

Amid dissatisfaction not only with the hurricane response, but also with high gas prices and the war in Iraq, President Bush faces approval ratings for his job performance that are lower than the lowest points for such controversial predecessors as Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton.

Yet Bush is on the brink of installing a chief justice who could shape American life for more than the next quarter century. And in a few weeks, Bush is to nominate a justice to fill a second vacancy.

With two national polls released this week showing that at least 55% of Americans supported Roberts' confirmation as the hearings began, GOP strategists expressed confidence that committee Democrats had not meaningfully dented Roberts' likelihood of approval.

"I don't think they landed a punch on him — and they have to get a knockout," said one GOP strategist who requested anonymity when discussing White House thinking. "They are not touching him."

One supporting piece of evidence for that view was the reaction of Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) to Tuesday's hearing. Nelson, the leader of seven mostly centrist Democrats who reached a bipartisan deal in May over judicial filibusters, had said he was inclined to back Roberts absent unexpected revelations at the hearings.

As Tuesday's questioning wound down, David DiMartino, Nelson's spokesperson, said the senator "had not seen or heard anything problematic."

On the other hand, one senior Senate Democratic aide said Roberts' refusal to answer questions about his views on specific cases, following the White House's refusal to release documents related to his service in the George H.W. Bush administration, could give opponents new ammunition to rally resistance. "There is no better way to [unify] our caucus than to stonewall," said the aide, who requested anonymity when discussing Roberts' nomination.

Roberts, in his testimony, was composed and rigidly disciplined. He did not make a reference to his family or personal life until after about three hours on the stand, when he cited his wife, young daughter and three sisters in rebutting charges from Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) that memos he had written as a government attorney displayed a lack of concern about discrimination against women.

When Roberts flashed the dry wit that friends have touted, Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) looked at him sympathetically and said, "You're not an automaton."

Only a few Democrats generated much momentum against him with their questions. Roberts seemed flustered when Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) pressed him about memos he had written on civil rights issues as a Justice Department attorney in the Reagan administration. There were fewer sparks between the Democrats and Roberts than between the Democrats and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who repeatedly admonished Kennedy and Biden for interrupting Roberts' answers with new questions.

The most tension revolved around how extensively Roberts would discuss his views on previous court rulings. Opponents such as Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, accused Roberts of evading "legitimate direct questions."

Roberts' supporters, in a torrent of e-mails released during the day, said he had properly demurred. "What he is doing is exactly what you would want a judge to do, which is to say, 'I am not going to discuss matters that will come before me because I don't want to prejudge them,' " said Ronald A. Cass, a former Boston University Law School dean working with a coalition supporting Roberts.

Roberts seemed most comfortable when he could discuss, in the tone of a law professor, rulings from the distant past, such as the 1857 Dred Scott decision, which helped spark the Civil War.

More relevantly, Roberts expressed support for the landmark 1965 Griswold vs. Connecticut ruling, which assured married couples access to birth control based on a constitutional right to privacy. Roberts' comments on the Griswold ruling may have been reassuring for supporters of legalized abortion, because the right to privacy was also a foundation of the Roe vs. Wade decision. Roberts also may have heartened them when he emphasized his reluctance to overturn settled law.

Yet when discussing Griswold with Kohl, Roberts would not say whether he believed the right to privacy extended to abortion. Roberts quickly recoiled when Specter, a supporter of legalized abortion, nudged him to imply that his respect for precedent would lead him to uphold Roe.

"I feel the need to stay away from a discussion of particular cases," Roberts told Specter a few minutes into the hearing. That was the first of many times Roberts would use such a formulation during his testimony.

Cass and David Yalof, a political scientist at the University of Connecticut who studies judicial appointments, said those answers, taken together, provided little guidance on whether Roberts would uphold the legal right to abortion.

But with his language on precedent and privacy, Roberts "gave a lot of ground to Democrats," Yalof added.

Throughout the day, Roberts followed a consistent — and often brilliantly effective — strategy of citing historical examples dear to liberals to defend his views. For instance, to make his case against overly activist courts, Roberts did not assail any of the Earl Warren-era decisions denounced by conservatives. Instead, he said the court had overreached in Lochner vs. New York, the 1905 decision that overturned a Progressive-era law to set a 10-hour workday.

Roberts cited later decisions overturning Lochner and mentioned the 1954 Brown vs. Board of Education decision banning school segregation to make his case that judges cannot always uphold precedents.

He used this tactic perhaps most effectively when Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) pressed him on memos he had written during the Reagan administration that aggressively asserted presidential authority to act without congressional oversight.

Roberts quickly noted that Justice Robert H. Jackson, a mid-20th century hero to Democrats, had expressed similar views as Franklin D. Roosevelt's attorney general, but "took an entirely different view" and voted to limit presidential power on the court.

"Are you sending us a message?" Leahy asked when Roberts finished.

Characteristically, Roberts avoided an unequivocal answer. Like many of his remarks Tuesday, his response to Leahy offered hints, but no promises, of conciliation in an era of intense partisan confrontation.

Newsview: Roberts Smooths Rough Edges (AP)

By RON FOURNIER, AP Political Writer

AP, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) - Perhaps the smoothest politician in the Senate hearing room, John Roberts cast himself Tuesday as a humble, fair-minded jurist with views just nimble enough to please anybody - from the abortion-rights ``soccer Mom'' to the staunchest red-state conservative.

But there should be no mistake about his ideology. Roberts is deeply conservative. Period.

His performance before the Senate Judiciary Committee suggests that Democrats - with only 44 of the Senate's 100 votes - stand little chance of keeping Roberts out of the chief justice's seat, where he could help shape the nation's course for a generation or more.

``It's like pitching to Ken Griffey,'' said Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., using a baseball metaphor to praise Roberts' political skills.

Right out of the batter's box Tuesday, Roberts faced fast balls.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, tried to elicit Roberts' position on the 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling that legalized abortion. Would he abide by ``stare decisis,'' the doctrine that says justices should honor previous court rulings?

``Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would,'' Roberts replied. ``To avoid an arbitrary discretion in the judges, they need to be bound down by rules and precedent.'' He declared Roe v Wade ``settled as a precedent,'' and said overturning high court rulings creates ``a jolt to the legal system.''

A casual viewer might think he had ruled out overturning the 1973 abortion ruling. Not so.

In sentences thick with legalese, Roberts said precedents must be overturned when they are proven ``unworkable'' or ``eroded by subsequent developments.'' He refused at least three times to give his views on Roe v. Wade, citing a long tradition of judges not commenting on cases they might consider in the future.

Like a good politician, Roberts left his fingerprints on both sides of the issue.

``He did his best, and cleverly, to imply that he's sympathetic to Roe and its value as precedent,'' said Democratic consultant Jim Jordan. ``But we'd be foolish to take his testimony as an assurance that he's supportive of the right to choice or even the more fundamental right to privacy.''

``We're concerned about these statements,'' said anti-abortion activist Troy Newman, president of Operation Rescue. ``But the proof will come when it's time for him to rule on these cases as a justice.''

Most other conservatives had no doubts about Roberts' view.

``He certainly left the door open to overturning any case that is incorrect under the Constitution,'' including Roe, said Wendy Long of the Judicial Confirmation Network.

On the Internet, conservatives gleefully praised Roberts for his wink-and-nod approach. ``Roberts' answer was brilliant. He made a statement that will satisfy most Americans about privacy while leaving himself enough wiggle room to move the court on that issue in the future,'' said a blogger on Confirmthem.com.

It was the same story when Roberts was asked whether he believed in a person's right to privacy, a cornerstone of Roe v. Wade. ``Senator, I do. The right to privacy is protected under the Constitution in various ways,'' Roberts replied. He said it extends to searches of people and homes as well as ``matters of conscience.''

But that's hardly a broad definition of the right to privacy. Roberts did not say whether he would apply the right to a woman's body for the purposes of abortion.

``He still must answer this vital question directly,'' said Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, an abortion-rights group.

On another social issue, Roberts was asked about the legal assistance he gave a gay rights group in a Colorado case about discrimination. Rather than staking out his position on either side of the contentious issue, Roberts told senators he was just doing what attorneys do.

``Good lawyers can give advice and argue any side of a case,'' he said.

That was often Roberts first line of defense when Democratic senators pressed him about memos he wrote a quarter century ago as a loyal foot soldier in the Reagan Revolution. He worked for the White House and the Justice Department, writing provocatively about conservative views.

``I was a staff lawyer,'' Roberts told senators. ``I didn't have a position.''

If he has positions now, he insisted they wouldn't affect his rulings. ``You don't look to your own values and beliefs. You look outside yourself to other sources,'' he told the senators.

Does he have a judicial ideology? Roberts says no: ``I resist labels.''

Well, his friends and foes alike have one for him: Conservative.

Roberts Eases Concerns, But Leaves Plenty Of Wiggle Room (USAT)

USA Today, September 14, 2005

John Roberts more than lived up to his billing Tuesday as a knowledgeable, superbly prepared, genial and highly articulate legal mind — and as a nominee determined not to answer any question that could cause him trouble. But all-day testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee nevertheless offered some new impressions of the prospective chief justice.

The first is that he is more likely to be a cautious, establishment jurist than a firebrand in the mold of Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas — or at least that is the impression he sought to convey. Most notably, Roberts distanced himself from some of his most troubling past writings, attributing them to youth (many were written when he was in his 20s), the need to reflect the views of his employer (the Reagan administration) or to misinterpretation (a comment about not wanting homemakers to become attorneys was just a lawyer joke).

If that is self-serving, it is nevertheless enlightening.

On privacy, which Roberts once referred to as a "so-called right," he reversed field, asserting flatly that such a right exists even though it is not explicit in the Constitution. Scalia and Thomas both have questioned that premise, the cornerstone of landmark decisions asserting a woman's right to use birth control or seek an abortion. Roberts also expressed healthy respect for the importance of the court's precedents generally.

On discrimination against women, which he had once mocked, he expressed deep personal concern. On civil rights and voting rights, he similarly dismissed past statements.

Most notably, the nominee resolutely refused to discuss his views on abortion, and in doing so he gave both sides in the debate something to worry about. He seemed to signal that the barrier to reversing Roe v. Wade would be high but not impossible.

Similarly, on civil rights and women's rights, the most critical question was left unanswered: What remedies would he allow the government to apply?

That is a matter of concern, and it was reinforced by his refusal to discuss the reach of Congress' power to regulate issues affecting health, safety, the environment, the workplace and other matters. His previous record has been raising questions.

Though no one expects Roberts to discuss pending cases, he could have been more forthcoming on key issues of settled law.

Still, the dominant impression left by his testimony was of a man who would likely be a dynamic chief justice with an independent — though surely conservative — mind. He went some distance toward easing concerns that he's outside the judicial mainstream.

A Judicious Script (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

Judicial confirmation hearings almost always reveal more about the interrogators than the nominee. So it was with the first day of questioning Tuesday for John G. Roberts Jr., the president's choice for chief justice. But beyond the grand piece of political theater, there were moments of candor and revealing insights into the nominee's philosophy.

Most important, Roberts reaffirmed his commitment to the principle of stare decisis, which Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) helpfully defined for viewers who didn't go to law school as the importance of adhering to judicial precedents. Of course, at one level, for Roberts to say he believes in stare decisis is a bit like a college fraternity kid saying he believes in free beer.

But Roberts' answer went beyond token lip service. "I do think it is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent," he said, adding that "it is not enough that you may think a prior decision was wrongly decided." Stability, he added, is another factor in determining whether a decision should be overruled. The subtext here was clearly Roe vs. Wade, and Roberts' answer surely made opponents of a woman's right to choose an abortion a bit anxious (although its genius was that it was sufficiently opaque to worry supporters of abortion rights, too).

Throughout, Roberts remained as inscrutable and affable as ever. By the third question of the day, Roberts gave an answer that he would repeat in various formulations countless times over the next eight hours: "I feel the need to stay away from a discussion of particular cases." .

Specter, the committee chairman, played the role of earnest professor, trying to coax the answer he wanted from his student. Other senators tried different tactics but met with similar results. Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), a self-described non-lawyer, played the naif, asking about the role of judges and prompting an erudite (and purely theoretical) discourse on former Justice Benjamin Cardozo. Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.) made a noble effort to learn Roberts' views about civil liberties and executive powers after 9/11. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) asked about the civil rights movement.

The two senators with the most colorful parts were Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.). Biden bullied Roberts, while Graham flattered him. Roberts proved immune to both approaches.

None of this is unexpected, of course, and none of it is likely to affect Roberts' chances for confirmation. At one point, Feingold referred to Roberts as "the principal decision-maker" on the court, as if he had already been confirmed. But even if these hearings are mostly theater, they can still be useful — as theater itself can be — by offering the public a new perspective on something we thought we knew.

In the case of the Senate, we may not be favorably impressed. But at least this cast will be back for a second run of the show in a few months, after the president nominates a replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Here's hoping they'll have better lines.

Bush Accepts Blame For Slow Hurricane Response (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Ashley Powers And Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — President Bush took responsibility Tuesday for breakdowns in the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, saying the massive storm had "exposed serious problems in our response capability."

Although personally shouldering blame for the first time, Bush also insisted that flaws occurred "at all levels of government," and said he wanted more cooperative relations with state and local officials to aid dispossessed Gulf Coast residents. He plans a fourth post-hurricane trip to Louisiana on Thursday to deliver a national address on the crisis.

As Hurricane Katrina's death toll in Louisiana rose to 423, bureaucratic infighting raged as the governor traded charges with federal emergency officials over bogged-down efforts to retrieve the bodies of flood victims.

Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said Federal Emergency Management Agency officials had jeopardized the massive body recovery effort by failing to renew a temporary contract with a Houston mortuary firm. Blanco said the state would try to rehire the company on its own, and accused FEMA of shirking its financial oversight for the retrieval process. FEMA officials insisted that they had no decision-making role, but later tried to reassure Blanco.

"No one, even those at the highest level, seems to be able to break through the bureaucracy to get this important mission done," she said. "I am angry and outraged."

National Guard and Army troops have joined in the retrieval of bodies in recent days, but the grim ordeal in New Orleans has moved slowly, hampered by the deteriorating condition of corpses left in floodwaters and exposed to the sun over the last two weeks. Military units have had to tether dozens of bodies to trees and poles so they can be found by overworked mortuary teams.

In the first major criminal case arising from the hurricane, the state's chief prosecutor charged a husband and wife who owned a nursing home in St. Bernard Parish with negligent homicide, accusing them of abandoning dozens of elderly residents to die in the raging flood.

"They were warned repeatedly that this storm was coming," said Louisiana Atty. Gen. Charles C. Foti Jr. Their inaction "resulted in the deaths of these people."

Pathology experts and even a disaster mortuary official working for FEMA in the Gulf Coast expressed alarm at the risk of unattended bodies lying in the open for weeks. "What I've seen is not encouraging," said Cotton Howell, a South Carolina emergency management official who is leading FEMA's Disaster Mortuary Operations Response Team in Mississippi. "It seems like there are all sorts of problems over there."

With water now covering less than 40% of New Orleans, there were more heartening signs of revival. The Army Corps of Engineers said it was pumping out about 9 billion gallons per day, and that the city should be drained of floodwaters in about a month.

The first passenger flights returned to Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport. Port officials said they expected the first cargo ship to arrive next week. And Mayor C. Ray Nagin said he hoped to reopen the historic French Quarter and the city's central business district next week, along with the Algiers and Uptown neighborhoods, which mostly escaped storm damage.

"We are bringing New Orleans back. We are bringing its culture back, we are bringing its music back," Nagin said. Glancing up at military helicopters thudding overhead, he added: "I'm tired of hearing these helicopters. I want to hear some jazz."

Nagin also acknowledged that Katrina's knockout blow had exhausted the city's cash reserves. "I don't think we will have to" declare bankruptcy, Nagin said. "There are so many people who want to help us." He added that he was "working furiously" to obtain lines of credit from banks and the federal government.

After a tour of the flood-ravaged city Monday, Bush had pledged that the federal government would help in New Orleans' recovery. He deflected questions about federal mismanagement of Katrina relief, though, saying he would not "play the blame game" — a phrase that White House officials used repeatedly after the storm.

But Tuesday, appearing at a Washington news conference with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, Bush spoke plainly when asked whether the government was prepared for another natural disaster or a terrorist attack.

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government," he said. "And to the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility."

Bush added that he wanted to "know how to better cooperate with state and local government, to be able to answer that very question: Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm? And that's a very important question, and it's in our national interest that we find out exactly what went on so we can better respond."

By accepting personal responsibility, Bush appeared to try to shift the debate away from finger-pointing to the reconstruction of New Orleans, a formidable task that could repair his frayed image as a leader if it succeeded. Widespread public dismay with federal efforts has translated to Bush's lowest polling numbers in his five years as president.

Bush's admission drew immediate praise from one of his harshest critics.

"The president's comments today will do more to move the country forward from this tragedy than anything that has been said by any leader in the past two weeks," said Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.). "Accountability at every level is critical, and leadership begins at the top."

In Landrieu's home state, debate simmered between Blanco and FEMA officials over who was responsible for a floundering corpse-recovery operation. Last week, FEMA announced that Kenyon International, a Houston company that retrieved bodies after the Sept. 11 World Trade Center attacks, had been hired to recover and transport the corpses of flood victims.

But Tuesday, Kenyon officials said they were unable to come to terms with FEMA to extend their contract. Blanco quickly lashed out, accusing FEMA of yet another failure. "In death, as in life, our people deserve more respect than they have received," she said.

David Passey, a FEMA spokesman, responded that the agency had only a supporting role in the operation and that the state was in charge. When state officials asked for assistance last week, Passey said, FEMA entered into a verbal agreement with Kenyon. Passey added that he did not know why Kenyon had rejected a written contract.

State officials responded that in order to be reimbursed for the massive operation, they needed FEMA's financial approval. Irritated by the delay, Blanco said she "could not wait any longer" and authorized state officials to start their own negotiations with Kenyon. On Tuesday night, Blanco said she had been reassured by Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, who is heading FEMA's relief operation.

"He expressed his confidence that our federal partners are working hard to quickly recover all bodies," Blanco said.

Kenyon spokesman Bill Berry said the firm's more than 100 workers would remain on the job while the contract was being worked out.

"It's not a case of FEMA not trying," Berry said. "It's not being able to — whenever we were talking to the federal government, we were not getting what we needed." He did not detail those needs.

Berry said the body retrieval operation was gaining speed — but only after chaotic early days, when his teams were hamstrung by poor information on the location of bodies.

"There was a lot of duplication," he said. "We'd get one report from an agency of an address, and then we'd get another from another agency with a slightly different address, and they would be talking about the same body."

The search for corpses was in full swing Tuesday as Louisiana's death toll jumped from 279 to 423. Although authorities have scaled back predictions of thousands of deaths, high water still exists in some neighborhoods, and officials are preparing for hundreds more bodies.

"Let me caution everyone: We have not done the secondary searches in the areas where the water was the highest. So we still have a lot of work to do, and those numbers probably will go up," said Nagin, who once warned of 10,000 deaths.

The mystery of how 34 people drowned under floodwaters inside a St. Bernard Parish nursing home unfolded as authorities arrested a married couple and charged them with negligent homicide.

Mable B. Mangano, 62, and Salvador A. Mangano Sr., 65, were each charged with 34 counts. Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison. The Manganos were booked into East Baton Rouge Parish prison, then released on their own recognizance.

"Thirty-four people drowned in a nursing home that should have been evacuated," said Foti, the state attorney general, his voice rising.

He alleged that as the hurricane approached, the Manganos turned down a parish offer of two buses to evacuate the residents. The couple also failed to call an ambulance company, Foti said.

The Manganos' lawyer said his clients were faced with the prospect that the residents might die on an extended bus trip.

DOJ_NMG_0005292

"What people have to understand is, you're presented with a horrible choice," James Cobb said. "You take people who are on feeder tubes, who are on oxygen, who are on medications, and you put them on a bus to go 70 miles in 12 hours? People are going to die."

Foti said his office would also investigate the circumstances of multiple bodies found at other nursing homes, hospitals and care facilities, including Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans, where 45 bodies were found over the weekend. The hospital's officials said their patients were not abandoned to the flood but died of natural causes during a chaotic evacuation.

Bush Takes Responsibility For Slow Hurricane Response (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — President Bush today accepted responsibility for the weak federal response to the Hurricane Katrina disaster.

At a news conference with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, Bush acknowledged that the federal government has been blamed for a slow and inadequate response to the killer hurricane that hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29.

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government. And to the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility," the president said.

It was the strongest statement of responsibility from the White House since the hurricane crisis began and initial relief efforts were sharply criticized by officials in hard-hit New Orleans and Louisiana. Michael Brown stepped down as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The public's dissatisfaction with the federal storm response dragged Bush's job approval rating to the lowest level of his presidency at 42%, a Washington Post/ABC News poll reported. Some 57% disapproved of Bush's performance in office, a double-digit increase since January, the survey found.

Today, Bush was asked whether the federal response to Katrina should worry Americans that their government isn't prepared to respond to another disaster or a terrorist attack.

"That's a very important question, and it's in our national interest that we find out exactly what went on so that we can better respond," Bush said.

As he has before, Bush said he wanted to know what went wrong and what went right. "I'm not going to defend the process going in," Bush said. "I am going to defend the people saving lives."

He again praised relief workers at all levels. "I want people in America to understand how hard people worked to save lives down there," he said.

Bush will address the nation from Louisiana on Thursday evening, the White House announced today. It will be the fourth presidential trip to the hurricane-damaged Gulf Coast.

Bush spoke after R. David Paulison, the new acting director of the FEMA, pledged to increase efforts to house the tens of thousands of evacuees who fled the storm.

"We're going to get people out of the shelters. We're going to move on and get them the help they need," Paulison told reporters in his first public comments since he was appointed.

Hundreds of thousands of people have fled to shelters in states across the country. Texas has about 250,000 in shelters and private housing.

Katrina's Death Toll Rises To 659 (USAT)

By From staff and wire reports

USA Today, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Ships began moving through the Port of New Orleans, the airport resumed passenger flights, and officials made plans to reopen the French Quarter as the still-draining city began lifting itself out of the muck Tuesday.

At the same time, the human cost of Hurricane Katrina continued to climb. The official death toll from the storm and ensuing floods rose to 659, including 423 in Louisiana.

In Washington, President Bush shouldered blame for mistakes in the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, which delivered one of the nation's worst natural disasters to the Gulf Coast 2½ weeks ago.

“Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government,” Bush said. “To the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility.”

The new head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, David Paulison, said the agency is going to be focusing on the victims of this hurricane.

“We're going to get those people out of shelters, and we're going to … get them the help that they need," Paulison said.

DOJ_NMG_0005293

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco complained of “absolute frustration” with delays by FEMA that she said had slowed the process of recovering bodies, some of which were left uncollected and in public view for more than a week. Later in the day, however, Blanco said she had been “reassured” of federal efforts to collect bodies quickly.

In the latest sign of progress, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said key areas could be opened from dawn to dusk as soon as Monday. That includes the French Quarter and the Uptown section of homes and businesses.

“We're out of nuclear-crisis mode and into normal, day-to-day crisis mode,” Nagin said.

The Army Corps of Engineers estimated that half of the flooded area or less was still under water, and at the rate of 8 billion to 9 billion gallons a day, the city was on target to be almost completely drained by Oct. 8.

Meanwhile, the first passenger flight since Aug. 28 arrived at Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport, a Northwest Airlines flight from Memphis. Other flights were resuming on a limited basis.

“Welcome home,” airport director Roy Williams said as he greeted the passengers. “We're glad to see you.”

The city's port on the Mississippi River sent out its first shipment since the hurricane: a barge of auto parts bound for Alabama. The first ship to arrive held coffee and wood from Argentina, Brazil and Mexico.

“Two weeks ago, the prognosis was six months," said Gary LaGrange, port president. “This shows the people of New Orleans their city is back in business.”

During a tour of devastated portions of Mississippi, Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta said Hurricane Katrina was the worst disaster for transportation in U.S. history — knocking out ports, highways and rivers. He estimated the damage to highways and bridges in Mississippi and Louisiana at $3 billion.

“Add that all up, and it's a larger magnitude than anything we've ever experienced,” Mineta said.

Bush Takes Responsibility For Failures Of Response (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

President Bush yesterday said he takes personal responsibility for the federal government's stumbling response to Hurricane Katrina, as his White House worked on several fronts to move beyond the improvisation of the first days of the crisis and set a long-term course on a problem that aides now believe will shadow the balance of Bush's second term.

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government," Bush said at a White House news conference with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani. "And to the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility. I want to know what went right and what went wrong."

The first major public event in the White House effort to take control of the post-Katrina political and policy agenda will occur tomorrow night in a prime-time speech to the nation. The president will deliver it from the flood region on his fourth trip there since the hurricane struck.

Bush already has dispatched his top strategist, Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, and other aides to assemble ideas from agencies, conservative think tanks, GOP lawmakers and state officials to guide the rebuilding of New Orleans and relocation of flood victims. The idea, aides said, is twofold: provide a quick federal response that comports with Bush's governing philosophy, and prevent Katrina from swamping his second-term ambitions on Social Security, taxes and Middle East democracy-building.

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), a Bush ally, said the recovery effort provides conservatives with an unusual opportunity to test ideas that have been hard to sell on a national scope, including vouchers to cover education for dislocated students and tax incentives for business investment. "There are a whole host of ideas being looked at," Kyl said.

In what may become the next major post-Katrina policy, the White House was working yesterday to suspend wage supports for service workers in the hurricane zone as it did for construction workers on federal contracts last week, administration and congressional officials said. This possible move, described by administration officials as being under debate, already provoked preemptive Democratic protests.

At tomorrow's speech, the president is to outline his vision more comprehensively than he has to date. A top aide said he will stress that New Orleans officials will dictate how the city will be rebuilt, but will also make plain the reconstruction should reflect his vision of government -- including reducing regulatory obstacles and emphasizing entrepreneurship over big government, the aide said. He will discuss plans to provide health care, education, jobs and housing assistance to flood victims, another aide said.

With some Republicans frustrated that the federal government essentially cut a $62 billion blank check for phase one of the recovery effort, the Bush administration and congressional GOP leaders are working on proposals to encourage business investment in the devastated areas and to test conservative ideas such as portable benefits for evacuees who want to reestablish in new locales, low-tax business zones and waived environmental regulations.

GOP officials involved in the effort said more than $200 billion could be spent on Katrina-related projects, most of it over the next two years. They project that hurricane-related spending will trail off in the final two years of the Bush presidency, allowing him to say he met his stated goal of cutting the deficit in half by 2009. "You're a fiscal conservative until you get hit with a natural disaster," said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

Behind the scenes, the president's inner circle is working with more than a dozen new task forces, run through the domestic policy counsel, to solicit ideas from federal agencies and outside groups such as the Heritage Foundation and American Enterprise Institute. Several aides said agency officials are under pressure to provide estimates of what money their agencies need, as well as ideas for solving the myriad problems the relief effort presents. Advisers have studied housing issues, for instance, trying to determine the best way to build temporary accommodations for relief workers and construction workers and avoid unintentionally encouraging people to never return.

Office of Management and Budget Director Joshua B. Bolten is overseeing the largest-ever federal expenditure on a natural disaster, but officials said he is relying on a beefed-up inspector general's office at the Department of Homeland Security to monitor how the money is spent. At a private House Republican leadership meeting yesterday, several lawmakers expressed concern about a repeat of the waste and fraud that many believe took place with the budget for rebuilding Iraq, according to a participant.

Republicans are lining up behind plans to use vouchers to help displaced students find new schools, including private ones, and a mix of vouchers and tax breaks to help flood victims pay for health care expenses, from insurance to immunization. A draft Senate GOP plan for post-Katrina policy includes both ideas, according to Republicans who have read the document.

Grover Norquist, a Rove ally who runs Americans for Tax Reform, is among those lobbying the White House to suspend wage supports for service workers in the hurricane zone.

Last week, Bush issued an executive order lifting the Davis-Bacon rules mandating that construction workers on federal contracts be paid the average wage in a region. The White House argued the regulations were slowing reconstruction and raising federal costs.

Now Labor Department and White House officials are examining a similar move for service workers covered by the McNamara-O'Hara Service Contract Act, which extended prevailing wage rules to service workers. Administration officials are concerned that workers on demolition and debris-removal jobs could protest that even with construction wage supports lifted, they should be paid prevailing wages because their work is more service-related than construction-related.

Any move to lift service wage supports would elicit protests by labor unions and their Democratic allies. The Depression-era Davis-Bacon Act includes a provision allowing its suspension for natural disasters. The Service Contract Act does not, and its suspension may be unprecedented, labor experts say.

Admission Signals A New Strategy (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush regularly passes up invitations to indulge in self-evaluation, happy to leave historians to assess his performance. But having majored in history at Yale (class of '68), he also knows that some impressions do not require the passage of time before crystallizing.

On Tuesday, Bush decided it was time to talk about his role in the federal response to Hurricane Katrina.

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government, and to the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility," Bush said during a brief news conference.

The president's comments signaled a new White House strategy as Bush and his top aides continued to work to stem the political damage to his leadership after Hurricane Katrina.

As a part of that effort, the president has scheduled a prime-time address to the nation Thursday from New Orleans.

Bush's statement contrasted with recent White House comments. For days, he and top aides have denigrated most questions about accountability for the hurricane response as part of a partisan "blame game."

By moving toward shouldering some of the blame, Bush appeared to be trying to shift the debate away from finger-pointing to focus on the reconstruction of New Orleans, a Herculean task that, if it goes smoothly, could help rehabilitate his image.

Throughout his nearly five years in office, Bush and his advisors have showed a determination to never admit a mistake for fear that he would appear weak. That determination held even amid the intense criticism that the administration had severely miscalculated in its assertions that Iraq was developing weapons of mass destruction.

Bush drew a blank when asked at an April 13, 2004, news conference to name his biggest mistake as president.

"You know, I just — I'm sure something will pop into my head here in the midst of this press conference, with all the pressure of trying to come up with an answer," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0005295

Eventually, he concluded: "I don't want to sound like I've made no mistakes. I'm confident I have. I just haven't — you just put me under the spot here, and maybe I'm not as quick on my feet as I should be in coming up with one."

On Tuesday, Bush did not hesitate when a reporter asked: "Given what happened with Katrina, shouldn't Americans be concerned that their government isn't prepared to respond to another disaster or even a terrorist attack?"

Bush said: "I want to know how to better cooperate with state and local government, to be able to answer that very question that you asked: 'Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm?' And that's a very important question. And it's in our national interest that we find out exactly what went on … so that we can better respond."

Bush's comments drew praise from some who had criticized the federal response.

"The president's comments today will do more to move the country forward from this tragedy than anything that has been said by any leader in the past two weeks," Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.) said. "Accountability at every level is critical, and leadership begins at the top."

Shaken By Katrina, Public Trust In Government Begins To Rebound (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON - Government at all levels - not just President Bush and the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) - has taken a beating in the public arena following hurricane Katrina. Dark predictions of a deepening loss of faith toward public institutions have followed.

Now, there are inklings that negative reviews of the government response to Katrina have bottomed out and may be on the upswing.

The latest Gallup survey, comparing people's initial responses to the government handling of the crisis with how they feel now, shows that a majority of Americans are feeling better about the role of government in dealing with the hurricane than they did initially. And despite the sense that the president has suffered grave damage to his public image over Katrina, Gallup and other polls show the effect has been minimal.

"Despite initial criticism of the federal government's slow response to Katrina, Bush's overall job approval rating remains essentially where it was at the end of August," notes David Moore, managing editor of the Gallup poll, in a Sept. 13 report.

Currently, Gallup shows Bush's approval rating at 46 percent, up from 45 percent at the end of August and 40 percent in mid-August. Of course, all polls show variations in result. Some show Bush's public approval has dipped below the 40 percent threshold.

Others, such as the Rasmussen Report, favored by conservatives, show Bush with a slight uptick at 47 percent approval. And some leading pollsters are not at all sure that the president has bottomed out.

Independent pollster John Zogby says the president's latest numbers show him with 11 percent support among Democrats, 23 percent among independents, and 77 percent among Republicans - a significant decline even among GOP voters, who gave him 91 percent support on Election Day last November. Turning a corner?

"I don't know yet whether he's turning a corner," says Mr. Zogby. "He's a pretty resilient fellow, so now I think he gets it. But I think a lot of damage has been done to people's view of government and that's not the greatest thing to have presided over."

In the final analysis of Bush's tenure, Zogby believes Iraq will still be the central factor. "I can see, sometime in 2008, the president cutting the ribbon on the all-new 21st century New Orleans, and that would be a big deal, and it could erase some of the bad of the last two weeks, but I think Iraq returns to center stage very quickly."

Ever since 9/11, Bush's strength in public opinion has been in overall leadership and in his handling of terrorism. Now, even if polling shows he still has a reliable core of Republican support, the president is also clearly working to reestablish himself in those two areas.

Bush has replaced the head of FEMA, Michael Brown, who was found to have inadequate prior experience in emergency management and whose performance pre- and post-Katrina damaged the federal government's credibility. The president is also expected to name a "reconstruction czar" to lead the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast region. Using the bully pulpit

On Thursday, Bush will make a major speech addressing hurricane Katrina and its aftermath, the White House has announced. Like no other official in American public life, the president has the bully pulpit - and the megaphone of the media that will publicize his words - to present himself to the people in a way that seeks to win back the confidence at least of his voters.

To get himself back to 50-plus approval ratings, "he needs help from events - events on the ground in New Orleans, in Iraq, in gasoline prices," says Whit Ayres, a GOP pollster.

All presidents have faced moments of intense criticism. Some have bounced back. Others, like President Carter and the first President Bush, never recover. But the model the current President Bush may consider is Ronald Reagan.

DOJ_NMG_0005296

"At the depths of the '82 recession, Reagan looked like a goner, but the economy came back and so did Reagan's fortunes," says Jack Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont-McKenna College in California. Reagan's secret? "He stayed the course. Had he faltered in his policies in '82, we might not have seen as much progress in '83 and '84."

Another historical lesson Bush may be heeding comes from Carter's "crisis of confidence" speech, commonly remembered for conveying a sense of malaise in the country. Republican analysts agree that Bush is correct in not admitting mistakes, such as the placing of Mr. Brown at the head of FEMA.

"The danger is that one admission would lead to calls for more admissions," says Professor Pitney, who was at one time active in Republican politics. "He can address an issue without falling into the trap of perpetual apology."

The easing out of Brown is the latest example. Bush did not fire Brown outright; Brown was first sent back to Washington, and replaced on the ground in the Gulf region, then tendered his resignation three days later. That approach allows Bush to maintain his image of loyalty to his appointees.

Perhaps one of the toughest image problems Bush faces going forward is in his dealings with the African-American community. Of all the polling out of Katrina, perhaps the most arresting is the perceptions of African-Americans: While white Americans don't believe race played a role in the initial delays in hurricane relief, a strong majority of blacks do believe that is the case.

President Says He's Responsible In Storm Lapses (NYT)

By By Elisabeth Bumiller And Richard W. Stevenson

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - President Bush said on Tuesday that he bore responsibility for any failures of the federal government in its response to Hurricane Katrina and suggested that he was unsure whether the country was adequately prepared for another catastrophic storm or terrorist attack.

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government, and to the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility," Mr. Bush said in an appearance in the East Room with President Jalal Talabani of Iraq. "I want to know what went right and what went wrong."

In response to a reporter who asked if Americans, in the wake of the hurricane, should be concerned about the government's ability to respond to another disaster or a terrorist attack, Mr. Bush said: "I want to know how to better cooperate with state and local government, to be able to answer that very question that you asked: Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm? And that's a very important question."

Throughout his nearly five years in office, Mr. Bush has resisted publicly acknowledging mistakes or shortcomings, and his willingness in this case to edge up to a buck-stops-here statement, however conditional, was evidence of how shaken his presidency has been by the political fallout from the government's handling of the storm.

It also set the stage for a White House effort to pivot from dealing with urgent rescue and relief efforts to setting out a vision of how the federal government could help rebuild devastated communities and re-establish Mr. Bush's image as a leader.

The White House said Mr. Bush would address the nation from Louisiana on Thursday night, during the president's fourth trip to the region since the hurricane and his first major speech on the disaster. On Friday, which he has designated a national day of prayer and remembrance, he is planning to speak at the Washington National Cathedral in the morning, and T. D. Jakes, a conservative African-American television evangelist, is scheduled to deliver the sermon with some evacuees from New Orleans in attendance.

Even as Mr. Bush traveled to New York on Tuesday afternoon to begin a round of meetings with world leaders gathering at the United Nations, White House officials were weighing policy proposals and working on drafts of the speech that Mr. Bush will give Thursday. Administration officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss proposals that have yet to be decided on, said Mr. Bush was likely to set out a broad commitment to rebuilding New Orleans and the Gulf Coast, with a particular focus on housing.

The storm has so commanded the attention of the White House and of Washington that Mr. Bush's remarks on the hurricane overshadowed his news conference with Mr. Talabani, which on a normal day would have been a major event about a conflict that has come to define his presidency. In the news conference, Mr. Bush warned Syria that it would become "more and more isolated" if it did not stop the flow of foreign fighters into Iraq and reveal whether it has an intelligence presence or some other one in Lebanon.

As he prepares a blueprint to respond to the storm damage and to spend the billions of dollars that doing so will cost, Mr. Bush is confronting the likelihood that the rest of his agenda will have to be put on hold until next year.

A Republican ally of Mr. Bush who has been briefed on the administration's thinking said the White House's hope for the rest of this year was to deal with the hurricane and to win confirmation for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the United States and for a second nominee, not yet selected, to the Supreme Court seat being vacated by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Next year, the ally said, Mr. Bush would return to issues like overhauling the tax code and the immigration laws that he had hoped to get a start on this year.

After the outcry over scenes of poor, black victims of the hurricane suffering and dying in New Orleans, White House officials continued on Tuesday to try to shore up support among the president's conservative African-American supporters, who have not all rallied to his side. Bishop Charles E. Blake of the West Angeles Church of God in Christ in Los Angeles, a major African-American supporter of Mr. Bush, said this week that he had declined an invitation to meet on Sept. 6 at the White House with Mr. Bush, black leaders and charitable organizations because he was too busy.

"It's a four-hour flight, it's a $2,000 ticket, I do have heavy responsibilities here," Bishop Blake said in a telephone interview.

Asked if the government's response to the hurricane had changed the way he felt about Mr. Bush, Bishop Blake responded: "I cannot say at this time. I'm holding the issue open until I can understand the dynamics involved and the delays that have been experienced."

In saying he took responsibility for any failures of the federal response to the storm, Mr. Bush stopped short of acknowledging that he or anyone else had made mistakes. The president has in the past resisted efforts to draw him out about errors in judgment and regrets.

At a news conference in April 2004, he was asked what his biggest mistake had been, and he responded that he was sure he had made some but that he was unable, on the spot, to say what they were. Asked again about mistakes during one of his debates last year with Senator John Kerry, Mr. Bush admitted to having made some bad personnel choices.

In his remarks in the East Room on Tuesday, Mr. Bush distinguished between criticizing the way the government responded to the hurricane and the way individuals responded.

The president said that having been down to the Gulf Coast three times, "I'm not going to defend the process going in, but I am going to defend the people who are on the front line of saving lives."

"Those Coast Guard kids pulling people out of the floods did heroic work," he said. "The first responders on the ground, whether they be state folks or local folks, did everything they could."

Bush Takes Responsibility (KCS)

By Seth Borenstein, Brandon Bailey And Scott Dodd

The Kansas City Star, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON - President Bush accepted responsibility Tuesday for the federal government's failures in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

After more than a week of White House refusals to play "the blame game," Bush acknowledged that mistakes were made, and that the government's halting, disorganized response raised questions about the country's ability to cope with a terrorist attack.

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government," Bush said in a midday White House news conference. "To the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility."

Homeland security officials pledged a house cleaning of political appointees in top jobs who have little experience in disaster management, and more fingers were pointed in New Orleans over the snail's pace of retrieving bodies that litter the flood-ravaged city.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco said she signed a contract Tuesday with the Houston recovery company that had originally been hired by the federal government, after the firm threatened to pull out because it hadn't yet signed a formal deal with the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"I cannot stand by while this vital operation is not being handled appropriately," Blanco said, calling it "a matter that involves life, death and dignity."

Meanwhile, the hard work of finding a place for hundreds of thousands of now-homeless evacuees across the Gulf States to live promised to provide another serious challenge to the government's capabilities. The American Red Cross said thousands of people could be living in shelters for months.

Facing the lowest approval ratings of his presidency, Bush planned a prime-time speech from Louisiana Thursday night to try to restore the nation's confidence in his administration's ability to manage the relief effort.

"I want to know what went right and what went wrong," Bush said at a joint appearance with the Iraqi president in Washington, "to answer that very question that you asked: Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm."

DOJ_NMG_0005298

The acceptance of responsibility came a day after Bush deflected criticism of the government's efforts while touring New Orleans. The president rebutted charges that FEMA was slow to respond because many of Katrina's victims were poor and black, or that military capabilities were stretched too thin by the fighting in Iraq.

As part of the administration's effort to rebound from the growing criticism, changes at FEMA won't stop with Monday's resignation of beleaguered director Michael Brown.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Tuesday that he's going to put more emphasis on disaster and management experience in the agency, and will be bringing in a new deputy with more appropriate expertise.

Chertoff said new acting FEMA chief R. David Paulison's experience as head of the U.S. Fire Administration and former Miami-Dade fire chief was key to his appointment. Brown had no disaster experience before coming to FEMA in 2001.

Brown's chief-of-staff Patrick Rhode, a former TV anchor and Bush campaign official who also lacked disaster experience, had been acting as FEMA's deputy director. He raised eyebrows by defending FEMA's response to Katrina as "probably one of the most efficient … in the country's history."

When asked about whether FEMA will hire senior staff with disaster qualifications, Chertoff volunteered that he is looking for a permanent deputy director, adding: "We want to make sure we have a very talented and experienced team that is running this very, very important agency." Chertoff's spokesman later emphasized that the secretary did not mention Rhode by name, but Rhode is the only acting deputy director of FEMA.

In his first public statements, Paulison said his focus as FEMA's new chief will be on the hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast evacuees living in shelters, tents or their cars after the storm. He pledged to "get these people out of the shelters into some type of either semi-permanent or permanent housing.''

Anita Gaddis of Gulfport and her teen-age daughter have been living at an emergency shelter in an elementary school since Katrina blew ashore. They smashed a window to escape their flooding apartment and waded more than a mile through waist-high water.

"They're helping us as best they can here, but I get more worried every day about when they're going to put us out," Gaddis said, fighting back tears. "I don't have any place to go."

The American Red Cross said nearly 7,000 people are still housed at shelters in Mississippi, with 75,000 around the country. Most emergency shelters were never meant to serve as homes from more than a night or two.

"The scale of this is just massive," said Red Cross spokesman Kevin Titus. "We expect we'll be sheltering people for several months."

State and federal officials say they are scouring the Southeast for up to 300,000 trailers and mobile homes to serve as free or subsidized housing for as long as two years.

The government is also looking for spots to establish miniature "communities" of several thousand mobile homes, but locations with enough space and the needed utilities are hard to come by.

"You've got to have a place to put 'em," Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour said.

The looming demand has already prompted scattered complaints from local residents about companies buying out contracts and RV parks and trying to evict current tenants. The suspicion is that some property owners are hoping to collect higher rents from FEMA.

Officials in Harrison County, which includes Gulfport, Biloxi and other hard-hit communities, publicly warned landlords Tuesday that they cannot evict tenants without just cause and a court order.

The highway, which serves as the main route along the beach in south Mississippi, has been ripped apart and buried by sand along much of its length, and several major bridges were stripped down to pylons by Katrina's surging waves.

"We don't want transportation to be the choke point of the redevelopment of economic activity," Mineta said, adding that federal money will be made available to restore the region's highways. "That's very important to get the economy revitalized."

Cost Of Katrina To Hit Budget Hard (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2005

Think of it as the financial equivalent of another Iraq war.

Relief efforts for the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast throw a huge fiscal burden onto a US Treasury that is already deep in the red.

DOJ_NMG_0005299

Spending tied to hurricane Katrina has hit as much as $2 billion per day, or about 10 times the amount the United States is spending on military operations in Iraq. The pace will slow, but the recovery effort could easily cost the federal government $150 billion, experts say. Spread over a couple of years, that would roughly match the $6 billion a month being spent in Iraq.

As staggering as these numbers are, the question is not whether America can absorb this shock but whether it will alter the mind-sets of policymakers and financiers on other budget matters.

Already, for example, some US law- makers cite the storm as a reason to reconsider plans to cut entitlement programs, which would shrink government assistance to the poor by $35 billion over five years. At the least, the looming tab for everything from road repairs to business loans is a reminder that America's current budgetary path is not sustainable.

"It just compounds the problems we're already in," says Linda Bilmes, a Harvard University economist. "Any money that we spend on Katrina is more money that we have to borrow and pay interest on. There's less money ... for doing all the other things we want to do."

The magnitude of Katrina's devastation and the government's slow initial response argue in favor of generous spending to help the Gulf region recover. The danger is if investors who finance America's debts begin to worry about a profligate Congress.

"If foreigners took this as a leading indicator that we were going to become irresponsible in the budget in a great variety of ways ... you could have a negative psychological effect," says Rudolph Penner, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office.

Interest rates could tick upward if demand for US Treasury bonds ebbs. That danger is, for now, hypothetical. Readiness of investors to buy US debt is one reason long-term interest rates remain low today.

But the storm-surge of spending does weaken Washington's balance sheet. Even as spending rises, tax revenues from Gulf workers and businesses will fall. The fiscal 2006 budget deficit could shoot from $314 billion to $400 billion or more.

"It really depends crucially on how many people you want to compensate," says Mr. Penner, now with the Urban Institute in Washington. "If you include farmers in Iowa [whose grain shipments have been disrupted], then it could expand mightily."

The tally could include costs such as:

· Strengthening New Orleans' defenses against future floods.

· Promoting the return of businesses to the almost-vacant city. Making the Big Easy a big tax-free zone is one idea on the table.

· Providing aid to evacuees, which could include costs for education, healthcare, and unemployment insurance that would be paid by states under normal circumstances. States could also be reimbursed for providing temporary shelter.

· Covering rebuilding and cleanup costs. These could range from highway and bridge repair to removal of environmental hazards.

· Giving financial assistance to homeowners who lacked flood insurance. Of perhaps 150,000 flooded homes in New Orleans, about 40 percent don't have coverage. The level of such aid could become a source of controversy, with critics arguing that it's a bailout that simply encourages future irresponsibility.

· Compensating storm-affected industries such as farming.

With these and other provisions under consideration, this relief effort promises to set a record for disaster spending. Congress has already approved $62.3 billion in emergency spending on the storm.

"While some people are talking about $200 billion, a number like $100 [billion] to perhaps $150 billion might be a better guess as to what's really needed," says Richard Kogan, an economist at the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities.

Recovery costs will represent only about 1 percent of America's $12 trillion annual economic output. By that standard, and because these are one-time costs, the impact on the budget is manageable, economists say.

Still, because every dollar of new spending expands the federal deficit, Katrina will add $5 billion or more in annual interest costs long after relief efforts are complete.

A potentially positive outcome, Mr. Kogan says, would be "if Katrina encourages people to think more about the long term" budget outlook.

Current trends, with entitlement costs poised to rise and with proposed tax cuts outstripping spending cuts, are not sustainable, many economists say.

Now, given the temporary post-storm political climate, President Bush's tax-reduction agenda may be in jeopardy. GOP leaders plan to delay a vote on extending tax breaks on dividends and capital gains, The Wall Street Journal reported Tuesday.

Meanwhile, some lawmakers question a pre-Katrina budget plan to scale back entitlements for the poor. "It makes no sense to consider such a bill at a time when the massive needs of those affected by hurricane Katrina are still being assessed," Sen. Harry Reid (D) of Nevada and Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D) of California wrote last week to Republican leaders in Congress.

Katrina Puts Spotlight On Mr. Cochran (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Bigger names in Mississippi politics have long obscured Thad Cochran's steady rise in Congress. But in Hurricane Katrina's wake, no lawmaker is more important to the Gulf Coast, or a more calming force amid the chaos engendered by the storm.

As chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Mr. Cochran has been instrumental in securing $62 billion for the disaster recovery. A greater test will come in the months ahead as questions mount about paying for and managing the federal reconstruction effort.

"An enormous amount of money is going to be made available to rebuild," says Mr. Cochran, a veteran of more than three decades on Capitol Hill. "It's a challenge, but an opportunity for improvements that could have lasting consequences."

Mr. Cochran must protect the credibility of the process by controlling his committee's appetite -- and his own -- for pork-barrel spending. Katrina's costs will complicate his task of completing the regular spending bills for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1. The Senate has borrowed heavily from defense funds to fill gaps in the president's domestic budget, and as chairman, Mr. Cochran is vulnerable to conservative criticism for being a big spender.

Mr. Cochran also must navigate between independent-minded governors in the Gulf -- including Mississippi's Haley Barbour -- and colleagues demanding a voice for Washington with the federal dollars. Prominent Democrats want a domestic Marshall Plan or new Gulf Coast development corporation to oversee the effort. In Mr. Cochran's committee, Republicans are urging President Bush to name a disaster czar from outside the government or to replicate the strong-man command under Herbert Hoover of the federal response to the Mississippi River floods in the 1920s.

Mr. Cochran, who has just begun what could be a six-year run as Appropriations chairman, holds immense leverage. Few senators enjoy the reservoir of personal support he has on both sides of the aisle. The role he has assumed is in some ways a modern Mississippi tradition; in recent decades, the late Jamie Whitten and John Stennis, both Democrats, were chairmen of the full House and Senate appropriations panels when their party held the majority.

But Mr. Cochran also will be challenged to shed his unassuming style and deference to the executive branch to make his voice heard.

"The country would be well served if Thad Cochran would take a high-profile role," says former Nebraska Sen. Bob Kerrey. "He could make clear it isn't going to be business as usual. He's up to a national role, and I'd love to see him have a legacy beyond just being chairman."

The white-haired Mr. Cochran, 67 years old, resembles a small-town attorney of Southern novels, more given to observing than interceding, but a moderating influence when he acts. Deeply conservative in manners, he's a gifted story-teller steeped in the land and literature of his region. From William Faulkner's "The Hamlet," he says, he learned "the importance of justice and the inadequacies of people to deal fairly with one another and the challenges that that presents."

His mother taught public-school math; his father was the principal; a younger brother played minor-league baseball. At the University of Mississippi, Mr. Cochran fell in love with the study of law amid the turmoil of desegregation on the campus in the 1960s and the obstructionist tactics of state officials. "I felt embarrassed by it all. ... It made me focus more on doing well in law school," he recalls of the period.

His style is to avoid confrontation and hear out complaints, while taking notes. "Somebody told me I was an eloquent listener," he says.

"He will not be pushed into a decision, he doesn't make snappy decisions," says his friend Grady Jolly, now a federal judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. "He is a very much of a gentleman, but he has a backbone of blue steel."

Elected to the House in 1972, Mr. Cochran moved to the Senate six years later, the first Republican from Mississippi to win that post since Reconstruction. Charles Pickering, whose judicial nomination provoked a controversy in the last Congress, was his Republican primary opponent, backed by a young Mr. Barbour. In the general election, his victory owed much to the fact that an independent African-American candidate split the black vote.

But he reached across racial lines, and has had clear sailing ever since. In 1984, former Democratic Gov. William Winter tried to challenge him and drew just 39% of the vote. "I would not make that mistake again," Mr. Winter laughs now. That strength at home helped Mr. Cochran advance in Congress, even while his Republican colleague Trent Lott eclipsed him nationally by becoming Senate majority leader before losing that post more than two years ago.

On the Senate floor last week, Mr. Lott addressed his colleague as the "senior senator" from Mississippi. "I am quite pleased the chairman of the appropriations committee hails from my state," he said. In an interview later, Mr. Lott likened their relationship to that of siblings who "as they get older, they grow sometimes closer and they just mature."

Mr. Lott lost his 154-year-old house in Pascagoula; Mr. Cochran was luckier, but says he felt lost going home to see the damage. "Some of those towns are just not there anymore," he says. "You lose your frame of reference. ... You can't believe what you're seeing, but it's real."

Katrina Lays Bare Medicaid Dispute (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck and David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON -- In the two weeks since Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast, the federal-state health program for the poor has emerged as the main way to provide medical coverage for many evacuees. But as the relief effort continues and costs mount, federal and state officials are in a tug of war over how much the federal government will reimburse states for their Medicaid spending and whether benefits should be extended to those not ordinarily eligible for the program.

Eligibility rules vary widely among states, and so do benefits. So far, state officials say the uncertainty surrounding Medicaid reimbursement hasn't prevented patients from getting needed care. But they add that the program's complex rules are causing confusion for both health-care providers and hurricane survivors about how medical needs will be met in coming months.

Several solutions are under discussion at the federal level. The federal Medicaid agency is working on ways to simplify enrollment and other issues without legislation. The Senate Finance Committee is writing a bipartisan bill to increase funding for states. House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (R., Texas) said he would have a package in coming weeks to shield states from harm "for a reasonable period of time."

"To me, each day that passes without us knowing ... exactly what the Medicaid relief package is going to include is adversely affecting not only our state ... but other states who are getting our evacuees," said J. Ruth Kennedy, deputy director of Louisiana's Medicaid program, which provided health care to one-quarter of the state's population before the hurricane.

The Bush administration has signaled that it wants to help states taking on Katrina evacuees, both financially and by easing red tape. In Congress, some relief for states seems certain. "I think it is likely that the federal government is going to have to step up more," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.).

The most contentious issue is a proposed expansion of Medicaid for Katrina survivors. Democrats have proposed that all displaced families from the storm be made eligible for the next six months, simply to ensure coverage. Even conservative lawmakers from the affected states are sympathetic. Asked if a family earning $30,000 to $40,000 in Biloxi, for example, might be allowed to qualify, Sen. Trent Lott (R., Miss.) answered bluntly: "If you're living in Biloxi, you've lost your house, you've lost your home, you've lost everything."

But the White House appears cool to any expansion, and Mr. Frist said he was "not convinced" it was needed.

"You're torn between 'Take care of the people that need taking care of, period' and doing it in a way that doesn't break the bank," Rep. Barton said.

Meanwhile, federal Medicaid officials said they still are working out details of an expedited program for states to get federal permission to simplify enrollment and make other changes in Medicaid. Instead of expanding Medicaid eligibility, they may try to use existing uncompensated-care programs to repay hospitals and other providers.

"We are going to get this resolved as quickly as we can, and we want to do it in the most effective way possible," said Mark McClellan, head of the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. Democrats, such as Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D., Ark.), say the current state-by-state approach would increase, not alleviate, red tape. "That tug of war will continue," she said.

CMS also is in talks with Texas, which is housing the largest number of Katrina evacuees, on a state proposal to simplify the enrollment process and make other changes. Jennifer Harris, a spokeswoman for the Texas agency in charge of Medicaid, said there has been "good progress," but as of yesterday, nothing was finalized. Louisiana Medicaid recipients there are getting coverage, but only if providers also are enrolled in Louisiana's program. Bills are being sent to Louisiana, which is unlikely to be able to afford the costs.

In Louisiana, even very-low-income people don't always qualify for Medicaid. A family of three, for example, can't make more than $174 a month, about 14% of the poverty level. After the hurricane, "we know these people have needs," said Ms. Kennedy, the deputy director of Louisiana's Medicaid program. Since Katrina hit, her agency has denied or screened out 752 Medicaid applicants.

Congress Finesses The Storm (NYT)

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

President Bush's vow to speed welfare assistance to the victims of Hurricane Katrina overlooks the gruesome determination of many Republican Congressional leaders to make $13 billion in cuts to Medicaid and food stamps. They quietly plan this even as they throw short-term emergency money at the crisis.

Sustaining their health and income is vital to the storm's impoverished survivors now and well into the future. But the most basic cuts in antipoverty programs are planned for enactment later this month by the same Republican majorities that approved the president's upper-bracket tax cuts and created deficits for a generation to come.

Congress's budget hawks are clearly hoping that the cacophony of sympathetic speechifying about the storm victims will distract the public from these cuts and from the fact that they will land heavily on the three states most devastated by the hurricane, where roughly one out of three children were already dependent on Medicaid.

Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi, the former Republican national chairman, personifies his party leaders' contradiction in begging for emergency aid now after having championed painful cuts in the social safety net. Earlier this year, Mr. Barbour was in the spotlight as his state's unapologetic Medicaid antagonist. Rejecting the alternative of a tax increase, he severely cut drug benefits and sought to drop 65,000 poor, elderly and disabled people from the program before the courts intervened.

Mr. Barbour remains one of Washington's most powerful emeritus lobbyists. He can spare his president and party a shameful episode by urging that the pending cuts for some of the storm's neediest be deep-sixed.

Hill Wants Details From Bush (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, September 14, 2005

As Congress and the Bush administration work aggressively to tackle the recovery from Hurricane Katrina, House Republicans are giving the White House mixed reviews on its communication effort with the Hill, on both the political and the policy fronts.

Several Congressional sources said that the flow of information from the administration has improved since the first week of the Katrina crisis. But with legislative proposals moving quickly through the system and a steady drumbeat of negative media coverage weakening the GOP's standing with the public, House Republicans are pushing for the White House to provide more substantive policy details as well as a more cohesive message.

"I think the administration severely flubbed the first three or four days of this," said a senior House Republican leadership aide. "From that point on, I think they've been very good."

At the request of the leadership, the administration has instituted regular conference calls with House and Senate leadership aides and key committee personnel to discuss developments and message strategy related to Katrina. The White House has also been more forthcoming of late with details about how it plans to spend the billions of dollars Congress has appropriated so far, Hill aides say.

As a result, the frustrations felt by many Republican Members and aides in the initial days of the crisis have somewhat subsided .

"Whenever we coordinate with the White House, it's a better way for all of us to stay on message so we know what the left and right hand are doing, and we appreciate them reaching out to us," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Yet some Republicans still complain privately about what they consider to be a glaring contrast between the two big stories right now on Capitol Hill: Katrina and the Supreme Court confirmation hearings of John Roberts. While the White House has set up a formal communications "war room" to serve as a clearinghouse for the Roberts nomination, as it did with other crucial efforts during the Bush presidency, the White House has not done so with Katrina.

"They do a fantastic job on coordinating on Judge Roberts and other issues," said a Republican Congressional aide. "One would think it would be to their benefit to have an effort like that" on Katrina.

But White House spokesman Trent Duffy dismissed the idea that establishing a Katrina war room would help matters.

"We're all in this together," Duffy said. "War rooms are designed to fight partisan battles. We're not fighting a partisan battle on this."

As recent poll numbers have shown Bush dropping in the public's esteem, House and Senate Republicans have looked anxiously for opportunities to turn the tide and make the case that they are taking swift action to deal with Katrina.

"Obviously we as Republicans have to deal with the reality that there is a perception out there that this Republican administration dropped the ball," said a senior House GOP leadership aide. But the White House has "a different set of communications challenges. We don't control FEMA. We don't control federal agencies. We have to get out there and show that we are leading and we have to communicate that."

When Katrina first hit, many Members found it difficult to demonstrate that kind of leadership because they lacked the necessary facts at their fingertips. Republicans lawmakers spoke openly of their frustrations with the pace of the response and their dealings with the federal bureaucracy.

This week, the senior leadership aide said, “the communications flow from the agencies has been good. It wasn’t initially, but it’s gotten better. It had to.”

Overall, the White House has at times been unable to provide the level of detail Congress usually desires, particularly on appropriations bills. Hill aides said they recognized the fluidity of the situation and the difficulty of providing line-by-line accountings at this stage in the process.

At the same time, Members and staff are wary of providing the administration with a “blank check,” especially since Congress has already provided more than $60 billion and will likely appropriate tens or hundreds of billions more.

Many lawmakers were taken aback last week when the administration asked for a $51 billion supplemental just a few days after receiving the first $10 billion infusion. Republican leaders were told of the second request during a visit to the White House last Tuesday and felt blindsided, according to several leadership sources.

“There was very little communication on the [second] supplemental,” said another senior Republican leadership aide. “This number seemed to come out of thin air, and then there was a justification for it later.”

Frustrations among Members came to a head at last Wednesday’s Republican Conference meeting, as lawmakers peppered Office of Management and Budget Director Josh Bolten with questions. While most lawmakers gave Bolten credit just for showing up, some grew impatient with his inability to answer their specific queries about how all the money would be spent.

But Duffy pointed out that in addition to Bolten’s visit, House Members received a detailed briefing last week on the House floor from nearly every member of the Bush cabinet. In addition, legislative affairs staffers strive to maintain regular contact with lawmakers to keep them abreast of the Katrina situation.

“To the extent that this is the top Congressional and White House priority, we are working hand-in-glove with our friends in Congress,” Duffy said.

Bush Takes Responsibility For Blunders (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush for the first time took responsibility Tuesday for federal government mistakes in dealing with Hurricane Katrina and suggested the calamity raised broader questions about the government's ability to handle both natural disasters and terror attacks.

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government," Bush said at a joint White House news conference with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani.

"And to the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility. I want to know what went right and what went wrong," said Bush.

Facing sharp criticism and the lowest approval ratings of his presidency, Bush scheduled a speech to the nation from Louisiana for Thursday evening. It will be his fourth trip to the devastated Gulf Coast since the storm struck two weeks ago.

It was the closest Bush has come to publicly faulting any federal officials involved in the hurricane response, which has been widely criticized as disjointed and slow. Some federal officials have sought to blame state and local officials for being unprepared to cope with the disaster.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., welcomed Bush's conciliatory remarks. "Accountability at every level is critical, and leadership begins at the top," she said.

Other Democrats were less charitable.

"The season has come for Americans to look homeward ... instead of continuing to spend billions of dollars in Iraq," said Sen. Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va.

And Louisiana's Democratic governor, Kathleen Blanco, accused the Federal Emergency Management Agency of moving too slowly in recovering the bodies. The dead "deserve more respect than they have received," she said at state police headquarters in Baton Rouge.

Meanwhile, R. David Paulison, in his first full day on the job as acting FEMA director, told reporters in Washington the government would step up its efforts to find more permanent housing for the tens of thousands of Hurricane Katrina survivors now in shelters.

"We're going to get those people out of the shelters, and we're going to move and get them the help they need," Paulison said.

Bush selected him to replace Michael Brown, who resigned on Monday after being recalled as the top onsite disaster-relief coordinator. Brown, a Republican lawyer with little previous disaster-management experience, drew fierce criticism for his handling of the crisis.

Paulison, a career firefighter with 30 years of rescue experience, said he was busy "getting brought up to speed." Bush promised him in a Monday night phone call that he would have "the full support of the federal government," Paulison said.

The storm displaced a million people, destroyed large areas of cities and communities and heavily damaged roads, bridges, canals and oil and natural gas facilities.

Bush's acceptance of responsibility came in response to a reporter's question on whether the United States was capable of handling another terrorist attack, given its halting and widely criticized response to Katrina.

"That's a very important question," Bush said. "And it's in our national interest that we find out exactly what went on — so that we can better respond."

"I'm not going to defend the process going in, but I am going to defend the people who are on the front line of saving lives," he added. "I also want people in America to understand how hard people are working to save lives down there in not only New Orleans, but surrounding parishes and along the Gulf Coast."

Also on Tuesday:

_Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said teams of federal auditors would scrutinize billions of dollars worth of government contracts. "We're going to cut through red tape, but we're not going to cut through laws and rules that govern ethics," he said. Congress has appropriated more than $60 billion for reconstruction. The Democratic National Committee accused the administration on Tuesday of "giving no-bid contracts to Bush's political cronies."

_Farm-state Democrats said they would ask for emergency money for farmers pummeled by Katrina as well as those struggling under high energy prices, drought and other natural disasters. Energy costs alone will shave farm incomes for North Dakota farmers by one-third to one-half, said Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D.

_Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said some military aircraft and other equipment may be able to move out of the Gulf Coast soon. "We've got to the point where most if not all of the search and rescue is completed," said Rumsfeld, who is attending a NATO meeting in Berlin. He said nothing will be moved out of the area without the authorization of governors, the military leaders there and the president.

_A group of Democratic senators pressed Congress for a $5 billion upgrade of communications equipment that would make it easier for police, firefighters and other law enforcement authorities to talk to each other during emergencies. A similar measure was rejected in July as part of a homeland security bill. "They must be able to communicate with each other. This is a life and death issue," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich.

Bush Shoulders Blame In Response (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

President Bush yesterday took full responsibility for federal government failures in the response to Hurricane Katrina and acknowledged that the storm exposed deficiencies at all levels of government.

"To the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility," he said. "I want to know what went right and what went wrong."

Mr. Bush, who plans to hold a prime-time television address tomorrow from the hurricane-affected region, said the federal response to the catastrophic storm prompts serious questions about America's ability to respond not only to natural disasters, but also to terrorist attacks.

"Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm?" he said. "That's a very important question. And it's in our national interest that we find out exactly what went on ... so that we can better respond."

The White House said Mr. Bush would deliver the address to the nation from Louisiana on his fourth visit to the region in two weeks.

"The president will update the American people about the latest developments on the recovery, and discuss the way forward as we begin the process of helping people in the region rebuild their lives and their communities," spokesman Scott McClellan told The Washington Times.

In the 9 p.m. speech, Mr. Bush plans to lay out his administration's role in the recovery operation as well as the longer-term efforts to rebuild after the hurricane left New Orleans flooded and flattened other parts of Louisiana, as well as areas of Alabama and Mississippi, the spokesman said.

Mr. Bush, who days after the floods swept into New Orleans acknowledged that the federal response was "unacceptable," said yesterday that although he is unhappy with the initial federal efforts, he will not criticize first responders who worked to help residents in the path of the Category 4 hurricane.

"One thing for certain -- having been down there three times and having seen how hard people are working -- I'm not going to defend the process going in, but I am going to defend the people who are on the front line of saving lives," he said in a public appearance at the White House with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani.

Democrats continued to blame Mr. Bush for inadequate recovery efforts in the immediate aftermath of the hurricane, which left thousands of New Orleans' residents stranded and thousands more without food and water.

"This administration still hasn't figured out the difference between spin and leadership," said Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat.

"Instead of continuing to spend billions in Iraq, let us husband ... our hard-earned tax dollars and spend them here at home," Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, said in an address on the Senate floor.

Bush Takes Responsibility (REU)

Reuters, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - President George W. Bush took responsibility on Tuesday for any failures in the federal response to Hurricane Katrina and acknowledged the storm exposed serious deficiencies at all levels of government four years after the September 11 attacks.

"To the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility," Bush told a White House news conference at which he openly questioned U.S. preparedness for another storm or a "severe attack."

Bush's rare admission of "serious problems in our response capability" came as the White House stepped up efforts to repair his public standing. Bush will address the nation at 9 p.m. EDT (0100 GMT) on Thursday from hard-hit Louisiana, his fourth visit to the disaster zone since Katrina struck.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Bush would use Thursday's address to "talk to the American people about the recovery and the way forward on the longer-term rebuilding."

The president's approval ratings have hit new lows, partly due to fierce criticism of the slow response to the August 29 hurricane, which killed hundreds and displaced 1 million people in the worst natural disaster in U.S. history.

Fifty-four percent of Americans disapprove of Bush's handling of the response, but 57 percent say state and local officials should bear responsibility for the problems, according to the latest Washington Post-ABC poll.

Asked if Americans should worry that the government remains unprepared to respond to another major disaster or a terrorist attack, Bush said: "Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government."

Bush himself raised questions about preparedness, after four years of record spending on domestic security since September 11, 2001.

"Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm? That's a very important question and it's in our national interest that we find out exactly what went on so we can better respond," he said at a news conference with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani.

Republican senators with close ties to Bush have urged him to appoint a top official to lead the long-term recovery. White House officials say that is among options being discussed.

Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, former Secretary of State Colin Powell and retired Gen. Tommy Franks, former head of the U.S. Central Command have been mentioned for the job.

Giuliani said on CNBC that a commission like the one that investigated the September 11 attacks could assess the response. "Whether there were failures here on the state, city and federal level, I think a commission can decide that six months from now," he said. "No one person is responsible for this."

Bush Says Katrina Exposed `Serious Flaws' In U.S. Capabilities (BLOOM)

By Holly Rosenrantz And Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, September 14, 2005

Sept. 13 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush said Hurricane Katrina exposed ``serious problems" in the government's ability to handle another national emergency such as a severe storm or a terrorist attack.

The number of people trapped in their homes or ill-equipped shelters and the inadequacy of the immediate relief effort showed flaws ``at all levels of government," Bush said in response to a question during a news conference today with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani in Washington. ``To the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility."

His comments were his most critical yet of the government's response to Katrina. Until now, he has said the response has been unacceptable, and today is the first time he said he personally takes responsibility for the problems.

Bush is seeking to restore public confidence in his ability to handle a crisis following the government's slow initial reaction to the hurricane that ravaged the Gulf Coast two weeks ago. He is planning a national address on Sept. 15 about U.S. efforts to help the Gulf Coast recover, and he may appoint a high- profile ``czar'' to oversee that effort.

The hurricane raised the question of whether the U.S. is ``capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm,'' Bush said. ``It's in our national interests that we find out exactly what went on so that we can better respond.''

Investigations

Congressional Republicans have announced plans to conduct a joint House-Senate investigation into the federal response to Katrina. Some Democrats, such as New York Senator Hillary Clinton, have called for an independent panel to conduct the inquiry.

In response to widespread criticism, Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown resigned yesterday after being relieved of his role overseeing recovery operations in the region last week. Bush appointed U.S. Fire Administration Director R. David Paulison, a career emergency service official, as FEMA's acting director.

Earlier today, U.S. Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff, whose department includes FEMA, said Brown ``did everything within his capability'' to manage the crisis and praised Paulison's long experience.

Paulison, 57, started as a fireman in Miami 30 years ago and rose to become chief of the department before taking his current job, which is part of FEMA. At a news conference with Chertoff at FEMA headquarters in Washington, Paulison said his focus would be helping those affected by Katrina, not analyzing the government's initial response.

`Focus on Victims'

``I can't deal with what happened in the last two weeks, but I can tell you, from this point forward, we are going to be focusing on the victims of this hurricane,'' Paulison said. ``We're going to look at what happened in the past just like we did with hurricane Andrew,'' which devastated Miami in 1992.

Chertoff said local governments would take the lead in the recovery and rebuilding operation.

``We have elected officials,'' Chertoff said. ``We have to respect their responsibility. We have to respect their authority. And so we're going to work with them to figure out the best solution.''

Bush has labeled Hurricane Katrina as the worst natural disaster in U.S. history. The storm caused hundreds of deaths and an estimated $100 billion in damage across 90,000 square miles of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama when it hit on Aug. 29.

Bush's job-approval rating is at record lows in several polls in the wake of the storm. A Washington Post/ABC News poll taken Sept. 8-11 among 1,200 adults found 54 percent disapproved of the way Bush is handling the recovery from the hurricane. The poll found that Bush's overall job-approval rating was 42 percent, the lowest of his presidency, in that survey.

First Lady Becomes President's Defender (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

The AP, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — Laura Bush is reprising her role as her husband's first defender, making several trips to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast as President Bush's approval ratings sink to their lowest level yet.

Mrs. Bush is highlighting the positive that has come out of the storm, telling the stories of strangers helping one another in a time of tragedy.

Mrs. Bush said Tuesday that much more human good than bad has come from the disaster, despite what people see on TV. She said the evacuees she has met in her three trips to the Gulf Coast are hopeful and thankful that they don't have to start from rock bottom because of the donations and the kindness of strangers.

"That's what I've seen at each of the shelters I've visited," she said. "I've never heard a single word of complaint."

Mrs. Bush has performed this job before. With approval ratings much higher than her husband's, she was sent out across the country to help him win re-election. She also made a goodwill trip this year to the Middle East, where her husband is especially unpopular.

This time Mrs. Bush is focusing on stories of human compassion while the president is under a barrage of criticism about the government's slow response to the disaster. Some have suggested that he would have acted faster if so many of the victims weren't mostly poor and black, remarks that Mrs. Bush condemned as "disgusting."

She also blamed the media for focusing on the negative in the recovery efforts.

"We've seen terrible, terrible things and we've seen unbelievably unselfish acts of giving as well by communities all across the United States and, of course, many more unselfish acts of giving than bad things," she said in a speech Tuesday to the conservative Heritage Foundation. "Maybe the media hasn't shown us that much, but we've read about it and we do know about it."

DOJ_NMG_0005307

Mrs. Bush has traveled to the hurricane region with her husband and in solo trips where she has visited with evacuees. On the same day that her husband was in Mobile, Ala., offering his notorious compliments of now-resigned FEMA Director Mike Brown, Mrs. Bush was serving food to the sick, the elderly and families who fled with young children to the Cajundome arena in Lafayette, La.

"Some things are working very, very well in Louisiana, and certainly this center is one of them," she said.

Three days later, Mrs. Bush stayed mostly behind the scenes when she visited the storm zone at her husband's side. At the Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge, La., she worked the room of storm evacuees on her own — chatting with women and children who were being sheltered in a huge room at the nondenominational church.

Later that day in Poplarville, Miss., the Bushes visited a meeting of state and local officials from throughout the hurricane region. The officials sat subdued while the president talked about how the region will recover, but they leapt to their feet in a huge standing ovation when he pointed out his wife at the side of the room.

"I'm traveling with good company," he said.

The king speaks

One day after visiting the Vatican and being assured by Pope Benedict XVI of the Catholic Church's respect for Muslim people, Jordan's King Abdullah II came to Washington yesterday and delivered words at Catholic University that Washington Archbishop Theodore E. McCarrick predicted "will go down in history."

In his speech praising Jesus' teachings in the Bible and Koran alike, Abdullah, who assumed power the day his father, the late King Hussein, died in 1999, ripped Muslim terrorists Osama bin Laden and Abu Musab Zarqawi by name as "ignorant extremists" who do not speak for Islam.

He told the audience that included foreign ambassadors, State Department officials, church leaders and other invited guests that Jordan this summer hosted a major international conference representing 45 nations and all eight traditional schools of Islamic thought.

"They issued a joint statement of accord to help end abuses of our faith," the king noted, chiefly that "religious edicts cannot be issued by people lacking the proper qualifications and religious knowledge -- like bin Laden and Zarqawi. And they agreed that no one can call another Muslim an apostate, as the extremists do to those who disagree with them."

Last November, he also pointed out, Jordan started what's come to be known as the "Amman Message," articulating Islam's essential social values of compassion, respect for others, tolerance and acceptance, freedom of religion and rejecting Muslim isolation from the global movement of human society.

"In this effort, I know I am joined by President Bush and many other Western and Islamic leaders," said the king, who was accompanied yesterday by his wife, Queen Rania. "In the Middle East, in Europe and here in the United States, senior Muslim clerics have spoken out, authoritatively, against terror."

The ultimate goal, he concluded, "is to take back our religion from the vocal, violent and ignorant extremists who have tried to hijack Islam over the last 100 years. They do not speak for Islam any more than a Christian terrorist speaks for Christianity."

Not forgotten

It was only fitting that President Bush, in a visit to New Orleans that coincided with the fourth anniversary of the September 11 terror attacks, paid a visit to a parking lot that has become a staging ground for rescue workers.

"This is where all the firefighters from New Orleans and many from other towns around the country, judging from their shirts, are living," according to the official White House pool report.

While there, it continued, Mr. Bush posed for a picture with New York City firefighters who were standing before a not-so-ordinary New York City firetruck.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan revealed that this same fire engine was donated by the city of New Orleans to New York City in the days after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. And now New York has returned the gift, the report said.

A banner hanging on a memorial poster erected next to the truck stated: "God Bless America. Never Forget."

Army Eggs Benedict

We have to laugh at Mark Silva, White House correspondent for the Chicago Tribune, who accompanied President Bush to flood-ravaged New Orleans this week and revealed that he and fellow scribes "handed off our surplus boxes of breakfasts ready-to-eat -- sausage and egg on toast and bagel -- to a unit of the 82nd Airborne on the dock who, by the appearance of their reaction, hadn't eaten since the invasion of Afghanistan."

Whose Victory, Exactly? (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

Last week my son's elementary school raised several thousand dollars for hurricane victims by washing cars. My other son's preschool announced without fuss that a boy from New Orleans would be joining the class. My employer is organizing help for the company's Gulf Coast employees, my local bookstore is collecting money for the Red Cross and my favorite radio station raised $54,000 last weekend. Every church or synagogue attended by anyone I know is, of course, raising money, housing evacuees or delivering clothes to victims.

To put it differently, nearly every institution with which I come into daily contact -- my library, my grocery store, my search engine -- has already donated time or money to the victims of Hurricane Katrina, and I don't think this makes me or my community unique. A Zogby poll conducted last week found that 68 percent of Americans had donated money to hurricane relief. An ABC News/Washington Post poll published yesterday found that 60 percent had already donated, and a further 28 percent intend to. Those percentages mean that donors must represent a huge range of political views, economic classes, even aesthetic preferences. Indeed, among the fundraisers listed in last weekend's Post were a jazz concert, a tea dance, a "Christian music" concert and a rehearsal of Verdi's "The Sicilian Vespers." No wonder the Red Cross has already collected more than half a billion dollars; no wonder it was impossible to get on to the Salvation Army's Web site at peak times last week.

But those percentages also mean that it is important not to draw hasty conclusions about the ultimate political impact of this tragedy. More specifically, it's important to ignore the hasty conclusions that have already been drawn, both here and abroad, about the victory of "big government" and the death of a certain kind of American individualism. The German chancellor -- once again using American politics in his election campaign -- has already called the disaster an argument for "strong government." Polly Toynbee, a columnist for Britain's Guardian, declared that Katrina revealed "a hollowed superpower . . . a country that is not a country at all, but atomised, segmented individuals living parallel lives as far apart as possible." A Los Angeles Times article, headlined "A Comeback for Big Government," more objectively quoted lots of experts agreeing that in the wake of the hurricane, the administration will "put aside its interest in small government."

But while it is true that the government's relief effort looks set to dwarf anything it has tried before, consider what the actual experience of the disaster has already been -- not theoretically, not on paper, but in practice. Listen, for example, to volunteers who prepared 92 boats to help evacuate people from the rooftops of New Orleans. They were ultimately kept out by Federal Emergency Management Agency bureaucrats because, among other things, they didn't have life preservers. Or listen to the volunteers who organized 100 doctors to treat 400 sick people at a converted Baton Rouge warehouse -- until they, too, were told by the government to shut down, reopen and then shut down again. Or to the hundreds of firefighters who, according to the New York Times, responded to a nationwide call for help and were then "held by the federal agency in Atlanta for days of training on community relations and sexual harassment," while women were raped and lives were lost in New Orleans. Compare their frustration to the joy experienced by 8-year-olds across the country, washing cars for the Red Cross.

By the same token, consider the effectiveness of the relief strategies so far. With great fanfare, the federal government announced it would distribute debit cards to Katrina victims. The result was chaos, anger and expectations of fraud. Quietly, the Red Cross has been paying evacuees' hotel bills. The result is that 57,000 people have time to plan what to do next. Massive government efforts to get people into massive shelters have led to dissatisfaction, delays, long lines and frustration. But private initiatives -- ranging across the political spectrum from MoveOn.org's Hurricanehousing.org, which is advertising space in thousands of private homes, to First Baptist Church in Athens, Tex., which has just installed six new showers -- are helping people find better housing faster. Over the longer term, it's also pretty safe to bet that people who relocate thanks to a church, find a job thanks to a charitable Web site, and get by thanks to their extended families are going to do a lot better, economically and psychologically, than the people who hang around waiting to be helped by a government jobs program and a government trauma counselor.

I'm not saying anything radical here: I'm not calling for the abolition of FEMA, and I certainly think there's a role for government in disaster and evacuation planning. But it is true that the worst failures of the past two weeks have been big government failures. The biggest successes, by contrast, have come out of this country's incredibly vibrant, amazingly diverse and fantastically generous civil society. Sooner or later, it will be impossible not to draw political lessons from that paradox.

A Fatal Incuriosity (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

I hate spending time in hospitals and nursing homes. I find them to be some of the most depressing places on earth.

Maybe that's why the stories of the sick and elderly who died, 45 in a New Orleans hospital and 34 in St. Rita's nursing home in the devastated St. Bernard Parish outside New Orleans, haunt me so.

You're already vulnerable and alone when suddenly you're beset by nature and betrayed by your government.

At St. Rita's, 34 seniors fought to live with what little strength they had as the lights went out and the water rose over their legs, over their shoulders, over their mouths. As Gardiner Harris wrote in The Times, the failed defenses included a table nailed against a window and a couch pushed against a door.

Several electric wheelchairs were gathered near the front entrance, maybe by patients who dreamed of evacuating. Their drowned bodies were found swollen and unrecognizable a week later, as Mr. Harris reported, "draped over a wheelchair, wrapped in a shower curtain, lying on a floor in several inches of muck."

At Memorial Medical Center, victims also suffered in 100-degree heat and died, some while waiting to be rescued in the four days after Katrina hit.

As Louisiana's death toll spiked to 423 yesterday, the state charged St. Rita's owners with multiple counts of negligent homicide, accusing them of not responding to warnings about the hurricane. "In effect," State Attorney General Charles Foti Jr. said, "I think that their inactions resulted in the death of these people."

President Bush continued to try to spin his own inaction yesterday, but he may finally have reached a patch of reality beyond spin. Now he's the one drowning, unable to rescue himself by patting small black children on the head during photo-ops and making scripted attempts to appear engaged. He can keep going back down there, as he will again on Thursday when he gives a televised speech to the nation, but he can never compensate for his tragic inattention during days when so many lives could have been saved.

He made the ultimate sacrifice and admitted his administration had messed up, something he'd refused to do through all of the other screw-ups, from phantom W.M.D. and the torture at Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo to the miscalculations on the Iraq occupation and the insurgency, which will soon claim 2,000 young Americans.

How many places will be in shambles by the time the Bush crew leaves office?

Given that the Bush team has dealt with both gulf crises, Iraq and Katrina, with the same deadly mixture of arrogance and incompetence, and a refusal to face reality, it's frightening to think how it will handle the most demanding act of government domestic investment since the New Deal.

Even though we know W. likes to be in his bubble with his feather pillow, the stories this week are breathtaking about the lengths the White House staff had to go to in order to capture Incurious George's attention.

Newsweek reported that the reality of Katrina did not sink in for the president until days after the levees broke, turning New Orleans into a watery grave. It took a virtual intervention of his top aides to make W. watch the news about the worst natural disaster in a century. Dan Bartlett made a DVD of newscasts on the hurricane to show the president on Friday morning as he flew down to the Gulf Coast.

The aides were scared to tell the isolated president that he should cut short his vacation by a couple of days, Newsweek said, because he can be "cold and snappish in private." Mike Allen wrote in Time about one "youngish aide" who was so terrified about telling Mr. Bush he was wrong about something during the first term, he "had dry heaves" afterward.

The president had to be truly zoned out not to jump at the word "hurricane," given that he has always used his father's term as a reverse playbook and his father almost lost Florida in 1992 because of his slow-footed response to Hurricane Andrew. And W.'s chief of staff, Andy Card, was the White House transportation secretary the senior President Bush sent to the rescue after FEMA bungled that one.

W. has said he prefers to get his information straight up from aides, rather than filtered through newspapers or newscasts. But he surrounds himself with weak sisters who don't have the nerve to break bad news to him, or ideologues with agendas that require warping reality or chuckleheaded cronies like Brownie.

The president should stop haunting New Orleans, looking for that bullhorn moment. It's too late.

A 'Moronic' Proposal (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

Some public-spirited folks in Bozeman, Montana, have come up with a wonderful idea to help Uncle Sam offset some of the $62 billion federal cost of Hurricane Katrina relief. The Bozeman Daily Chronicle reports that Montanans from both sides of the political aisle have petitioned the city council to give the feds back a $4 million earmark to pay for a parking garage in the just-passed $286 billion highway bill. As one of these citizens, Jane Shaw, told us: "We figure New Orleans needs the money right now a lot more than we need extra downtown parking space."

Which got us thinking: Why not cancel all of the special-project pork in the highway bill and dedicate the $25 billion in savings to emergency relief on the Gulf Coast? Is it asking too much for Richmond, Indiana, to give up $3 million for its hiking trail, or Newark, New Jersey, to put a hold on its $2 million bike path?

And in the face of the worst natural disaster in U.S. history, couldn't Alaskans put a hold on the infamous $454 million earmark for the two "bridges to nowhere" that will serve a town of 50 people? That same half a billion dollars could rebuild thousands of homes for suffering New Orleans evacuees. One obstacle to this idea apparently will be Don Young, the House Transportation Committee Chairman who captured the funds for Alaska in the first place. A spokesman in his office told the Anchorage Daily News that the pork-for-relief swap was "moronic." Sounds like someone who wants Mr. Young to become "ranking Member" next Congress.

In all there are more than 6,000 of these parochial projects -- or about 14 for every Congressional district -- funded in the highway bill. The pork reduction plan is particularly appropriate as a response to Katrina, because we have learned in recent days that one reason that money was not spent on fortifying the levees in New Orleans was that hundreds of millions of dollars were rerouted to glitzier earmarked projects throughout the state of Louisiana.

We're hearing all sorts of bad ideas about how to offset the $62 billion of spending already authorized for Hurricane Katrina relief. Cancel the Bush tax cuts, raise the gasoline tax by $1 a gallon, increase deficit spending, and sharply cut spending on national defense and the war in Iraq. In Washington, it seems, everything is expendable except for the slabs of bacon that are carved out of the federal fisc to ensure re-election.

The glory of what is happening in Bozeman is that taxpayers are proving to be wiser about priorities than their politicians. We like the suggestion by Ronald Utt of the Foundation Heritage that, when the new levee is built to protect the Big Easy from future storms, it should bear a bronze plaque stamped: "Proudly Brought to You by the Citizens of Alaska."

Feds Promise Crackdown On Katrina Scams (NBC)

By Lisa Myers, Senior investigative correspondent

NBC News, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — As weather forecasters tracked the approach of Hurricane Katrina, Alan Paller, a computer security expert with the Sans Institute, tracked another gathering storm — the rush to register Internet sites containing the name "Katrina."

"Most of them," says Paller, "appear to be just plain thieves."

Story continues below ? advertisement

Tuesday, the U.S. Justice Department warned that many of some 4,000 Katrina Web sites could be fake. Sixty percent come from overseas, officials said, a warning sign the sites may be bogus.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales promised swift punishment for those who victimize generous Americans.

"Federal, state and local law enforcement officials are watching carefully," Gonzales warned at a news conference Tuesday. "[We] will have zero tolerance for these kinds of crimes."

Missouri Attorney General Jay Nixon already has moved against 10 Web sites, tied to a group of white supremacists.

"It's totally outrageous," Nixon said, "for someone to take these domain names and then solicit funds, run them through what looks like a legitimate charity using pictures and other hurricane victims, when in reality that money was running to his hate sites."

FBI Warns About Fake Katrina Charity Web Sites (REU)

Reuters, September 14, 2005

Many of the 4,000 Web sites advertising relief services for Hurricane Katrina could be fake and about 60 percent of them come from overseas--a sign they may be bogus, the FBI said Tuesday.

Senior FBI and Justice Department officials warned Americans who want to donate money to the relief effort to be cautious to avoid fraudulent charities, including those that pretend to be major organizations like the Red Cross.

"Just like these natural disasters bring out the best in people, they also bring out some of the worst elements of the criminal element out there who are willing to take advantage of those who are willing to give and those who so desperately need the relief," said Chris Swecker, chief of the FBI's criminal investigative division.

Swecker said the FBI is investigating sites of fraudulent charities. He said there are about 4,000 sites advertising Katrina relief services, and about 60 percent of them are coming from overseas.

"That is not a reason unto itself to conclude that that's a scam Web site, but it is a reason to be cautious," he said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said some of the bogus sites had been shut down but would not give details on the number or how many investigations had been launched.

"We must ensure that those offering a helping hand do not become victims themselves and that those found preying on the compassion of our citizens are punished," he said.

The Red Cross' general counsel, Mary Elcano, said the organization had hired a security company to scan the Internet for fake e-mails that try to trick people into providing credit card numbers and personal information on a Web site that looks like the one run by the Red Cross.

"If the companies don't go away...the Department of Justice will prosecute and, if necessary, the Red Cross will file a civil action to seek restitution," she said.

Officials urged people who want to donate money not to click on links but to directly type in the Web address of the charity in order to donate.

AP, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — At least 4,000 Web sites claiming to be Hurricane Katrina relief funds have popped up on the Internet and top U.S. law enforcement officials warned Tuesday that many could be fraudulent.

The number of Katrina-related sites has more than quadrupled in the past week, according to FBI officials.

“A devious few have sought to take advantage of our collective generosity,” Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a news conference to highlight the government’s efforts to combat fraud.

The FBI has so far reviewed 2,100 sites, of which 60 percent are foreign and thus more likely to be bogus, said FBI assistant director Chris Swecker. There have so far been no arrests. As of last week, the FBI had opened eight criminal investigations of suspect domestic sites.

Swecker said the number of probes has grown a lot in recent days, but he declined to be specific. The Justice Department has a Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force looking especially at phony charities, identity theft, insurance scams and government benefit fraud.

The American Red Cross, the relief group most frequently copied in Internet scams, also is working with authorities.

Officials again urged donors not to respond to unsolicited e-mails and to give only to well-known charities.

Dubious Katrina Web Sites Increasing (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Many of the 4,000 Web sites claiming to offer help to victims of Hurricane Katrina are suspicious, the Justice Department said Tuesday.

FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker said investigators have reviewed 2,100 sites and about 60 percent of them originate outside the United States. "That's not a reason unto itself to conclude that that's a scam Web site, but it is a reason to be cautious," Swecker said.

Swecker said no arrests have been made. But the number of criminal cyber probes has increased substantially since last Thursday, when the FBI acknowledged it was investigating eight instances of potential Web site fraud.

"I can't give you the exact number, but it's a lot more than eight," he said.

Last week the FBI said there were 2,300 sites that appeared to solicit money or offer Katrina aid.

Red Cross General Counsel Mary Elcano told reporters the organization is prepared to file civil lawsuits against operators of Web sites who do not promptly shut down when ordered to do so by the FBI.

Many of the apparently fraudulent Web sites trying to tap into Katrina relief donations feature pop-ups, spam through provided links and other unsolicited e-mails.

"The emphasis here is on 'unsolicited,' things that come in that you didn't -- you have never made contact with this particular charitable organization," Swecker said. "There's a link. There's a pop-up. There's something that you need to do. Do not click on it.

"The best thing to do is to know the Internet address of the company or the NGO, the non-government organization, that you're dealing with and type that in yourself rather than clicking on a link."

Others traps are variations of the "Nigerian scam letter." The scammer will appear to offer money or relief help but will ask for money first from the e-mail recipient. Still other e-mails misdirect the user to bogus sites intended to lure people into divulging personal financial information.

"There is no place for crime of this nature," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said. He promised aggressive prosecution of the "devious few who have sought to take advantage of our collective generosity."

Gonzales said the federal prosecutors' offices and the federal courts in Louisiana and Mississippi are functioning and will be able to handle the fraud prosecutions.

But he acknowledged that getting the full caseload handled in the Gulf Coast could require congressional action.

"[We are] looking at legislation to perhaps extend venue, the jurisdiction of the courts, so that in a case of emergency the court in New Orleans, for example, could hear the case somewhere else within the state of Louisiana," he said.

Current law requires cases to be heard in the judicial district where the charges are brought. Louisiana has three federal judicial districts.

Chertoff Delayed Federal Response, Memo Shows (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay, Alison Young And Shannon McCaffrey

Knight Ridder, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON - The federal official with the power to mobilize a massive federal response to Hurricane Katrina was Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, not the former FEMA chief who was relieved of his duties and resigned earlier this week, federal documents reviewed by Knight Ridder show.

Even before the storm struck the Gulf Coast, Chertoff could have ordered federal agencies into action without any request from state or local officials. Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown had only limited authority to do so until about 36 hours after the storm hit, when Chertoff designated him as the "principal federal official" in charge of the storm.

As thousands of hurricane victims went without food, water and shelter in the days after Katrina's early morning Aug. 29 landfall, critics assailed Brown for being responsible for delays that might have cost hundreds of lives.

But Chertoff - not Brown - was in charge of managing the national response to a catastrophic disaster, according to the National Response Plan, the federal government's blueprint for how agencies will handle major natural disasters or terrorist incidents. An order issued by President Bush in 2003 also assigned that responsibility to the homeland security director.

But according to a memo obtained by Knight Ridder, Chertoff didn't shift that power to Brown until late afternoon or evening on Aug. 30, about 36 hours after Katrina hit Louisiana and Mississippi. That same memo suggests that Chertoff may have been confused about his lead role in disaster response and that of his department.

"As you know, the President has established the `White House Task Force on Hurricane Katrina Response.' He will meet with us tomorrow to launch this effort. The Department of Homeland Security, along with other Departments, will be part of the task force and will assist the Administration with its response to Hurricane Katrina," Chertoff said in the memo to the secretaries of defense, health and human services and other key federal agencies.

On the day that Chertoff wrote the memo, Bush was in San Diego presiding over a ceremony marking the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II.

Chertoff's Aug. 30 memo for the first time declared Katrina an "Incident of National Significance," a key designation that triggers swift federal coordination. The following afternoon, Bush met with his Cabinet, then appeared before TV cameras in the White House Rose Garden to announce the government's planned action.

That same day, Aug. 31, the Department of Defense, whose troops and equipment are crucial in such large disasters, activated its Task Force Katrina. But active-duty troops didn't begin to arrive in large numbers along the Gulf Coast until Saturday.

White House and homeland security officials wouldn't explain why Chertoff waited some 36 hours to declare Katrina an incident of national significance and why he didn't immediately begin to direct the federal response from the moment on Aug. 27 when the National Hurricane Center predicted that Katrina would strike the Gulf Coast with catastrophic force in 48 hours. Nor would they explain why Bush felt the need to appoint a separate task force.

Chertoff's hesitation and Bush's creation of a task force both appear to contradict the National Response Plan and previous presidential directives that specify what the secretary of homeland security is assigned to do without further presidential orders. The goal of the National Response Plan is to provide a streamlined framework for swiftly delivering federal assistance when a disaster - caused by terrorists or Mother Nature - is too big for local officials to handle.

Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman, referred most inquiries about the memo and Chertoff's actions to the Department of Homeland Security.

"There will be an after-action report" on the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, Perino said. She added that "Chertoff had the authority to invoke the Incident of National Significance, and he did it on Tuesday."

Perino said the creation of the White House task force didn't add another bureaucratic layer or delay the response to the devastating hurricane. "Absolutely not," she said. "I think it helped move things along." When asked whether the delay in issuing the Incident of National Significance was to allow Bush time to return to Washington, Perino replied: "Not that I'm aware of."

Russ Knocke, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, didn't dispute that the National Response Plan put Chertoff in charge in federal response to a catastrophe. But he disputed that the bureaucracy got in the way of launching the federal response.

"There was a tremendous sense of urgency," Knocke said. "We were mobilizing the greatest response to a disaster in the nation's history."

Knocke noted that members of the Coast Guard were already in New Orleans performing rescues and FEMA personnel and supplies had been deployed to the region.

The Department of Homeland Security has refused repeated requests to provide details about Chertoff's schedule and said it couldn't say specifically when the department requested assistance from the military. Knocke said a military liaison was working with FEMA, but said he didn't know his or her name or rank. FEMA officials said they wouldn't provide information about the liaison.

Knocke said members of almost every federal agency had already been meeting as part of the department's Interagency Incident Management Group, which convened for the first time on the Friday before the hurricane struck. So it would be a mistake, he said, to interpret the memo as meaning that Tuesday, Aug. 30 was the first time that members of the federal government coordinated.

The Chertoff memo indicates that the response to Katrina wasn't left to disaster professionals, but was run out of the White House, said George Haddow, a former deputy chief of staff at FEMA during the Clinton administration and the co-author of an emergency management textbook.

"It shows that the president is running the disaster, the White House is running it as opposed to Brown or Chertoff," Haddow said. Brown "is a convenient fall guy. He's not the problem really. The problem is a system that was marginalized."

A former FEMA director under President Reagan expressed shock by the inaction that Chertoff's memo suggested. It showed that Chertoff "does not have a full appreciation for what the country is faced with - nor does anyone who waits that long," said Gen. Julius Becton Jr., who was FEMA director from 1985-1989.

"Anytime you have a delay in taking action, there's a potential for losing lives," Becton told Knight Ridder. "I have no idea how many lives we're talking about. ... I don't understand why, except that they were inefficient."

Chertoff's Aug. 30 memo came on the heels of a memo from Brown, written several hours after Katrina made landfall, showing that the FEMA director was waiting for Chertoff's permission to get help from others within the massive department. In that memo, first obtained by the Associated Press last week, Brown requested Chertoff's "assistance to make available DHS employees willing to deploy as soon as possible." It asked for another 1,000 homeland security workers within two days and 2,000 within a week.

The four-paragraph memo ended with Brown thanking Chertoff "for your consideration in helping us meet our responsibilities in this near catastrophic event."

According to the National Response Plan, which was unveiled in January by Chertoff's predecessor, Tom Ridge, the secretary of homeland security is supposed to declare an Incident of National Significance when a catastrophic event occurs.

"Standard procedures regarding requests for assistance may be expedited or, under extreme circumstances, suspended in the immediate aftermath of an event of catastrophic magnitude," according to the plan, which evolved from earlier plans and lessons learned after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "Notification and full coordination with the States will occur, but the coordination process must not delay or impede the rapid deployment and use of critical resources."

Should Chertoff have declared Katrina an Incident of National Significance sooner - even before the storm struck? Did his delay slow the quick delivery of the massive federal response that was needed? Would it have made a difference?

"You raise good questions," said Frank J. Cilluffo, the director of George Washington University's Homeland Security Planning Institute. It's too early to tell, he said, whether unfamiliarity with or glitches in the new National Response Plan were factors in the poor early response to Katrina.

"Clearly this is the first test. It certainly did not pass with flying colors," Cilluffo said of the National Response Plan.

Mike Byrne, a former senior homeland security official under Ridge who worked on the plan, said he doesn't think the new National Response Plan caused the confusion that plagued the early response to Katrina.

Something else went wrong, he suspects. The new National Response Plan isn't all that different from the previous plan, called the Federal Response Plan.

"Our history of responding to major disasters has been one where we've done it well," Byrne said. "We need to figure out why this one didn't go as well as the others did. It's shocking to me."

Chertoff's Aug. 30 memo is posted at www.krwashington.com

Acting FEMA Director Vows To Focus On Katrina Victims (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

R. David Paulison yesterday began work as acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency with a clean slate and the full backing of President Bush to help rebuild the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast.

"I can't deal with what happened in the last two weeks, but I can tell you from this point forward, we are going to be focusing on the victims of this hurricane," Mr. Paulison said.

Getting victims off cots and out of the Astrodome and church basements into homes is the focus, Mr. Paulison said in a press briefing with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

"We've had a hurricane of unimaginable proportions, and we're going to deal with it. We're going to get those people out of shelters, and we're going to move and get them the help that they need," said Mr. Paulison, who was chief of the Miami-Dade County Fire Rescue Department from 1992 to 2001.

Mr. Paulison, whose experience in hurricane recovery began just two weeks on the job as Miami's fire chief when Hurricane Andrew slammed the city, takes the helm of the federal agency two weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

He replaces Michael D. Brown, who resigned Monday after state and local officials said FEMA failed in responding to the storm and critics questioned his limited background in overseeing disaster relief.

"If ever a government agency needed rescuing, it's FEMA, and Mr. Paulison has the right credentials for this crucial job," declared a Miami Herald editorial yesterday.

Capt. Faye Davis, president of the predominantly black Miami-Dade chapter of the Progressive Firefighters Association, told the Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel that Mr. Paulison "did a good job being sensitive to our concerns."

"I think Chief Paulison is going to bring to FEMA a sense of urgency. He understands you have to have things, supplies and people in place. If you wait until after the fact it could be too late," she said.

Asked yesterday whether future FEMA directors, who are political appointments, will be selected based on disaster emergency management experience, Mr. Chertoff said it will be "a significant consideration."

"Certainly my recommendation of Chief Paulison was his wide experience in dealing with the issue of fire and emergency," Mr. Chertoff said.

FEMA fulfills many roles after an emergency, including coordinating federal financial assistance to states, communities, businesses and individuals, and the responses of the Red Cross and other charities.

Less than two weeks after the September 11 attacks, Mr. Paulison, who became a fireman at age 19, was nominated by Mr. Bush to lead the nation's firefighters as chief of the U.S. Fire Administration.

Mr. Paulison said he did not hesitate when Mr. Bush asked him to take charge of FEMA.

"The president called last night, and I was, obviously, humbled that he would take the time to do that," Mr. Paulison said.

Take My Job. Please. (WP)

By Mark Leibovich

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

Brownie is no longer doing a heckuva job. Or any job.

DOJ_NMG_0005315

Talk about an inevitable sacrifice: It was just a matter of time before FEMA head Michael D. Brown resigned, as he did yesterday. He had come to personify the rule that once you become a joke in Washington, there is no rehab. He had became the subject of hundreds of punch lines amid the tragically unfunny spectacle of Katrina -- too many to recover from.

Last Thursday, the day before Brown was summarily posted back to Washington, Sen. Ken Salazar offered a lesson in the caricature Brown had become. Salazar, a Colorado Democrat who like many others had demanded that the Federal Emergency Management Agency chief be fired, was asked his assessment of Brown, a longtime resident of the senator's home state. After a few sentences about Brown's lack of experience in emergency management, Salazar shrugged and said simply, "Arabian horses."

This of course referred to Brown's stint as commissioner of the International Arabian Horse Association. It became the functional shorthand for a background short of emergency management experience. More to the point, it became a punch line.

"Prior to heading FEMA, Brown spent the '90s as a commissioner -- this is true -- of the International Arabian Horse Association," Jon Stewart said on "The Daily Show" last week. "I guess he stands out because most Bush appointees are beholden to the Arabian people."

The equine satire went well beyond professional comics. "I'm not aware of any Arabian horses being killed in this storm," Kate Hale, a former Miami emergency management chief, told the New York Daily News last week.

And the rout was on.

"Any public figure short of the president doesn't want to become fodder for late-night television shows," says Ed Kutler, a Republican lobbyist. "When you make it past a certain point of satire, there is no return. And, unfortunately for Brown, he passed that point last week or earlier, whether deserved or not."

"This horse business" -- Andy Lester, a longtime friend of Brown's, said in an interview -- was only the start.

Brown's saga incorporated a series of perceived fumbles and unfortunate sound bites that made for a caricature.

Some of it was not his fault. When Bush, during his first visit to the Gulf Coast after Katrina, said, "Brownie, you're doing a heckuva job," it embodied what many critics viewed as the administration's slow response to the disaster.

But Brown provided some ammunition himself. He was bludgeoned in a procession of TV interviews with the likes of Soledad O'Brien, Paula Zahn and, most glaringly, Ted Koppel, in which Brown said he had learned only that day of deteriorating conditions at the New Orleans Convention Center.

"I have no problem talking to you about my husband," Tamara Brown said when reached at her home last week. "But I need to talk to our press office first." She was, predictably, not heard from again, and Mike Brown's caricature was left to calcify in a flurry of resignation demands, accusations (in a Time magazine report that he exaggerated his disaster relief experience) and ridicule (Jay Leno: "Big news -- President Bush announced a plan to put a man on Mars. It's the head of FEMA").

"I'm worried for him personally," Lester said of his friend last week. He said Brown was not even the subject of criticism anymore. "It's not criticism, it's piling on."

Lester, who attended Georgetown Law School, added that the ordeal that has befallen Brown "is one of the reasons I don't live in Washington anymore."

The countdown to Brown's departure intensified Friday when Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff "reassigned" him back to Washington. White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Brown had not resigned and the president had not asked for his resignation. When asked by a reporter whether the president had full confidence in Brown, McClellan said, "We appreciate all those who are working round the clock."

But it should generally not be taken as a good sign when the head of FEMA is taken off one of the worst catastrophes in American history. To wit:

"Some good news today," Leno said Friday night. "The most important evacuation was made today in New Orleans. They got the head of FEMA, Mike Brown, out of there."

Conan O'Brien: "Michael Brown, the controversial head of FEMA, was relieved of his duties in New Orleans. . . . Yeah, he's been told to report to Washington immediately, which means he should get there in about a week."

Before leaving the Gulf Coast, Brown announced that he planned to "go home and walk my dog and hug my wife and maybe get a good Mexican meal and a stiff margarita."

This violated another cardinal rule of image rehab, says Marshall Wittmann, Sen. John McCain's former press secretary, now with the Democratic Leadership Council: "In the aftermath of a disaster, you don't refer to a party drink you want to indulge in."

In the spirit of piling on, Wittmann says that Brown "had clearly become a bur in Bush's saddle."

The Five Stages Of Crisis-Management (WSJ)

By Jack Welch

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

Our last day in Nantucket this summer, we bumped into a crusty old islander we know, a sea-hand who has seen his share of hurricanes. We asked him about the storm bearing down on New Orleans. "Probably just another overhyped Weather Channel event," he mused. We saw him again the next day, a few hours after the storm's landfall, and he repeated his take, this time with relief. We agreed -- the pictures on TV weren't that bad.

Then, of course, the levees broke and all hell broke loose with them.

In the terrible days since then, there has been a hurricane of debate about what went wrong in New Orleans and who is to blame. Mother Nature, perhaps for the first time in the case of a bona fide natural disaster, has been given a pass. Instead, the shouting has been about crisis-management -- or the lack thereof. Everyone from President Bush to the police chief in a small parish on the outskirts of the city has been accused of making shockingly bad mistakes and misjudgments. The Katrina crisis, you would think, is unlike any before it.

Unfortunately, that's not completely true.

Yes, there has never been a natural disaster of Katrina's magnitude in our history. An entire city has been devastated, hundreds of lives lost, and hundreds of thousands of people displaced. In terms of impact, only an extended catastrophe like the Great Depression can compare in scope.

And yet, Hurricane Katrina is practically a case study of the five stages people seem to have to go through during severe crises. Over the past 40 years, I've seen these stages unfold in companies large and small, of every type, in every part of the world, and I went through them myself at my own company more than a few times.

New Orleans, of course, is not a company, but like any city, it is an organization. And there can be no denying that New Orleans' crisis is tragic in a way that company crises are not. But contrary to the sound and fury out there right now, the Katrina crisis follows a well-worn pattern.

The first stage of that pattern is denial. The problem isn't that bad, the thinking usually goes, it can't be, because bad things don't happen here, to us. The second is containment. This is the stage where people, including perfectly capable leaders, try to make the problem disappear by giving it to someone else to solve. The third stage is shame-mongering, in which all parties with a stake in the problem enter into a frantic dance of self-defense, assigning blame and claiming credit. Fourth comes blood on the floor. In just about every crisis, a high profile person pays with his job, and sometimes he takes a crowd with him. In the fifth and final stage, the crisis gets fixed and, despite prophesies of permanent doom, life goes on, usually for the better.

We are a way off from the fifth stage in New Orleans, but the first four played out like an old movie.

Denial: In the days and even hours before the hurricane struck, officials at every level of the government demonstrated a lack of urgency about the storm that seems crazy now. No one operated out of malice -- that can be said for certain. But the facts reveal the kind of paralysis so often brought on by panic and its ironically common side-effect, inertia. The federal government received hourly updates on the storm, but the head of FEMA, the ill-fated Michael Brown, waited 24 hours, by the most generous estimations, before ordering personnel into the area. The state's governor, in her early communications with the president, mainly asked for financial aid for the city's clean-up efforts. On the local level, the mayor let a critical 12 hours elapse before ordering an evacuation of the city.

Denial in the face of disaster is human. It is the main and immediate emotion people feel at the receiving end of any really bad news. That doesn't excuse what happened in New Orleans. In fact, one of the marks of good leadership is the ability to dispense with denial quickly and face into hard stuff with eyes open and fists raised. With particularly bad crises facing them, good leaders also define reality, set direction and inspire people to move forward. Just think of Giuliani after 9/11 or Churchill during World War II. Denial doesn't exactly come to mind -- a forthright, calm, fierce boldness does.

All that was in short supply during the disaster in New Orleans. But it might be argued that denial in and about New Orleans started long ago. New Orleans was a city with more than 20% living below the poverty line, a homicide rate almost 10 times higher than New York, and an intractable tradition of political corruption.

Why did it take a hurricane to reveal these unacceptable conditions?

New Orleans was also well aware that its levee system was inadequate for a major storm and that the economic plight of its citizenry, with their lack of cars and cash, rendered evacuation plans meaningless.

Why did it take a hurricane to prove those points?

In both cases, the only answer is denial, that predictable first phase of crisis, which in Katrina's case, happened before, during, and after the actual storm.

DOJ_NMG_0005317

Containment: For this second predictable phase in crises, Katrina was no exception. In companies, containment usually plays out with leaders trying to keep the "matter" quiet -- a total waste of energy, as all problems, and especially messy ones, eventually get out and explode. In Katrina's case, containment came in a related form, buck-passing -- pushing responsibility for the disaster from one part of government to another in hopes of making it go away. The city and state screamed for federal help, the feds said they couldn't send in the troops (literally) until the state asked for them, the state said it wouldn't approve the federal relief plan, and round and round went the baton.

No layer is a good layer. Bureaucracy, with its pettiness and formalities, slows action and initiative in any situation, business or otherwise. In a crisis like Katrina, it can be deadly. The terrible part is that Katrina might have avoided some of its bureaucratic bumbling if FEMA had not been buried in the Department of Homeland Security. As an independent entity for decades prior, FEMA fared better. But inside Homeland Security, FEMA was a layer down, twisted in and hobbled by government hierarchy. And to make matters worse, its head, Michael Brown, appears to have been an inexperienced political operative -- making his appointment an example of bureaucratic inefficiency at its worst.

Shame-mongering: This is a period in which all stakeholders fight to get their side of the story told, with themselves as the heroes at the center. Katrina's shame-mongering had blasted into overdrive by Tuesday, about 48 hours after landfall. I would wager that never before has a storm become so politicized. Very quickly, Katrina wasn't a hurricane -- it was a test of George Bush's leadership, it was a reflection of race and poverty in America, it was a metaphor for Iraq. The Democrats used the event to define George Bush for their own purposes; the Republicans -- after a delay and with markedly less gusto -- used it to define them back. The key word here is delay. Because in any crisis, effective leaders get their message out strongly, clearly -- and early. George Bush and his team in Washington didn't do that, and they are paying for it.

Blood on the floor: From the moment it became obvious that Katrina was a crisis-management disaster, you knew someone's head was going to roll. That's what usually happens in the fourth stage of crises. People need to feel that someone has paid, and paid dearly, for what went wrong. Michael Brown was the obvious choice -- a guy who had few hard credentials in his bag of defenses. And if Katrina is like most crises, his blood won't be the last spilled. In a few weeks, more personnel changes in FEMA and Homeland Security are sure to come, and politicians in New Orleans and Louisiana will be both made and ruined by what they did during the storm.

Eventually, all crises go away, and New Orleans' will too. The waters will recede; people will return and rebuild. In a year, the media will report that progress toward normalcy has been made. In three years, the best levees ever constructed will be completed with great fanfare; the Superdome or its replacement will have been outfitted to keep thousands of people housed and fed for a month. In five years, the before-and-after photos of New Orleans will boggle the mind.

History shows us that crises almost always seem to give way to something better. Maybe that's because crises reveal how and where the system is broken in ways that make denial no longer feasible. They have a way of forcing real solutions to happen.

Hurricane Katrina has the potential to do that in New Orleans -- to compel leaders in government and business to find ways to break the city's cycle of poverty and corruption. The opportunities are huge because the losses were. There is a blank slate for change to begin, and it most likely will. Just watch the entrepreneurs rush in with ideas and energy, revitalizing old and creating new businesses with the help of the money politicians will be outbidding one another to throw at the problem. Just watch the residents of New Orleans flock to the jobs that are created with a new spirit of optimism. Crises like Katrina have a way of galvanizing people toward a better future. That's the fifth and final part of the pattern -- the best part.

Now, you may be wondering that if most every crisis follows a pattern, why can't we manage them better, or even prevent them?

In business, we very often do. Over time, organizations may go through several crises, but very rarely do they go through the same type twice. The reason? Companies typically go to extremes after a crisis. They throw up fortresses of rules, controls and procedures to fix what went wrong in the first place. In that way, they build a kind of immunity to the sickness that felled them. It is very unlikely, for instance, that Johnson & Johnson will ever have another product-tampering disaster like Tylenol.

Immunity to crises comes from learning. Crises teach us where the system is broken and how to repair it so it won't break again. Ultimately, learning is why disasters, in business and in nature, have the potential to make the organizations that survive them so much stronger in the long run. And learning will reveal the crisis management of Katrina for what it was -- an age-old pattern meant to be broken.

Homeland Security Reorganization Plan Faces New, Post-Hurricane Scrutiny (CQ)

By Tim Starks

DOJ_NMG_0005318

Congressional Quarterly Today, September 14, 2005

Two key Senate committee chairmen said Tuesday they were willing to take a fresh look following the Hurricane Katrina catastrophe at a proposal made by the Homeland Security secretary this summer to restructure his department.

A pair of top Democratic appropriators are urging Secretary Michael Chertoff to postpone his plan, released in July, to reorganize his department, arguing that it could hinder the response to future major natural disasters.

The request came on the eve of President Bush's concession Tuesday that "Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government, and to the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility."

Chertoff has proposed abolishing the division of his department that deals with emergency preparedness and response, a division that encompasses the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA).

The two functions now performed by FEMA — preparing for disasters in advance and responding to them when they occur — would be separated, with FEMA restructured as a stand-alone agency focused on response that would report directly to the Homeland Security secretary. The reorganization would place responsibility for pre-disaster planning under a new Directorate for Preparedness.

On Sept. 12, David R. Obey, D-Wis., and Martin Olav Sabo, D-Minn., asked Chertoff in a letter to reconsider.

"You justify creating a Directorate for Preparedness with the following statement: 'While operational response and recovery programs have an 'all-hazards' approach, federal preparedness efforts need to be targeted toward addressing gaps in our terrorism and homeland security capabilities,' " the Democrats wrote. "We have long believed that federal preparedness efforts also need to address gaps in our natural disaster preparedness capabilities."

Evaluating Proposals

Authorizing and appropriations committees had been evaluating Chertoff's proposals, some of which require congressional approval, for inclusion in the fiscal 2006 Homeland Security appropriations bill (HR 2360) currently in conference and a separate departmentwide authorization bill.

The House passed an authorizing bill (HR 1817) in May, before Chertoff unveiled his reorganization plan, and Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, had been considering her own version of an authorization bill.

On Tuesday, Judd Gregg, the New Hampshire Republican who chairs the Senate Appropriations Homeland Security Subcommittee, said he had not given any thought to Obey's and Sabo's suggestion to Chertoff.

However, the hurricane gives Chertoff a chance to review his restructuring plan as it pertains to the department as a whole and FEMA specifically, Gregg said, which the senator called an appropriate step. He did not anticipate that restructuring concerns would create difficulties clearing the spending bill, because new authorizing language would be relatively easy to insert before final passage.

Gregg said he and his House counterpart, Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky., were no longer far apart on reconciling their versions of the $31.9 billion bill, including funding for the Coast Guard fleet modernization program, where negotiators were more than $400 million apart to start.

Collins said she is looking at a fall time frame for consideration of a Homeland Security authorization bill. She also is tentatively scheduled to head the Senate side of a bipartisan, bicameral Hurricane Katrina review panel. That proposed panel is mired in a dispute between Democrats and Republicans, but in the meantime she has begun an investigation in her committee. (Story, p. 3)

She said Tuesday she intends to explore the proper structure for the department in light of Hurricane Katrina, including suggestions from some that the restructuring should be postponed. But if FEMA remains a part of the department, Collins said it appears that it should at least have a "direct report" to the secretary, as Chertoff has proposed.

At a news conference Sept. 12, Chertoff defended the restructuring proposals, which came as a result of a department-wide review and were scheduled to become effective by Oct. 1. He said he would meet with congressional leaders to discuss options for improving preparedness.

A spokeswoman for the department said it "will continue to pursue the agenda outlined under [the review] because hurricane response efforts underscore the need for an undersecretary for preparedness that pulls all these responsibilities into one accountable authority."

Democrats And Others Press For An Independent Inquiry (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - As Congress prepares to take its first tentative steps toward evaluating the government response to Hurricane Katrina, Democrats and others are pressing for an independent inquiry, saying lawmakers cannot be trusted to assess their own complicity in the failures.

"I don't think the Congress can investigate ourselves," Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, said Monday.

Mrs. Clinton, a chief proponent of forming an outside commission similar to the one that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, is seeking a vote Wednesday on creating such a panel.

Members of the Sept. 11 commission will echo that call on Wednesday when they release a new privately financed study that will cite failures in the federal response to the storm to argue that the government remains unprepared to deal with a catastrophic terrorist strike on American soil.

Commission members said in recent interviews that the report would criticize the Bush administration and Congress as not following up on many of the commission's recommendations for improving federal disaster-response programs. That lack of action, commissioners said, cost lives in areas of the Gulf Coast struck by the hurricane.

"In Congress, this issue has already become a political football," Slade Gorton, a Republican member of the Sept. 11 commission and a former United States senator from Washington, said this week. "If we're really going to learn anything from this new catastrophe, that's much more likely to happen through an objective look. An independent commission is something that ought to be seriously considered."

The Congressional actions that are coming under new scrutiny include the decision to place the Federal Emergency Management Agency under the larger umbrella of the Department of Homeland Security and the use of flood-control programs as a reliable source of home-state spending projects.

"The Corps of Engineers and Congress are partners in crime," said Steve Ellis, vice president for programs at the group Taxpayers for Common Sense. "We have this process where the pork barrel dictates that we spread the money over the 535 mouths to feed that are Congress rather than putting our resources where it makes the most sense."

Several members of the Sept. 11 commission said they had been startled by what they described as the federal government's inept performance after the hurricane, suggesting that little had changed in federal disaster-relief planning since the terrorist attacks on New York and the Pentagon four years ago this week.

"It's really the same confusion that you had on 9/11 - worse, really, because at least in New York City you had Rudy Giuliani," Thomas H. Kean, the chairman of the commission and a former Republican governor of New Jersey, said Monday.

After the hurricane, Mr. Kean said, "you had no command and control. Who was in charge? Really, nobody was in charge."

Mr. Kean said the shortcomings in the response to the hurricane suggested that the government's response to a large-scale terrorist attack would be no better. "Whether it's a chemical attack or a nuclear attack or an earthquake in San Francisco, it's largely the same response," he said. "And this is proof that we still haven't got it right."

Republican leaders who are resisting an independent inquiry into the response to the hurricane say a joint House-Senate panel proposed by Republicans can conduct an objective investigation. They say that creating a separate group would amount to an abdication of Congress's proper role.

"People are too quick to give up their responsibility and duty as congressmen to other people," said Representative Tom DeLay, Republican of Texas and the House majority leader. "We are more than capable of looking at it."

Senate Republican leaders moved Tuesday to resolve the dispute over the joint panel, preparing a proposal that would delegate members of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee to represent the Senate in the investigation, with the possibility of other panel members.

Lawmakers would be empowered to examine the "development, coordination and execution by local, state and federal authorities of emergency response plans and other activities in preparation for Hurricane Katrina; and the local, state and federal government response to Hurricane Katrina." House Republicans were preparing their own plan for consideration later this week.

Republicans said the joint panel was based on 11 special Congressional investigations since 1973 and would allow issuance of subpoenas either by agreement of the two committee leaders or by a panel vote.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said Tuesday that he would consider the offer but was interested in equal representation and subpoena power and was also worried about Congress investigating itself.

"Congress is not blameless," Mr. Reid said.

While the wrangling continued over the independent panel, the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee was scheduled to meet Wednesday to hear disaster-response experts.

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and chairman of the security committee, said the first hearing would focus on how response to hurricanes could be improved, to be followed by "an in-depth, extensive review" of the government performance surrounding the hurricane.

"We would be remiss if we did not have an aggressive, vigorous Congressional review," Ms. Collins said, saying she expected that Democrats and Republicans would resolve their differences over the investigation.

Disaster Veterans Will Give Advice To Senators Today (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, September 14, 2005

Veterans of floods, earthquakes and tsunamis will offer advice today to a Senate committee looking into how to help victims of Hurricane Katrina in the first of an expected multitude of congressional inquiries into the disaster.

"We're going to hear from experts so we can assess what steps we should be taking right now to assist," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

Pete Wilson, who dealt with 22 natural disasters when he was governor of California, and Marc Morial, a former mayor of New Orleans who now heads the National Urban League, will testify. So will Patricia Owens, the former mayor of Grand Forks, N.D., who successfully evacuated 50,000 people when the Red River flooded in 1997.

The House Government Reform Committee will hold a hearing Thursday to look at other cities' emergency plans to make sure they're prepared for the worst and to learn lessons that can be applied to Katrina recovery.

Victims getting housing, medical help in Alabama

State health and welfare officials in Alabama say they are preparing to meet the long-term Medicaid and housing needs stemming from Hurricane Katrina.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said more than 41,000 Alabamians registered for some type of assistance after their homes were damaged or destroyed, and up to 5,000 people from Mississippi and Louisiana have come to Alabama.

State Medicaid Commissioner Carol Herrmann said a temporary eligibility has been set up for hurricane evacuees, who will receive benefits for up to four months. Technically, Mississippi and Louisiana would be responsible for their residents' Medicaid costs in Alabama. But Herrmann said it's unlikely she would bill the states. She said she will ask federal officials to reimburse some of the costs.

Jacqueline Buck, head of the Central Alabama American Red Cross, said the agency is giving $760 to $1,100 to families, depending on the size. Her district has given out about $3.5 million in assistance and sees 300 to 400 families daily.

Oil production better, but problems persist in Gulf

Oil production in the Gulf of Mexico is increasing, but 56.5% of the normal daily flow remains off line because of offshore platform evacuations, a federal agency reported. After a survey of 54 production companies, the Minerals Management Service said that 87 platforms remained evacuated, down from 105 on Monday. But oil production has increased only a bit since 57.4% had been shut off Monday, the MMS said. Normally, the Gulf of Mexico produces about 1.5 million barrels of oil per day.

Since Katrina first threatened the Gulf on Aug. 26, the production of 19.7 million barrels of oil and 95.5 billion cubic feet of gas have been delayed, the MMS said.

Dallas shutting down one of its two major shelters

The city of Dallas will close its shelter at the convention center over the next couple of days and move everyone who has not found a place to live to Reunion Arena, Red Cross spokesman Paul Studebaker said. He said many evacuees were beginning to run errands, often by taking buses around the city, and were setting out in search of areas they would like to live.

Railroad freight service restored to New Orleans

Norfolk Southern railroad said it has repaired its Lake Pontchartrain Bridge and restored rail freight service into New Orleans. The railroad said reopening the bridge makes it possible to transport supplies and materials in and out of the city to aid recovery operations.

The storm washed nearly 5 miles of track from the top of the 5.8-mile-long rail bridge and into the lake. It took nine cranes on barges to lift the track out of the water and back onto the bridge, Norfolk Southern said.

Nine miles of track running through New Orleans required major repairs from washouts and other water-related problems, Norfolk Southern said.

Temporary jail loses 'Camp Greyhound' moniker

Greyhound Lines asked Louisiana's prisons department to stop referring to a temporary New Orleans jail as "Camp Greyhound."

The Greyhound bus station in New Orleans was converted into a makeshift jail by police trying to restore law and order in the days after Hurricane Katrina hit.

"Greyhound called us on Friday and asked us not to refer to it as Camp Greyhound anymore," said Pam Laborde, communications director of Louisiana's department of corrections.

DOJ_NMG_0005321

Laborde said the jail would now be known as Angola South. Those in the temporary jail include criminals that took part in the crime spree after the hurricane and some prisoners from the state's maximum-security Angola prison.

As Congress Reviews What Went Wrong, It Finds Itself In Disarray (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — When a Senate committee opens hearings today on what the government did wrong in response to Hurricane Katrina, there will be a conspicuous absence at the witness table: No one who actually handled the disaster will be there.

Hesitant to interfere with relief operations in the storm-ravaged South, lawmakers in Washington will be left to grill veterans of past disasters. That is emblematic of how hard it is for Congress to grapple with the calamity that has washed away much of the rest of its legislative agenda.

The hurricane is testing Congress' ability to do something that the lumbering institution is ill-equipped to do: move quickly and decisively on a huge, bipartisan project.

In their early response, members of Congress instead have been doing what seems to come more naturally: spending lots of money, hurling partisan insults and holding hearings — even if the most pertinent witnesses cannot attend.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) has decried the lack of focus in Congress' response so far and called on GOP leaders and the White House to do more to set priorities among the ideas, bills and hearings flowing through the Capitol.

"I have been extremely concerned about this because I think we are going to wake up six months from now or three months from now and realize that a haphazard approach has not been effective either in resolving the problems in the Gulf Coast or in managing the taxpayers' money effectively," Gregg said Monday on the Senate floor.

Sharing those concerns, Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) has prepared a letter to President Bush urging him to put a coordinator in charge of overseeing spending on the recovery effort. "Who's going to manage and help Congress decide what to fund?" he asked in an interview. "Conventional approaches are going to cause total chaos. If we leave it up to committees, if we leave it up to individual claimants telling us what they need, we're in for a real mess."

Republican leaders have tried to coordinate plans for investigating what went wrong in the hurricane response by proposing a joint House-Senate committee. But even that has not gotten off the ground, because Democrats have objected that it would be stacked in favor of Republicans and prone to cover up rather than investigate the Bush administration's mistakes.

Senior GOP aides and administration staffers began meeting last week to plan longer-term policy for rebuilding the damaged region. But that has not stopped lawmakers from offering their own ideas in the meantime.

"It's hard to be patient when you are flat on your back," said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.). "But we've also got to make sure our leadership pulls us together to coordinate our efforts."

The situation underscores how thoroughly the Katrina aftermath has challenged and changed Congress' rhythms. Republicans who run Congress, not usually inclined to draft grand government designs, are being asked to consider new aid to thousands of displaced people. Two political parties so polarized that they can hardly agree on the time of day are being asked to come together to rebuild a city.

The short- and long-term policy questions that now dominate are a far cry from Congress' more routine ideological issues, such as abortion and Social Security, where lawmakers tend to hew to party lines.

"They are not used to serious oversight or real deliberation," said Thomas Mann, an expert on Congress at the Brookings Institution. "It's all, 'Are you with the president or against him?' "

For members of Congress representing the devastated area, the debate is immediate and personal. Lott waxed literary when he spoke Tuesday about the cleanup of his home state. "These are times that try men's souls," he said on the Senate floor.

Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) also bore witness, bitterly denouncing the Federal Emergency Management Agency — as well as the bickering and partisanship he hears in Congress' debate over the hurricane's fallout. "I saw horrific scenes in the days after the storm. I smelled sweltering stench. But what I sometimes hear coming out of Washington was far more sickening."

At the same time, House members and senators from the region are being treated to acts of kindness on Capitol Hill. Dozens of senators directed their staffs to help Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.), whose office installed six extra phone lines to handle the deluge of calls seeking help. Other Senate offices sent meals to her staff, which was working around the clock. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) personally delivered lobster rolls; Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) sent salmon.

Delegations from the gulf region will be asking soon for far more from their colleagues. In a bipartisan House-Senate enterprise, lawmakers from the area are compiling a wish list of what aid their states need.

At least nine committees and subcommittees have planned hearings this week on Katrina-related subjects, including the effectiveness of hurricane forecasting, housing programs for hurricane victims and the role of private charities. The broadest inquiries into the government response are being held today by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee and Thursday by the companion House panel. But those committees' chairmen said they would not call any of the frontline officials of FEMA or state and local agencies to testify, at least for now, because that would detract from relief efforts.

Instead, the Senate panel will hear from officials with experience handling major disasters, including former California Gov. Pete Wilson, who was in office during the 1994 Northridge earthquake. Lawmakers will ask for advice about what initial aid the government should provide in the wake of the hurricane.

A bipartisan delegation of about 20 senators will be touring the region at the end of this week. In the House, however, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has been discouraging lawmakers from taking trips for fear they will get in the way of rescue efforts.

Lawmakers are also finding ways to recast their own legislative priorities in terms of hurricane response. Republicans say, for example, that the damage caused to the nation's energy supply strengthens their argument for opening more of Alaska's wilderness to oil and gas exploration. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), a longtime foe of trial lawyers, is pushing a bill that would limit lawsuits against people who volunteer to help hurricane victims.

The intensity of Congress' focus on hurricane relief was plain as the Senate tried Tuesday to finish work on a routine appropriations bill. It was slowed by a flurry of amendments to provide additional funding for the battered region, including a $1-billion plan to aid law enforcement agencies through a program that Republicans want to abolish.

That proposal did not pass. Republican leaders urged restraint until a broader package could be developed, a view supported even by lawmakers whose constituents stood to benefit.

"We need to approach hurricane funding needs in a coordinated manner, not in an ad hoc" way, said Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.).

Parties Remain Split On Panel (RC)

By Mark Preston

Roll Call, September 14, 2005

Congressional Republicans vowed Tuesday to move forward with their plan to form a bicameral committee to examine the response to Hurricane Katrina, even as Democrats were making it clear that launching such a joint investigation would be impossible without their blessing.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) noted in an interview that such a committee can be created only by legislation and GOP leaders would need his party's support for it to be approved in the Senate.

Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) continued their call for an independent commission to investigate the matter. But the two Democratic leaders added that if Republicans insist on forming a bicameral committee, there needs to be equal representation between the two parties on the committee and that Democrats should have the authority to issue subpoenas. GOP leaders first proposed creating the panel last week.

But Republicans said they planned to follow historical precedent, which dictates the ruling party maintain a majority and full control on such panels.

Further complicating matters is Democrats admitted unease with entrusting House Republican leaders with the responsibility for leading a comprehensive investigation of the Bush administration on this matter, yet another sign of the bitter relations that exist between the two political parties.

"We are going to do the oversight hearing, that is our responsibility," said Senate Republican Conference Chairman Rick Santorum (Pa.), who chastised "some" Democrats for "trying to exploit everything for a political advantage."

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) was equally harsh in characterizing Congressional Democrats' alleged motivations and said he hoped rank-and-file Democrats would "reject the blind partisanship of their leaders."

"They have decided not to participate [in the joint committee] for partisan political reasons," he said at his weekly meeting with members of the media. DeLay echoed Santorum's suggestion that the GOP was moving forward with the plan, even if the Democrats chose not to participate.

Reid said he would not yield on the issue of giving Republicans the sole power to issue subpoenas.

"Why don't we just have the [House and Senate] Homeland Security committees hold joint hearings?" Reid said. "Other than that, the only thing I will agree to is an equal number of Democrats and Republicans [serving on the committee] and they both having the power of subpoena."

While not using the word filibuster, Reid did allude to the minority party's power in the Senate to block legislation when told of Republicans' plans to move forward with the bicameral committee.

"They can't do that," he said flatly. "It takes legislation. We still have a democracy around here. The American public is not going to accept this."

But Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) suggested that Democrats should fully consider the consequences before outright refusing to participate in the panel.

"I think if an effort is made to accommodate them and they still continue to refuse to participate, I think that could backfire on them," Lott said.

In place of the bicameral committee, Democrats are advocating for the creation of an independent commission — similar to the 9/ll commission — to investigate the poor emergency response of local, state and federal officials to Hurricane Katrina.

"If we don't get an outside commission to do this, I think the American public will believe it was flawed," said Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.). "They will see on television, in the hearings, cheerleading and attack-dogging. The American people, at the end of the day, want to know what went wrong and what went right. I don't think in this partisan environment you can get that done."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) was expected to present Reid with a new proposal on the makeup of the bicameral committee Tuesday night, sources said. It is not clear what Frist was offering, but sources said it would not be a 50-50 split on the panel. And Hastert told reporters Tuesday afternoon, he planned to speak again with Pelosi about the issue.

There is hope among at least some key Republicans and Democrats that the issue will eventually be resolved.

"I am confident in the end we are going to be able to reach an agreement that would allow the joint committee to go forth," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), the chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), too, said he "had confidence that Sen. Frist and Sen. Reid are going to work out the bipartisan investigation."

House Republicans could name their co-chairman for the bicameral committee as early as this week, setting in motion the task of selecting Members to serve on the panel. Senate Republicans have already chosen Collins to serve as their senior representative on the bicameral committee.

Panel Vote Will Test Loyalty (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, September 14, 2005

The House is moving closer to a vote on a GOP plan that would create a joint committee to investigate the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, presenting Republicans with a potentially difficult vote to support a plan Democrats have derided as a political sham.

The vote is shaping up to be an intense test of party loyalty.

Democrats have called instead for an independent commission to examine government failures in the aftermath of Katrina.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said yesterday that Democrats' refusal to participate in the joint committee did not worry him.

"No one is rejecting Democrats," DeLay said. "We will go forward. I think they will be incredibly embarrassed if they don't participate because you will find that the committee will be an objective committee, doing its responsibility and really looking at everything."

The floor vote could come as early as tomorrow. The debate on the measure is expected to be fierce, continuing the partisan fireworks that have intensified in the wake of Katrina.

Democrats, meanwhile, were confident that their members would vote against the joint committee. A spokeswoman for House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) said that Democrats would not need to whip the vote to ensure unity in the caucus.

"There is already unified opposition to the committee as proposed by Republicans and support for an independent commission similar to the 9-11 commission," the spokeswoman said.

In the upper chamber, Sen. David Vitter (R-La.), who represents a state heavily damaged by the hurricane, appeared to criticize both the Democrats' refusal to take part in the joint committee and the Republicans' decision not to back an independent commission.

"I saw horrific scenes in the days after the storm. I smelled sweltering stench," Vitter recalled in a floor speech. "But what I sometimes heard coming out of Washington was more sickening: ridiculous arguments tying the suffering to the war in Iraq and the … deficit, talk of boycotting bipartisan hearings and stonewalling independent commissions."

Both Vitter and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) have called for an end to the partisan infighting that rapidly spread across the Hill regarding how to investigate the lapses in the federal, state and local responses to the storm.

Vitter yesterday called for an independent commission to oversee the tens of billions of dollars Congress has approved for the reconstruction effort along the Gulf Coast following Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0005324

"The very same agencies that failed us will lead to more failure. We need a Katrina reconstruction commission headed by a no-nonsense, nonpolitical businessman manager so that we will all have something lasting to show for this enormous spending," he said.

On the House side, the parties continued to trade barbs over the planned joint committee.

DeLay said in his weekly briefing with reporters that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and their respective staffs initially reached out to congressional Democrats when they were formulating plans for the joint committee.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) characterized the contact differently, saying Monday that her office had been informed several hours before Republicans publicly announced it but that House Democrats had not been consulted.

The Senate has no immediate plans to vote on the joint committee. Although few details of the panel's proposed structure have been released, it is expected to include the chairmen and vice chairmen of several standing committees in Congress. Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) has been named as the Senate co-chair. No corresponding House co-chair has yet been named. As with other congressional committees, it would be controlled by Republicans.

As Republicans pressed forward with the joint committee, Democrats were readying a relief package for the immediate needs of the Gulf Coast residents, including proposals aimed at providing food, housing and income. They expect to unveil the package today or tomorrow.

Many of the elements of the package will be familiar legislative initiatives backed by Democrats. It is also likely to include actions that can be taken independently by the administration.

Democratic strategists spoke approvingly of Democrats' handling of the fallout from the administration's poor response to the disaster, although they said it was too soon to say whether the situation would benefit Democrats in the long term.

"The real test is whether or not in 10 months the public is really willing to make a judgment on who's in control" on the response to Katrina, Democratic consultant Matt Angle said.

Pelosi was the first to call for Congress to return early from the August recess to authorize money for Katrina relief, which it eventually did. She demanded that former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown be fired; he resigned Monday after having been removed from Katrina relief efforts. She and other Democrats have forcefully called for greater oversight of the disaster-relief funds.

A spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) could not be reached for comment.

9/11 Panel Says U.S. Hasn't Enacted Crucial Reforms (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

Four years after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the federal government has failed to enact crucial homeland security reforms that could have saved lives and improved the sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina, according to a report to be issued today by former members of the Sept. 11 commission.

Local emergency officials are still unable to reliably communicate with one another during disasters, the federal government has no clear system of command and control for responding to a crisis, and authorities have faltered in enacting basic border controls designed to keep out terrorists, according to the report's findings, which commission members outlined in interviews.

A separate commission report released yesterday provided chilling details about the Federal Aviation Administration's assessment as early as 1998 that al Qaeda might try to fly a jet into a U.S. landmark.

"In 1998 and 1999, the FAA intelligence unit produced reports about the hijacking threat posed by [Osama] Bin Ladin and al Qaeda, including the possibility that the terrorist group might try to hijack a commercial jet and slam it into a U.S. landmark," according to the report, which was a new version of a more heavily edited document released earlier this year.

But, the report added, the FAA viewed the possibility as "unlikely" and a "last resort."

Thomas H. Kean (R), the former New Jersey governor who headed the panel that investigated the terrorist attacks, said the bungled response to Katrina laid bare how unprepared the nation remains for a catastrophic event, whether it is another terrorist strike or a natural disaster.

"This is not a terrorist incident, but it brings into play all of the same issues and shortcomings," Kean said. "What makes you mad is that it's the same things we saw on 9/11. Whoever is responsible for acting in these places hasn't acted. Are they going to do it now? What else has to happen for people to act?"

Lawmakers and the Bush administration are in the midst of a partisan debate over whether an independent panel akin to the Sept. 11 commission should be formed to study missteps that left tens of thousands in New Orleans and along the Gulf

Coast stranded without assistance after Katrina. More than 640 deaths have been confirmed from the Aug. 29 storm and its aftermath.

Congressional Republicans have proposed a special committee to investigate the Katrina response, but many Democrats support the idea of an independent commission. The Bush administration, which also resisted formation of the Sept. 11 panel, has signaled that it does not support a separate Katrina commission.

The Sept. 11 commission is technically disbanded and is now operating as the nonprofit 9/11 Public Discourse Project. It has held a series of hearings in recent months to examine the government's progress in enacting recommended reforms.

Congress and the Bush administration have embraced many of the major changes recommended by the Sept. 11 panel in its best-selling 2004 report, such as creation of an intelligence director to coordinate anti-terrorism and anti-espionage efforts.

But Kean and other commission officials fault Congress and the administration for proceeding too slowly on some changes and ignoring others altogether, including a recommendation that Congress restructure the way it handles oversight of homeland security issues. Today's findings will be the first of three reports to be issued in coming months, followed by an overall "report card" that will rank the government's progress at the end of the year.

Kean and other commission officials said the most serious oversights are those that might have helped in the response to Hurricane Katrina.

The commission's report will note that lawmakers, facing opposition from the broadcast industry, have not established a unified emergency communications system by dedicating a portion of the broadcast spectrum to medical and disaster responders.

As on Sept. 11, when malfunctioning radios contributed to deaths in the World Trade Center, public safety officials in New Orleans have reported widespread communications problems.

"The fact that Congress has chosen not to do something about this is a national scandal that has cost lives," Kean said.

Other shortcomings that will be highlighted by today's report include delays by the Department of Homeland Security in ranking potential transportation and infrastructure vulnerabilities, continuing confusion over the line of command to be followed in national emergencies, and sluggish efforts to track visitors entering and leaving the United States.

The panel's follow-up investigation also has found that only a few of the nation's 441 commercial airports have deployed equipment to check passengers for explosives, despite the continued threat of attack by suicide bombers.

"The White House and the Congress took off with the baton . . . but they haven't finished running the race," said commission member Timothy J. Roemer, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana. "The fundamental job of the government is to protect and defend its citizens, and at this point the United States is still very vulnerable."

Some Steps Congress Can Take To Prevent Another Katrina (RC)

By Norman Ornstein

Roll Call, September 14, 2005

Last week, I took Congress to task for its four-year-long failure to deal with lapses in the communications system that became evident on Sept. 11, 2001, as well as for Congress' failure to provide any effective oversight in homeland security and disaster response, especially its failure to provide adequate scrutiny at the time the Department of Homeland Security was created. In this column, I want to provide some suggestions for what to do now.

But before I get there, I have to address another area of embarrassing failure on the part of Congress (once again): the continuity issue.

For years after 9/11, Congress dithered on the question of how to make sure the legislative branch could be quickly reconstituted after a devastating attack. It finally responded with a bill to mandate quick elections if 100 House Members were killed. Before the August recess, the House bludgeoned the Senate into accepting its accelerated elections bill, without a hearing or any feedback or scrutiny, by attaching this substantive piece of legislation — one imposing an unfunded mandate on states and localities with no federal spending involved — to an appropriations bill.

Procedurally, this was offensive. Substantively, the bill is woefully inadequate. To illustrate, let us use the Hurricane Katrina situation as a template.

Imagine that what happened in Louisiana and Mississippi had happened more widely — say, a series of terrorist attacks causing mass havoc in 10 states, not two or three, with all or most of their lawmakers killed in one of the attacks on the Capitol. What would happen under this law? Louisiana and Mississippi would have had to have chosen the candidates for all their seats days ago — even as rescue operations continued, with all officials mobilized every minute of every day to provide basic services, and with the states coping with hundreds of thousands of evacuees.

Election officials would have then had basically until the end of this month to get all the polling places ready to go, print ballots or prepare their electronic machines (all assuming there is electricity to run them) and the candidates would have to have begun to run their campaigns. Oh, one other "technicality": voters would have to be home to cast their ballots. Or found, very quickly, to cast absentee ballots (which would have to be printed in the days after the candidates were selected. Maybe at the local Kinko's — oops, it's under water). And voter registration records, in some cases also under water, would have to be uncovered to make sure that the voters were voting in the right districts — including voters without any ID.

This is the core of Congress' response to the terrorist threat to governing institutions, and it is farcical.

Now on to a road map for dealing with some of the broader problems. First, communications. It should be an urgent priority for Congress to carve out an adequate spectrum for public safety and first responders. In other words, no more dithering, no more puppets on the string of broadcasters. It does not take a lot of spectrum space to make this happen — a mere 24 Mhz out of the 700 Mhz band now used by broadcasters for their analog signals, which should be coming to a swift conclusion anyhow. We need a date certain, and a rapidly expedited date.

In the meantime, Congress should provide backing for the Federal Communications Commission's desire to free up some of the unused spectrum that now provides "white space" between broadcast channels — space which, given new technology, can be used without interference and can supplement the airwaves now used by emergency responders. This white space also can provide unlicensed opportunities for low power local transmissions to enable citizens and emergency responders to communicate after a catastrophe and to get up and running quickly if their equipment takes a hit. The commercial broadcasters have tried to beat the drums against this use, but virtually every major independent expert, including those at the FCC, has challenged them. This set of issues should no longer be in the usual realm of power politics, where the National Association of Broadcasters has long reigned supreme, but rather in the realm of urgent public priority.

In addition, Congress also needs to step in to mandate that all first responders have interoperable radio equipment, and equipment that can be easily replaced and recharged.

Two other issues need to be addressed. One is the structure of Congress itself as it deals with homeland security and the response to attacks or catastrophes.

Congress did implement many of the recommendations of the 9/11 commission. But one area where it fell short, to no big surprise, was its own capacity. The House changed its homeland security panel into a permanent standing committee, but did not give it adequate jurisdiction. Not much can or will be done about this problem immediately. But as Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and the majority Republican leadership move now to name a chairman for the committee to replace the excellent Rep. Christopher Cox (R-Calif.), it should put a premium on choosing a strong chairman who will not hesitate to take on other chairmen in turf battles, and most importantly will see oversight of the DHS as a noble and critical function. There are several good choices, but one to keep in mind is Rep. Dan Lungren (R-Calif.), a strong conservative who understands the need for an independent Congress and Congressional role.

As for the Senate, it is ridiculous not to give its homeland security committee jurisdiction over the Coast Guard, which Katrina is showing to be a critical piece of the homeland security puzzle.

The other issue is the distribution of homeland security funds to states and localities. There is not enough money available for first responders — period. But the money that is available is misallocated, with the usual desire to give every district a piece of the pie reigning supreme.

There are some commendable formulas being debated out there. But in the end, if Congress is left to its own devices, and if the small states that dominate the Senate and its homeland security panel exert themselves, we will fritter away a lot of money and leave the most vulnerable areas inadequately protected. That includes areas most vulnerable to natural disasters as well as terrorist attacks.

I think it is time to consider the Base Realignment and Closure Commission model for this important need. We all owe former Rep. Dick Armey (R-Texas) a vote of thanks for establishing the framework for dealing with base closings. It is imperfect, to be sure, but Armey found a good way to get bases closed while retaining a real role for Congress and protecting it against its worst parochial instincts. A parallel approach could work for allocating first-responder funds, hopefully channeling the money more efficiently to where it is most needed.

Of course, that alone is not enough. States and localities also waste a lot of the money they get, sending it within states to all counties when some are far more vulnerable than others, and using some of the money for comparatively frivolous items. Congress should tie the grant of these monies to states with state plans that use models similar to BRAC to allocate their funds fairly, judiciously and efficiently.

400 N.Y. Court Volunteers Set To Aid Hurricane Victims (LAW)

By Thomas Adcock, New York Law Journal

Law.com, September 14, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005327

New York's Unified Court System has organized a stand-by contingent of up to 400 volunteer court officials to help the devastated legal communities of Louisiana and Mississippi, the two states hardest hit last month by Hurricane Katrina.

In light of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Chief Judge Judith S. Kaye said Monday, "We have very special expertise, sad to say. We know what it's like to have courtrooms brought to a standstill. We lived it -- those unforgettable days and weeks when we had to figure out so many things for the first time."

The volunteers, most veterans of 9/11, are set to offer emergency help in such areas as court security, records recovery, voice and data communications, computer networks and the creation of temporary court sites.

"I'm amazed. Everybody wants to do something," Kaye said Monday in a phone interview from Albany. "The e-mails just keep coming to me."

The New York volunteers -- as well as commitments of equipment and money through a specially created relief fund -- have been registered with the State Emergency Management Office in Albany. Registration enables disaster-impacted states to quickly request specific assistance from other states, in accordance with the Interstate Emergency Management Assistance Compact, a federal program begun in 1996 when then-Florida Governor Lawton Chiles was unhappy with government response to Hurricane Andrew.

Ronald Younkins, chief of operations for the Office of Court Administration, said that Gulf Coast court officials are currently assessing damage to their facilities and conducting a census of their scattered personnel.

"As soon as they're ready to have us, we'll deploy people and materials," he said. "Right now, we have team leaders in place just waiting to hear the word."

In addition to volunteers, the following New York assets were registered as available to the courts of Louisiana and Mississippi:

· 50 law enforcement personnel to help with courthouse and courtroom security and handling prisoners.

· Assorted technical equipment, including 10 magnetometers, 20 hand-scanners, 10 rechargeable search lanterns, 72 heavy-duty flashlights and 1,500 light sticks.

Kaye said sending the personnel and resources to the Gulf Coast will not have any negative repercussions at home.

"We may not have a large cadre of people actually go down, so I don't think it's going to be a drain on us or negatively impact our resources," she said. "At the first level, what I hope is that it's going to be a solace to people there that we have so many eager to help."

When Katrina struck the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, Kaye called on three top deputies -- Younkins from OCA; Lawrence K. Marks, OCA's administrative director; and Chief Administrative Judge Jonathan Lippman -- to begin assessing which people and what assets could be available for dispatch to the region.

In addition, the trio informed their Southern counterparts of cash grants available through the "UCS Katrina Courts and Families Recovery Fund," modeled on a fund created after 9/11 that raised about $350,000 to aid New York court personnel and their families. (Contributions to the UCS Katrina Fund may be sent to OCA at 25 Beaver Street, 11th floor, New York, N.Y., 10004.)

On Friday, Kaye was advised that the legal systems of Louisiana and Mississippi were in shambles. In an internal report, Lippman wrote of those states: "Countless judges and court employees and their families have been dislocated from their homes. ... [S]ome court personnel are reported missing, and many courthouses have been destroyed, damaged or flooded."

While Alabama officials said courts there had "escaped relatively unscathed," according to Lippman's report, the destruction elsewhere along the Gulf Coast is incalculable.

"[T]he Mississippi court system was not prepared for the severity of the hurricane and has been brought to its knees," Lippman wrote. "Communications have been virtually nonexistent. As a result, they are unaware at this time whether any court personnel are among the dead and missing."

In Louisiana, court officials in the capital of Baton Rouge are "still very much in the dark as to the condition of the courthouses located in the affected regions," Lippman wrote, "since they have been unable to gain access ... to assess the damage, including, for example, to the Supreme Court, which is located in downtown New Orleans."

Lippman said Louisiana officials do not yet know the number of displaced or deceased court employees, but that they do know that 10 of the 12 judges who sit on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals are without homes.

Since recovery of legal systems in Louisiana and Mississippi hinge on retrieving or recreating vital documents, the New York court official most likely to head south is Rick Hogan, OCA's chief records manager.

"We've done this kind of work before," he said, referring to 9/11, "but nothing on this scale."

Last Tuesday, Hogan began researching court rules and regulations in Louisiana and Mississippi with respect to record-keeping in order to prepare for the massive restoration task.

DOJ_NMG_0005328

"Louisiana actually has a pretty robust system of records preservation," he said, citing procedures for backing up paper records via microfilm and digital archives. "You don't necessarily find that in every state, and it will help in our efforts if we're called."

As for paper records still underwater, he added, "If they're not mush, to some degree they're in a better situation than 9/11 when things were blown up."

Hogan said water-damaged paper would first be preserved by freezing, then put through any of several chemical processes to restore ink images.

"It's actually pretty fascinating," said Younkins, who expects to travel south with two to three assistants and a supply of latex gloves, masks and tweezers for peeling apart stuck pages. "Talk about hands on. We really are."

Louisiana Governor Blasts FEMA Over Recovery Of Bodies (KRT)

By Thomas Fitzgerald And Joyce Tsai

Knight Ridder, September 14, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. - Blasting federal officials for a "lack of urgency and lack of respect," Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said Tuesday that the state would seize control of the task of recovering the bodies of Hurricane Katrina victims.

"In death, as in life, our people deserve more respect than they have received," Blanco told reporters before convening a cabinet meeting.

She accused the Federal Emergency Management Agency of causing delays because the agency had failed to sign a contract with the firm hired to collect corpses and was not providing enough support for the firm's crews.

FEMA spokesman David Passey responded that body recovery has always been the state's job, and federal authorities were in charge of body identification. "I can't explain the disconnect," he said.

The latest round of finger-pointing came over a particularly sensitive issue, as floodwaters continued to recede in New Orleans, opening access to some of the areas hardest-hit by the storm.

As recently as Monday afternoon, in the Lower 9th Ward of New Orleans, a woman's corpse was hung up on a cyclone fence, her arms outstretched as if she had been caught running from something. Another body lay face down in the muck in a yard a couple of blocks away.

Blanco said she signed a state contract with Kenyon International Services, an expert body-recovery firm, after it threatened to pull out of the state because it did not have a formal contract with FEMA.

Kenyon crews have been on the ground since last week, when FEMA brought the firm in under a verbal agreement to assist in recovery efforts, Passey said. The agency, he added, offered the company a contract.

"Kenyon chose for their own reasons not to sign a contract," Passey said. He said the federal government's disaster-mortuary teams specialize in identifying bodies through fingerprinting, photography, personal effects, digital dental X-rays and DNA.

Kenyon officials did not return phone calls seeking comment.

Kenyon technicians come in after search-and-rescue teams and military personnel identify locations of bodies. Kenyon workers then transport the bodies to FEMA's mortuary teams in the town of St. Gabriel, where the agency has established a makeshift morgue.

Further complicating the body recovery, Passey said, is the desire of some parishes to recover bodies in their own jurisdictions.

"That's their prerogative," he said. "We're here to support the state and the local government."

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said that door-to-door searches for bodies should be complete by the end of the week.

Pace Of Corpse Recovery Draws Rebuke (LAT)

By Josh Meyer And Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. — As Hurricane Katrina's victims continued to decompose on streets and inside homes, Louisiana's governor lashed out Tuesday at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, saying its failure to recover the dead has forced the state to hire its own contractors to do the job.

"In death as in life, our people deserve more respect than they have received," Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said at a news conference here, flanked by state elected officials.

"No one, even those at the highest level, seems to be able to break through the bureaucracy to get this important mission done," Blanco said. "I am angry and outraged."

DOJ_NMG_0005329

Representatives of Kenyon International Emergency Services Inc. of Houston confirmed that they were entering into a long-term contract to provide the state with 100 to 200 contract workers who specialize in recovering bodies from disaster zones. They said the firm rejected a similar request for a contract from FEMA, citing the federal agency's failure to provide adequate support for its operations and other shortcomings.

State and federal officials also said Tuesday that they now believed that a significant number of homicide victims were among the dead, including those killed in post-hurricane violence or in alleged acts of criminal negligence, such as the case of the nursing home owners charged with leaving dozens of elderly patients in Katrina's path.

That will complicate the body recovery effort because local authorities would need to be brought in to gather evidence for possible arrests and prosecutions, the officials said.

But because so many bodies have been left unclaimed and lying out in Louisiana's heat, humidity and fetid waters, it will be virtually impossible to determine how some died, whether they were killed or by whom, said Blanco spokeswoman Denise Bottcher.

"We'll probably never know," she said.

Until now, Blanco, a Democrat, has shied away from criticizing Washington's response to the hurricane since it hit shore more than two weeks ago. The governor said she decided to go public with her criticism after promises from Washington failed to come through, including a pledge from Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, "that plans would be put in place for a system of 'recovery with respect.' "

Blanco accused FEMA and the Department of Homeland Security of botching the recovery effort by hiring Kenyon and then failing to provide it with the resources needed to do the job.

"Yesterday, Kenyon officials told me that if things don't change, they would leave as soon as they could professionally pull out," Blanco said. "While recovery of bodies is a FEMA responsibility, I cannot stand by while this vital operation is not being handled appropriately."

Teams of Kenyon workers have been working alongside FEMA officials since Sept. 7, after playing a similar role after the tsunami in Asia and the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

But Kenyon's temporary contract with FEMA was set to expire Tuesday.

Bill Berry, a Kenyon spokesman, was also critical of the FEMA effort but said the company was trying to stay neutral.

Berry said the situation improved in recent days as Louisiana state officials played a greater role in the recovery effort.

And he said Kenyon workers would continue unabated the grisly task of finding the bloated and often unrecognizable corpses.

From there, the bodies are delivered to refrigerated FEMA trucks set up around the region, and then taken to a makeshift morgue near Baton Rouge so FEMA's Disaster Mortuary Operational Response Teams can try to identify them.

Those identified and claimed by next of kin are then sent back to local mortuaries for burial.

FEMA officials said they were stung by Blanco's comments, and that under mutually arranged disaster plans, the state of Louisiana was responsible for initial recovery of bodies with assistance from the disaster teams.

"The collection of bodies is not normally a FEMA responsibility. Last week, that plan was modified at the state's request," said David Passey, a lead FEMA spokesman for the recovery effort.

According to Passey, state officials said that they were too overwhelmed by the scope of the disaster and that they needed FEMA's help in finding the many bodies hidden in the nooks and crannies of still-flooded homes and other locations.

FEMA agreed, and last week it called in Kenyon on an emergency basis while long-term arrangements could be made, Passey said.

In a statement Tuesday evening, Blanco extended an olive branch of sorts to those involved in the federal rescue effort after receiving a phone call from Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, Washington's newly appointed hurricane recovery czar.

She said Allen called to say the federal government was working hard to quickly recover all bodies and to do so with dignity and respect.

"I deeply appreciate Adm. Allen's sensitivity and understanding and his call to me this afternoon," Blanco said.

Meanwhile, bodies continued to surface in New Orleans, and the official death toll rose to 423. Many of the corpses that had been out on the streets for a week or more continued to decompose in plain sight.

In one of New Orleans' poorest sections, one man was still facedown in the mud on Reynes Street. Another's foot remained tangled in a tree, his torso over a fence at Flood and Johnson streets. And a woman was still tethered to a tree at Claiborne and Lizardi streets in the Lower 9th Ward days after a Times article Saturday described their condition.

Cotton Howell, the York County, S.C., emergency management director who is helping the body recovery operation, said the New Orleans effort appeared to be plagued by problems.

Howell said that according to federal guidelines, the bodies of the dead should not be left outside in the sun or in warm water because they decompose so quickly that it is much harder and more expensive to identify them. Also, he said, they can create health problems.

"They would certainly be brought" inside, Howell said. "That is the No. 1 thing."

Howell said he knew that "FEMA is down there pouring resources every day."

But he said he was troubled by the fact that so many bodies had been left out.

"Even though it is a body, they are still a person," Howell said. "We get them into a morgue facility so we can take care of preserving their dignity. Away from prying eyes, so they can be afforded some respect in death."

Official Vows Investigation Of No-Bid Relief Contracts (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - The inspector general of the Department of Homeland Security said Tuesday that his office had received accusations of fraud and waste in the multibillion-dollar relief programs linked to Hurricane Katrina and would investigate how no-bid contracts were awarded to several large, politically well-connected companies.

The inspector general, Richard L. Skinner, who serves as the department's internal watchdog, said in an interview that he intended to be "extremely aggressive" in monitoring the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which will receive most of the $62 billion in disaster-response financing approved by Congress last week.

FEMA, which is part of Homeland Security, was harshly criticized in recent months as mismanaging millions of dollars in relief funds after a 2004 hurricane in Florida.

Mr. Skinner's remarks came as the secretary of homeland security, Michael Chertoff; Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; and Republican Congressional leaders said Tuesday that they also were concerned about the potential for abuse, given the amount of federal money and private charity committed to the hurricane-relief effort.

Their comments appeared to be a response, in part, to charges from Democratic lawmakers that such a large, hurriedly organized federal relief program could produce the sort of contract abuses, cronyism and waste that numerous investigations have identified in the Bush administration's reconstruction programs in postwar Iraq.

"We are very mindful of this," said Mr. Chertoff, a former federal prosecutor who directed the Justice Department's criminal division earlier in the current administration. "We haven't suspended the laws that govern the way in which people have to behave ethically and legally."

Spokesmen at FEMA have been unwilling to provide details of the decision-making process that is being used to award contracts for the hurricane-relief program, nor have they identified the agency officials who are making the procurement decisions. During the Bush administration, the agency's senior management has included several officials without significant experience in disaster relief, including its former director, Michael D. Brown, who resigned on Monday.

Mr. Skinner, a former acting inspector general of FEMA, would not discuss details of the accusations his office had received in recent days involving hurricane relief projects. But he said he was dispatching about 30 investigators and auditors to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama next week to "focus on prevention, to prevent things from going wrong" in the way the disaster money is spent.

He said that his investigators would focus on several no-bid contracts awarded over the last two weeks to large, politically influential companies, including the Fluor Corporation of California, a major donor to the Republican Party, and the Shaw Group of Baton Rouge, La. Shaw is a client of Joe M. Allbaugh, a consultant who is the former head of FEMA and was President Bush's campaign manager in 2000.

Another of Mr. Allbaugh's clients - Kellogg Brown & Root, a subsidiary of Halliburton, the giant defense contractor once led by Vice President Dick Cheney - is doing major repairs at Navy facilities along the Gulf Coast that were damaged by the hurricane. That work is being done under a $500 million contract with the Defense Department.

Mr. Skinner said he had no reason to believe there was anything wrong with the no-bid contracts, "but we're going to be looking at all of the contracting, the decision-making that was used to determine a sole-source contract."

"We want validation and we want documentation to show that it was rational to go one way or the other" in offering a no-bid contract, he said.

He said his investigators would also closely monitor expenditures on the government-issued credit cards of Department of Homeland Security contracting officials involved in the hurricane relief program. As a result of Hurricane Katrina, Congress last week raised the limit that could be charged on the cards to $250,000 from $25,000, a move that Democratic lawmakers have warned will invite fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0005331

Mr. Skinner said his office had acquired computer software that would allow his investigators to monitor the credit card charges on a daily basis and "flag anything that looks peculiar or extraordinary."

He added, "If we see a credit card purchase of $250,000, we would immediately find out whether it was appropriate."

Under the $51.8 billion hurricane relief bill passed by Congress last week, Mr. Skinner's office was provided with $15 million for investigations related to Hurricane Katrina. That money, when added to the office's regular annual budget of about $82 million, would allow his staff to have a "good start" in preventing abuse resulting from the hurricane relief effort, Mr. Skinner said.

"I'm not saying that's all we're going to need, but it's a good start," he said.

U.S. To Monitor Spending Of Katrina Relief Funds (WSJ)

By Robert Block and Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Amid growing concern in Congress over billions of dollars in federal relief flowing to the Gulf Coast with few controls, the Homeland Security Department will send a team of investigators to the disaster zone to follow the money.

The investigators and auditors from DHS's Office of the Inspector General, the agency's internal watchdog, are part of a growing effort to ensure federal funds are properly distributed in a rescue, relief and rebuilding process. The funds are expected to exceed $100 billion.

DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said that as the effort to save lives winds down, his department will focus on recovery challenges, including ensuring that the contracting process is conducted properly. "We want to get aid to people who need it quickly, but we also don't want to lose sight of the importance of preserving the integrity of the process and our responsibility as stewards of the public money," he said.

Meanwhile, President Bush spoke out again about the federal response to Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath, and in an unexpected concession told reporters at the White House that as president, he bears responsibility for the breakdown, as well.

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government," Mr. Bush said. "And to the extent the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility."

Under fire for the delayed federal relief effort in the Gulf Coast and facing the lowest approval ratings of his presidency, Mr. Bush has scheduled a speech to the nation from Louisiana tomorrow night. It will be his fourth trip to the region since the storm struck two weeks ago.

Appearing with Mr. Chertoff, R. David Paulison, the newly appointed head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said he would study what went wrong with the response effort with an eye to fixing the problems. But, he added, his top priority was finishing rescue operations and finding housing for tens of thousands of storm victims.

"We're going to get people out of the shelters, we're going to move on and get them the help they need," he said in his first public comments since taking the job.

The huge amounts of money at stake in housing and reconstruction contracts are prompting calls for special supervisory efforts. Critics call the spending deluge a disaster-in-waiting if not properly controlled. So far, Congress has approved spending $62 billion in Katrina-related relief efforts. Of $50 billion directed to FEMA, part of Homeland Security, just over $9 billion has so far been spent, FEMA spokeswoman Natalie Rule said.

Many of the normal safeguards to prevent federal contracting fraud have been suspended following Katrina to ensure emergency federal aid gets to victims as soon as possible. Some contracts, including five with emergency housing and construction companies, were awarded hurriedly without undergoing normal competitive bidding processes.

House Foreign Operations Appropriations Chairman Jim Kolbe (R., Ariz.) last night introduced legislation to create a special inspector general charged with monitoring the way the Katrina funds are spent to stave off waste and abuse. The bill has 14 co-sponsors, including 11 Republicans. The new post is designed to replicate the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, Stuart Bowen, who is widely credited with sharply reducing the waste and fraud there.

Health Records Of Evacuees Go Online (WP)

By Jonathan Krim

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

The federal government is making medical information on Hurricane Katrina evacuees available online to doctors, the first time private records from various pharmacies and other health care providers have been compiled into centralized databases.

The data contain records from 150 Zip codes in areas hit by Katrina. Starting yesterday, doctors in eight shelters for evacuees could go to the Internet to search prescription drug records on more than 800,000 people from the storm-racked region.

Officials hope to soon add computerized records from Medicaid in Mississippi and Louisiana, Department of Veterans Affairs health facilities, laboratories and benefits managers.

The records are one step in reconstructing medical files on more than 1 million people disconnected from their regular doctors and drug stores. Officials fear that many medical records in the region, especially those that were not computerized, were lost to the storm and its aftermath.

Although the immediate focus is on urgent care for hurricane victims, participants in the effort say the disaster demonstrates a broader need to computerize individual health records nationwide and make them available throughout the medical system. Such a step could, for example, give emergency room doctors a way to quickly view medical histories for late-night accident victims.

Electronic health records are controversial among many privacy advocates, who fear the data could be exploited by hackers, companies or the government.

Ray Fowler, head of medical relief operations in Dallas, said "it was extremely scary" for doctors to have no records to rely on as thousands of evacuees poured off buses with serious injuries or infections.

Some patients had been on various medications before the hurricane, for conditions such as high blood pressure, but did not know what prescriptions they took, Fowler said.

Currently, roughly 8,000 people are in critical care shelters, while other seriously ill patients are being treated in hospitals outside the Gulf Coast region. But many of the 250,000 evacuees in various shelters also need medical attention.

"We think this could help save some lives," said Dr. David J. Brailer, coordinator of health information technology for the Department of Health and Human Services, who is spearheading the effort.

The system took about 10 days to organize, with daily conference calls involving as many as 60 state and federal officials; emergency medical providers; insurance, pharmacy and medical-software company representatives; and government lawyers.

Participating pharmacies so far include CVS, Rite Aid, Albertsons, Walgreens and Wal-Mart. Expected to be added soon are Winn-Dixie, Kmart and Target.

Brailer said he was concerned throughout the process with privacy issues. Only medical personnel at the various shelters and hospitals treating evacuees will have access to the information.

Federal regulations do not require patient consent for their records to be shared for medical purposes. Companies or organizations that have such data must have formal agreements with each other before data can be exchanged, but the government said it would not enforce those rules while Katrina victims were in need, as long at the entities had verbal agreements to use the data for the relief effort.

"We've been extremely cautious," Brailer said. "There were a lot of things we could have done that we didn't do."

Brailer said in his original vision, the database program would end once evacuees are permanently resettled, either back in their home communities or elsewhere.

Others involved in the effort, however, already are discussing ways to enhance the system and create personal health records for those who might need to move frequently over the next several months. As constructed, the databases do not allow doctors to update the records with information on treatment provided in the shelters.

"We're already preparing for a second wave of victims who have been in hotels but the money is running out," Fowler said.

The Bush administration and the pharmaceutical and technology industries have long argued that standardized, individual electronic health records that can be shared and quickly viewed would improve care and cut costs.

Electronic records also would speed the way for patients seeing different specialists, switching doctors or moving frequently in an increasingly mobile society. And they could be used to identify medical inefficiencies in the public-health system, proponents argue.

Even before the hurricane hit, Brailer's office was preparing to award contracts to create a "national architecture" for electronic records that every player in the medical system could use. The government is not mandating such a system nor will it operate it, Brailer said, but it wants to enable the private sector to do so.

On Monday, Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt named 16 people to a task force to advance the administration's goal of bringing electronic health records to most Americans within 10 years.

None is from a recognized privacy organization, and privacy advocates worry that even beneficial efforts during an emergency can expand beyond the scope of the original crisis.

Sue A. Blevins, founder of the Institute for Health Freedom, a medical-policy think tank, said she supports emergency programs such as the Katrina databases. But she said that "many things are done during a crisis that society normally would not accept."

Blevins opposes national electronic health records for individuals because the Bush Administration eliminated the right of patients to give consent before their health information could be shared under many circumstances.

"When you don't give people the freedom to decide how much information they want to share . . . the only choice they have is to either lie or withhold the information when they want their privacy," she said.

IRS Offers Leave-Donation Plan, Other Steps To Aid Storm Victims (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

The Internal Revenue Service is stepping up efforts to bring relief to Hurricane Katrina victims.

Officials recently disclosed a plan designed to attract more charitable donations to storm victims. The IRS plan encourages employees and employers to participate in so-called leave-based donation programs.

Under such programs, an employee generally gives up unused vacation, sick or personal leave, in exchange for the employer donating the value of that time to charities helping hurricane victims. Tax lawyers say numerous companies are considering offering this leave-donation program soon.

IRS officials say employees don't have to include the value of the donated leave in their taxable income, while employers can claim a tax deduction. The program applies to payments made before the end of 2006 to charities aiding Katrina victims.

"It's likely to lead to millions of dollars of employee donations that might not otherwise have been made," says Mary B. Hevener, a tax lawyer at Baker & McKenzie in Washington.

The IRS announced a similar move late in 2001, after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Officials say they don't have any statistics on how many people signed up to donate time then.

One business that says it's planning to offer such a program is Health Net Inc., a Woodland Hills, Calif., managed-care company. Health Net also is planning to match -- in dollar donations -- whatever employees contribute, a spokesman says. In addition, the company is making direct contributions on its own to charities helping in the recovery effort.

Separately, the IRS extended several key tax deadlines again. For example, shortly after the hurricane struck, the IRS extended the Sept. 15 deadline for estimated-tax payments until Oct. 17. Now, the IRS says the deadline has been extended to Jan. 3, 2006.

The IRS also says it will team up with the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants to offer help to taxpayers at local disaster-recovery centers set up by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. With so many lives disrupted by Hurricane Katrina, "the ability to expand service by using CPA volunteers should help reduce some of the tax issues victims will face," said IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson.

Meanwhile, Congress this week is considering a wide-ranging package of tax proposals aimed at helping the storm-ravaged areas. For example, Sen. Chuck Grassley, an Iowa Republican and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, joined with Montana Sen. Max Baucus, the committee's ranking Democrat, to offer a 17-point plan.

One proposal would waive the 10% penalty for taxable premature distributions from individual retirement accounts and qualified retirement plans for someone whose principal residence is in a federally declared disaster area, according to a Grassley statement. Individuals eligible for this special waiver because of Hurricane Katrina would be allowed to pay income tax on the distributions over a three-year period. Amounts distributed could be recontributed to a qualified retirement plan over the three-year period following the distribution date and receive rollover treatment.

Another proposal generally would allow taxpayers who house Katrina evacuees for at least 60 days in their principal residence to claim an additional personal exemption of $500 per refugee, with a maximum $2,000 deduction. The senators also propose changing the rules on deducting personal casualty losses from Hurricane Katrina. Under current law, taxpayers who itemize can deduct casualty losses only to the extent they exceed 10% of adjusted gross income and a $100 floor. Sens. Grassley and Baucus propose eliminating the 10% floor for casualty losses incurred in the Katrina disaster area.

INTEREST RATES will rise on overdue taxes.

The interest rate on federal tax underpayments by individuals will increase to 7% during the October-December quarter, according to the IRS. That's up from 6% in the July-September quarter.

The new 7% rate will be the highest since the fourth quarter of 2001.

USING YOUR CAR to help out a charity may produce a bigger deduction.

DOJ_NMG_0005334

Under current law, taxpayers who itemize may deduct certain unreimbursed expenses, such as the cost of gas and oil, that are directly related to using their cars in helping charities. Drivers have the choice of deducting certain actual expenses or using the standard mileage rate of 14 cents a mile to figure the contribution. That 14-cent rate is set by statute.

This week, Sens. Grassley and Baucus proposed raising that rate to 50% of the optional standard business mileage rate set periodically by the IRS. "Making the rate flexible by linking it to the business rate takes fluctuations in gas prices into account and will encourage charitable activity," a Grassley statement says.

The IRS recently raised the optional standard mileage rate for taxpayers using their cars for business, but that new rate is effective only for the final four months of this year. The rate will rise to 48.5 cents a mile for all business miles driven between Sept. 1 and Dec. 31 this year, up from 40.5 cents a mile for the first eight months of this year.

The IRS also boosted the rate to calculate deductible medical or moving expenses to 22 cents a mile for the September through December period from 15 cents for the first eight months.

BRIEFS: Amid Washington's focus on hurricane recovery efforts, President Bush's advisory panel on federal tax reform won't issue its report by Sept. 30, as had been planned. "We are having ongoing discussions to determine when the panel's final report will be delivered" to Treasury Secretary Snow, says Tara Bradshaw, a panel spokeswoman. "Given that we have to reschedule our public meetings and we are working to accommodate all our panel members' calendars, a delay of at least 30 days is a fair assessment." ... The IRS Art Advisory Panel, which reviews appraisals of artworks in connection with federal income, estate and gift-tax returns, is scheduled to meet Sept. 21 in Washington.

Separate But Equal? Schooling Of Evacuees Provokes Debate (WSJ)

By Daniel Golden

The 372,000 schoolchildren displaced by Hurricane Katrina are stirring an old debate about whether separate education can really be equal.

A number of states, including Utah and Texas, want to teach some of the dispersed Gulf Coast students in shelters instead of in local public schools, a stance supported by the Bush administration and some private education providers. But advocates for homeless families and civil rights oppose that approach.

At the center of the dispute is whether the McKinney-Vento Act, a landmark federal law banning educational segregation of homeless children, should apply to the evacuees. In addition, because many of the stranded students are black, holding classes for them at military bases, convention centers or other emergency housing sites could run afoul of racial desegregation plans still operating in some school districts.

Separate education for the evacuees is "unconscionable," says Barbara Duffield, policy director for the National Association for the Education of Homeless Children and Youth. "Many states have worked extremely hard to comply with the law and give these kids a regular school experience. The federal Department of Education is seeking to undermine the law at a time when it is most needed."

Students from New Orleans board a school bus at Houston's Reliant Center.

But officials of some states contend that separate classes would be less disruptive to both school districts and displaced families. U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings is expected to ask Congress soon for authority to waive McKinney-Vento and other key education legislation, such as the 2001 No Child Left Behind law, which holds districts and schools accountable for test scores of students in each racial group. Without a waiver, the penalty for violating McKinney-Vento is to deny states the funding they receive under the act for homeless education. Although the act was enacted in 1987, the desegregation requirement was adopted in 1994 and strengthened in 2001.

Susan Aspey, an Education Department spokeswoman, said that "we still don't know" how broad a waiver the secretary will seek and that the secretary plans to be "prudent" in exercising the waiver authority. She also said the department doesn't know how many children have re-enrolled in public schools, how many are being educated separately and how many are awaiting placement. Since it's unclear how long the children will be displaced, she added, the secretary won't be granting waivers "in perpetuity."

Businesses from charter schools to distance-education providers are already pressing for permission to teach the homeless in shelters and other makeshift housing, hoping to gain broader acceptance for their approaches to education. Mark Thimmig, chief executive of White Hat Ventures LLC, which educates nearly 5,000 students in Pennsylvania and Ohio via the Internet, said last week that his company would be eager to educate displaced students in the Astrodome.

After nearly 600 evacuees landed at Camp Williams, a National Guard training center in Utah, officials at the neighboring Jordan school district were ready to bus the children to school. The district, which is 1% black, has more than 75,000 students, including 1,800 homeless pupils.

But Pamela Atkinson, a special consultant to Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., had other ideas. The displaced families had experienced "so much trauma, anxiety and separation" that the parents "wanted their children close by," said Ms. Atkinson. "Since we had classrooms at Camp Williams, it made more sense to keep them there."

She contacted Sen. Orrin Hatch, a Utah Republican, who then asked Secretary Spellings to seek to waive McKinney-Vento. "These displaced and homeless children are not the typical homeless children," Sen. Hatch wrote. "Nearly all of them are with their families. It is important to keep families together as the Katrina victims receive aid and support." The secretary had already made a verbal commitment to Sen. Hatch that she would not enforce McKinney-Vento, according to the letter.

Now, while many families have moved off Camp Williams, about 20 displaced children in kindergarten through 12th grade are studying art, reading and other subjects in classrooms on the base. The state brought in two black educators to advise district teachers on "cultural sensitivity," Ms. Atkinson said. "As long as there's one child at Camp Williams, we will continue to hold that school."

Texas Education Commissioner Shirley Neeley, noting that 25,000 evacuees are housed at a closed Air Force base in San Antonio, asked the federal Education Department last week for "flexibility" to serve students "at facilities where they are housed, or otherwise separate from Texas residents during the 2005-2006 school year." U.S. Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, a Texas Republican, introduced legislation Monday that would grant Secretary Spellings authority to waive McKinney-Vento.

Such proposals are arousing consternation among advocates for the homeless, who fear that nearly two decades of gains in public-school enrollment for homeless children will be wiped out. They note that the act, which also requires school systems to enroll homeless children even without documentation such as health and residency records and to employ liaisons to the homeless, was vital to the swift, open-armed response of school districts to the student influx in the hurricane's aftermath. Also, they say, thousands of storm-battered children have already enrolled in public schools across the country without ill effects.

Gary Orfield, director of a Harvard University project that monitors school integration, said that segregating a predominantly black group of evacuees could raise "constitutional questions of racial discrimination." He also said that because many of them may be traumatized, have learning deficits, or come from failing schools, it would be "terrifically difficult" to teach a separate class of the displaced students, and that placing them in middle-class schools and communities would benefit them educationally.

William L. Taylor, chairman of the Citizen's Commission on Civil Rights, said the administration's plans to ease McKinney-Vento and No Child Left Behind could leave the displaced students warehoused and forgotten. "We need some focus on the needs of the children, and not go around waiving a lot of regulations without deciding whether there's a need," Mr. Taylor said.

Not all states are seeking waivers. Mississippi officials turned down a proposal from a Navy base to hold classes there. Nikisha Ware, a Mississippi Department of Education official, said the law had helped evacuees to enroll in schools without red tape. "If there were no McKinney-Vento," she said, the hurricane "would have created it."

Education Official To Visit North Texas (DMN)

By Robert Dodge, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON – Assistant Education Secretary Tom Luce will meet with North Texas school superintendents today to learn firsthand about the problems local schools face in educating students displaced by Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Luce, a former Dallas lawyer and longtime education advocate, will be accompanied by Texas Education Commissioner Shirley Neeley. They also will visit some of the 90 students and families displaced by the hurricane at Madison High School in South Dallas.

"My No. 1 concern is to try and pick the brains of people on site about how they are dealing with taking students in," said Mr. Luce, who is working with U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings on budget and policy issues related to the department's hurricane relief efforts.

Mr. Luce plans to return to Washington immediately after his meetings but is planning other visits possibly later this week to Houston and Austin. Other education officials visited San Antonio and cities in Louisiana and Mississippi this week.

Mr. Luce said their findings will eventually be part of the department's request to Congress for money to pay for the costs Texas faces for educating students displaced by the hurricane, a number that could reach 60,000. State officials say about 33,000 evacuated students have enrolled in Texas schools so far.

"We are trying to get as much info as possible so we can put together a response package on how the Department of Education can best meet these needs," he said.

Federal Emergency Management Agency officials notified Texas earlier this week that it will reimburse the state for much of its expense. Some of those expenses include portable classroom buildings, mental health counselors and new computers.

Mr. Luce is likely to hear from the superintendents that they need more help to pay for textbooks and additional teachers. He said there probably will be other expenses for opening previously closed school facilities and buying desks and other supplies.

School superintendents are also likely to request that the department relax its enforcement of academic requirements under the No Child Left Behind Act.

Ms. Spellings, who toured schools affected by Katrina last week, has promised to be flexible in enforcing certain provisions of the law but will do so on a case-by-case basis. And Mr. Luce said it was much too early to make those assessments.

"That is not where any of us are right now, not even the school superintendents," he said. "The situation is much too fluid."

Mr. Luce said the department has no timetable for assembling its request to Congress. But he said Ms. Spellings is leading a relief task force that meets twice daily to assess the immediate needs facing schools.

He said he will share success stories from his Dallas trip with districts elsewhere that are struggling to work with hurricane evacuees. Mr. Luce, who was confirmed by the Senate in July, said he already knows many of the superintendents and is expecting to get a candid briefing.

"We will not need much time to get to know each other," he said.

More than 247,000 public and private school students have been displaced and 489 schools have been closed in Louisiana.

And in Mississippi, more than 125,000 students have been forced out of their schools. Officials have closed 226 schools in 30 districts, and almost 30 campuses were destroyed.

Ms. Neeley estimated educating students from the affected states could cost up to $450 million, based on the current average annual cost of $7,500 per public school pupil.

While Congress had already approved some funds for relief, Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, introduced legislation Monday that she hopes will give schools more flexibility in using federal funds.

Her proposal would give the education secretary greater authority to determine what costs should be reimbursed. It also would give the secretary power to relax federal standards for school systems that have taken on substantial numbers of students from other districts and states.

Katrina's Costs Weigh Down Stock Indexes (WSJ)

By Ian McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

Stocks sloshed around in the red as investors focused more on post-Katrina worries than positive economic data collected prior to the devastating hurricane and its aftermath.

Stock indexes started the day up about 3% since the hurricane slammed the Gulf Coast at the end of last month. But rising damage estimates are stoking fears that the economy and corporate profits will be dinged by higher gas prices and lower consumer spending resulting from Katrina.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 85.50 points, or 0.8%, to 10597.44. The tech-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index slipped 0.5%, or 11.08 points, to 2171.75. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dropped 0.8%, or 9.36 points, to 1231.20. Bond prices rose as investors were cheered by lower-than-expected inflation in August, pushing down yields.

"The market has been pretty strong since the storm, so it makes sense that we'd give some gains back," said Andy Brooks, head of stock trading for T. Rowe Price Group Inc. "All this economic data is open to revision post-Katrina."

Indeed, investors shrugged off heartening readings on the economy gathered prior to the hurricane. Despite record oil imports, the U.S. trade deficit unexpectedly narrowed in July, the Commerce Department said[TUE]. Meantime, the Labor Department released data showing that the prices of wholesale goods in the U.S. rose at a slower rate last month[AUG].

Traders' skepticism is likely reinforced with each trip to the pump. Crude futures fell 23 cents, or 0.4%, to $63.11 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, but gasoline futures rose 2.13 cents, or 1.1%, to $1.895 a gallon. The average retail price for regular gas was $2.956 a gallon, said driving club AAA.

Shares of electronics retailer Best Buy Co. were a barometer for investor fears about steep gas prices' effects on consumer spending. Its third-period projections were lower than expected, and shares fell 11% to $44.79 on the New York Stock Exchange.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell and bonds rose. The 10-year Treasury note rose 12/32, or $3.75 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.132%. The 30-year bond rose 17/32 to yield 4.418%.

DOJ_NMG_0005337

The dollar rose. Late in New York, the currency traded at 110.64 yen, up from 110.27 yen, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2270 from $1.2285.

Growth From Katrina Could Hurt Economy Most, Experts Say (KRT)

By Kevin G. Hall

Knight Ridder, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON - A major hurricane devastates the Gulf Coast, dismembers the nation's energy center, sends national gasoline prices to all-time highs and leaves a storied city a toxic tidal pool. Yet there's little impact on the broader economy.

Economists call it a testament to the strength of the U.S. and global economy, which buffered the nation against Hurricane Katrina's damage and should offset any long-term economic ills from the storm.

Oddly enough, Katrina's biggest economic impact may not be the damage it left but the rapid growth it may spark next year when rebuilding begins in earnest along the Gulf Coast. That could fuel a pace of growth that adds to inflationary risks in an already strong economy.

Higher interest rates are the medicine for inflation, and that could lead to higher mortgage rates, which could threaten the nation's housing boom.

"To me, that could well prove a more important issue than the impact of Katrina," said Ken Matheny, a senior economist with Macroeconomic Advisers LLC, an economic forecasting company in St. Louis.

The nation's four-year housing boom has been fueled in large measure by low interest rates and consumer spending that has reduced household savings to nearly zero. The Federal Reserve has been notching up short-term interest rates - now at 3.5 percent. The number of mortgages and levels of consumer credit remain at all-time highs, and some liken the robust U.S. economy to a house of cards that is built on low interest rates. A sharp rise in rates could bring it all crashing down.

"The floodwaters unleashed by Katrina may be receding. But the economic aftershock of the disaster may still lie ahead," said Niall Ferguson, a Harvard University history professor who warns that Katrina may provoke interest-rate hikes down the road that shock the U.S. economy.

For the moment, however, economists are most worried about Katrina's damage to the energy infrastructure. Decreased oil production and damage to refineries has sent gasoline prices soaring to record highs. The cost of heating a home this winter is projected to rise 71 percent in some parts of the nation.

"It undermines growth at the same time that it fans inflation," said Mark Zandi, chief economist for Economy.com, an economic consultancy in West Chester, Pa.

If the price of energy climbs much further, it could set off an inflationary spiral throughout the economy, Zandi said. In such a scenario, rising prices create pressure to raise wages. Consumers spend less, and with declining sales, businesses fire workers or reduce hiring. Higher unemployment leads to even less consumer spending. It's a downward economic spiral.

Energy prices have climbed steadily since late 2004. That has pushed inflation - the rise in prices across the economy - above 3 percent, the top of the comfort zone for most economists.

But core inflation - the rise in prices excluding food and energy - has been surprisingly unaffected. On Tuesday, the Labor Department reported in its Producer Price Index that core inflation in the production of finished goods was unchanged in August. It grew by 0.4 percent in July. Core inflation for both consumer and production prices remains under a 3 percent annual rate.

That suggests that the economy's absorbing higher energy prices.

"It's not leaking into the core inflation rate as it did back in the 1970s," said David Wyss, chief economist for New York-based Standard & Poor's, a credit-rating and research company.

Energy price spikes in the 1970s created stagflation - a stagnating economy with high inflation. But before Katrina struck, the U.S. economy was on pace to grow at about 4 percent this year. Unemployment hovers around 4.9 percent, historically very low. Consumer and business spending are strong and inflation is nowhere near the galloping double digits of the 1970s.

Katrina "rekindles some concerns about inflation," said Wyss, but the U.S. economy depends less on cheap oil than it did during the 1970s. The strong government and private-sector spending expected to finance rebuilding on the Gulf Coast makes "the stagflation part a long shot," he said.

International trade has also softened the blow of higher energy prices. Although global trade has cost Americans jobs in some sectors, cheap imports from China and elsewhere have a deflationary effect. Imported clothing and consumer goods have stayed cheap and offset the higher energy prices.

"For two years, we've seen this tremendous increase in prices, yet the core inflation rate has stayed at 2.3 percent or less and the only explanation for that is globalization means inflation is contained," said Ed Yardeni, an investment strategist with Oak Associates Ltd. in Akron, Ohio. Yardeni also believes higher productivity - more worker output per hour - has resulted in higher savings for companies, which also serves to offset the higher energy prices.

Katrina will clearly have some short-term impact on the broader economy. The U.S. Congressional Budget Office said Katrina might knock U.S. economic growth back by as much as a full percentage point in the second half of this year.

However, economists point to past hurricanes and say reconstruction will bring job-intensive infrastructure projects like levee reconstruction, homebuilding and repairs to damaged highways and bridges.

The good news is that wholesale prices for gasoline and oil on the New York Mercantile Exchange have both returned to pre-Katrina levels - but that's still high. And crude oil, gasoline and home-heating fuel prices are expected to remain high through next year.

The world's supply of oil is nearly matched by global demand, and U.S. refineries couldn't handle any additional oil supplies if they had them, because they are running at full throttle. Another hurricane, a natural disaster elsewhere in the world or a terrorist attack could easily send today's already-high energy prices to punishing levels, sending consumer confidence plunging.

"The combination of three bucks a gallon for gas and what the rest of the country is looking at on TV and hearing about and reading about certainly are not positives," said Ken Goldstein, an economist with The Conference Board, a New York-based organization that publishes a monthly Consumer Confidence Index.

But even before Katrina, gasoline prices were climbing, sparking fears that consumer confidence would fall sharply. Yet the latest confidence index, published Aug. 30, showed it had not.

"We discovered for the umpteenth time that what matters most for most Americans is the labor market," said Goldstein.

As long as employment remains strong, consumers seem likely to continue to spend despite high energy prices.

Energy Costs Fuel Wholesale Inflation (WT/AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

Surging costs for gasoline and other energy products fueled inflation at the wholesale level in August, pressure that is expected to become even more intense when the full effect of Hurricane Katrina is felt.

The Labor Department said its Producer Price Index, which measures inflation before it reaches the consumer, jumped a sharp 0.6 percent in August following an even bigger 1 percent increase in July.

In other economic news, the Commerce Department reported that oil imports reached an all-time high in July and the trade gap with China also set a record. However, the overall trade deficit improved slightly to $57.9 billion as exports rose and imports outside of energy fell.

The PPI report showed that energy prices jumped 3.7 percent in August, led by a 9.5 percent rise in gasoline costs. Natural gas for home use was up 2.5 percent. The energy increases captured in the PPI report occurred before Katrina battered the Gulf Coast, sharply reducing production.

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman and other administration officials touring Gulf Coast energy facilities yesterday expressed concern about potential shortages of natural gas in coming months because the region's production may not recover for months.

Last week, the Energy Information Administration predicted that natural gas prices could soar this winter, including increases of as much as 71 percent in the Midwest, because of the hurricane.

The PPI report showed that aside from energy and food, the so-called "core" rate of inflation showed no increase at all in August, after a 0.4 percent rise in July and a 0.1 percent drop in June.

While rising energy have not yet spilled over into more widespread inflation problems, economists said Katrina is likely to disrupt the benign overall inflation performance.

"Pressure to bump prices up, or levy temporary freight surcharges, will become more intense in September," said Brian Bethune, U.S. economist at Global Insight, a private forecasting firm in Lexington, Mass.

The pre-Katrina inflation reading contained in the PPI showed price pressures were absent outside of energy. Food costs fell by 0.3 percent in July, the fifth consecutive monthly decline, as the price of fruit, eggs and beef all declined. About half of the downward pressure on prices outside of energy in August reflected a 1.3 percent drop in the cost of new passenger cars, the second decline in the past three months.

Analysts are split on whether the Federal Reserve will again raise interest rates at its meeting next week. Some suggest that the Fed may pause to give policy-makers time to assess how much of a jolt the economy will receive from Katrina. Other economists believe the Fed will deliver an 11th quarter-point rate increase out of concern that the higher interest rates are needed to combat rising inflation pressures.

The trade report showed a 2.6 percent improvement over a revised June imbalance of $59.5 billion, which was the second-highest deficit in history. The deficit this year is running at an annual rate of $693.1 billion, 12 percent higher than last year's record of $617.6 billion.

The deficit with China increased by 0.3 percent to a new high of $17.7 billion and is running at an annual rate 29 percent above the same period last year, when the deficit reached a record $162 billion. This year's widening deficit reflects a 55.2 percent surge thus far this year in Chinese imports of clothing and textiles since global quotas were lifted Jan. 1.

With oil prices soaring briefly above $69 per barrel after Katrina struck, analysts believe that America's foreign oil bill will surpass the July record, adding further pressure on the overall deficit.

Producer Prices Increase 0.6% Amid Higher Energy Costs (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-Morales

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

While energy prices soared during the summer, underlying inflation showed signs of stability in the weeks leading up to Hurricane Katrina. Moreover, the U.S.'s trade performance showed signs of improving.

Producer prices for finished goods rose 0.6% in August from July and were 5.1% higher than a year earlier, the Labor Department said. The increase was driven largely by a burst in energy prices, much of which occurred even before the hurricane struck the Gulf Coast, disrupting energy production. Gasoline prices jumped 48% from a year earlier, the Labor Department said.

Producer prices are the prices charged by makers of goods like cars, gasoline and manufacturing equipment.

A separate report showed that the U.S. trade deficit narrowed in July to $57.9 billion. That put it down $1.6 billion from the preceding month, and left it below levels seen at the beginning of the year, a sign that the pace of widening for the deficit might be moderating.

Soaring oil prices were an important subplot in the trade picture. The value of imports fell $1.1 billion to $164.18 billion. The nation's tab for oil surged to $15.3 billion for the month, up from $10.8 billion a year earlier. But the U.S. imported 10.1 million barrels a day during the month, on average, down from 10.5 million barrels a day a year earlier.

Exports rose by $430 million to $106.24 billion, led by increasing shipments of semiconductors, civilian aircraft and cotton.

Companies have had a difficult time passing higher energy costs on to customers. Excluding the volatile food and energy sectors, producer prices were unchanged for the month. The auto sector was a big factor in the modest showing outside of energy. Passenger-car prices fell 1.3% in August, the result of discounting programs by Detroit's Big Three auto makers.

At East Jordan Iron Works Inc., which makes manhole covers, fire hydrants and grates in East Jordan, Mich., most sales are negotiated months in advance with municipalities, and such clients rarely accept last-minute price changes. Moreover, the market for manhole covers has become global in recent years, with low-cost suppliers in places like India now swooping in to snap up business in the U.S.

"We're able to get through increases for smaller deliveries," says Thomas Teske, the company's general manager, "but not for larger customers."

Separately, the Treasury Department said the federal budget deficit narrowed to $353 billion for the first 11 months of the fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30, from $437 billion recorded in the first 11 months of fiscal 2004. Receipts totaled $1.9 trillion, up 14% from the same period in 2004. Outlays so far this fiscal year total $2.3 trillion, up 7% from the same point in the previous year.

With $62 billion already allocated for Katrina relief, the red ink could grow substantially in the new fiscal year which begins Oct. 1.

Also, consumer confidence fell last week as news about the impact of Hurricane Katrina rolled in. According to the ABC News/Washington Post poll, 32% of respondents expressed confidence in the economy, down from 34% the week before and 37% the week before that.

US Federal Reserve Set To Raise Rates Again (FT)

By Andrew Balls

Financial Times, September 14, 2005

The US Federal Reserve is set to press ahead with its campaign of raising interest rates at its meeting next week, in spite of the economic impact of Hurricane Katrina. But there is expected to be intense discussion of whether substantial changes to the wording of the accompanying policy statement are needed.

DOJ_NMG_0005340

Fed officials are reasonably relaxed about the hurricane's impact on national measures of production and consumer spending and employment.

A small dip in the second half of the year is expected to be recovered during the reconstruction effort.

Within the Fed, there is considerable scepticism about the need for the "compassionate" pause in the tightening campaign that some politicians have called for following the devastation in New Orleans and the surrounding region caused by Katrina. An important subject of discussion will be whether the Fed should drop its characterisation of monetary policy as "accommodation" and whether it should maintain its guidance that it is likely to continue raising the federal funds rate at a "measured" pace.

The Federal Open Market Committee has raised rates in quarter point steps at its last 10 meetings, lifting the target for the federal funds rate to 3.5 per cent.Of greater concern is the impact of rising energy prices, particularly the petrol price. Higher oil prices may affect consumer confidence and spending. At a time when there is little spare production capacity or labour market slack, this may also feed into core inflation.

Alan Greenspan, Federal Reserve chairman, speaking at the Fed's Jackson Hole conference last month, said the flexibility of the economy had allowed the US to weather the steep rise in energy prices "thus far", purposely avoiding stating his views on the resilience of consumer spending and the likelihood of higher core inflation.

The market reaction since Hurricane Katrina suggests investors are concerned about the impact of higher energy prices on growth next year. The yield on the two-year Treasury note, which was above 4 per cent in late August, has dipped back below 3.9 per cent.

Data released yesterday showed that US wholesale prices jumped 0.6 per cent in August, owing to higher energy prices before the hurricane, but core consumer prices excluding food and energy were unchanged.

President George W. Bush, in a rare public admission of personal responsibility, yesterday acknowledged that the hurricane had "exposed serious problems in our response capability at alllevels of government, and to the extent that the federalgovernment didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility".

US Trade Deficit Falls To $57.9bn In July (FT)

By Jennifer Hughes

Financial Times, September 14, 2005

Record levels of exports helped shrink the US trade deficit in July, but analysts warned new peaks in energy prices are likely to widen the gap in the months ahead as the cost of imports rises.

Figures from the US Commerce Department showed a deficit of $57.9bn, down from an upwardly revised $59.5bn in June - itself the second highest monthly gap on record.

Exports rose 0.4 per cent to $74.9bn while imports unexpectedly dropped by 0.7 per cent to $164.2bn.

The trade deficit in all petroleum products was a record $18.5bn in July, with crude oil imports worth $15.3bn - also an all-time high. There was a drop in the number of barrels of oil imported but an increase in the price paid for each one.

"The rise in energy prices threatens to result in further widening in the months ahead," said Mitul Kotecha, global head of FX strategy at Calyon.

Michelle Girard, economist at RBS Greenwich Capital, said :"In addition to the spike in oil prices, the volume of energy-related imports will probably rise, as international supplies are used to offset a portion of the domestic production which has been shutdown."

"While this appears to bode well for GDP, the trade balance is likely to resume its worsening trend in coming months," she added

The extra disruptions caused by Hurricane Katrina will not show up until September's data, due for release in November

Exports in July were led by record shipments of industrial supplies and materials such as cotton and steelmaking products, and consumer goods exports also gained.

The fall in imports was the result of a drop in big ticket items, such as aircraft, industrial equipment and computers. Imports of consumer goods also dropped.

The record levels of exports also resulted in a new peak in shipments to Asia, worth $3.6bn. But that was dwarfed by a new record trade deficit with China worth $17.7bn.

Separately, the US Labor Department released figures showing high energy costs pushed up producers' prices by 0.6 per cent in August. But excluding volatile food and energy measures, the producer price index was unchanged from July. The data were collected well before the hurricane, whose effects will become clearer in the September numbers released next month.

Katrina Payday For Land Owner In Tiny Town (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

DOJ_NMG_0005341

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

LULING, La. -- His office is a bar called the Sailfish and the communications system is a pair of balky cellphones, but Jay Roberts strains their batteries to the limit running his impromptu commercial real-estate business.

The phone rings and it's a man representing the Veterans Administration inquiring about the empty Kmart in this boomtown community about 30 miles west of New Orleans. The caller's got 200 workers who need office space.

Too late. That building, outfitted with 46 miles of telephone wire and bursting with desks, now houses 500 State Farm claims adjusters, with room for 400 more. It was leased for a year at $25,000 a month even before the power came back on. "Randy, yeah baby, the Kmart's gone," Mr. Roberts, clad in a T-shirt and tight shorts, yells into the phone. "I got an old Burger King building if you could use that."

The storm has changed practically everything in southeast Louisiana, including the commercial real-estate market. Baton Rouge has been overwhelmed by evacuees and now hosts companies that were flooded out in New Orleans and Jefferson parishes, some 80 miles away.

But for those businesses integral to the cleanup, such as power, insurance and engineering companies, towns closer to the devastation are the hottest properties around. In the early days of Katrina's aftermath, there was nowhere nearer to the action than Luling, which got raked by the western edge of the storm but is largely intact. Even before the streets were clear, logistics teams were combing over the place, snapping up every vacant hotel room and office they could find.

Few have benefited more from this than Mr. Roberts, who has lived in Luling all of his life and assembled a modest real-estate empire even as the town itself struggled. Powerfully built and high-school educated, the 46-year-old Mr. Roberts is a sewer-pipe suppler by vocation. He built a small hotel 2½ years ago. A few months later, he took a flyer on a semiabandoned strip mall with a dead Kmart, picking up the property at a sheriff's sale for $1.5 million, or $3 a square foot.

The Burger King came last year, when a regional operator unloaded about 40 restaurants in the area. Mr. Roberts paid $350,000 for that property. "In my opinion, the prices I paid were strictly the land value, with the buildings and signs thrown in for free," Mr. Roberts said. He predicts the 900-square-foot Burger King will begin life anew as a small office, citing a number of unsolicited offers he's already received.

In Luling, the real-estate mantra of location, location, location is proving true once again. As a staging area for disaster work, Luling, with a permanent population of about 6,000, is close to the ideal. It boasts one of the few working ATMs in the immediate area, has electricity, plenty of gasoline stations and a functioning Super Wal-Mart. Sitting fast on the west bank of the Mississippi River, prestorm Luling had been known primarily for its bulk cargo wharf and for a 1976 ferry crash that killed 78 passengers.

Its commercial district is little more than a few-miles-long strip of hotels and fast-food joints, many down at the heels. That's changing. "By quirk of fate, we're going to reap a lot of economic benefits out of this storm," said Joel Chaisson II, a local state senator and silent partner in some of Mr. Roberts's real-estate ventures.

To underscore that prediction, Mr. Roberts barks out an order to his administrative assistant, who is standing at the far end of the Sailfish Food & Spirits. "Get a sign made up for that empty Burger King out there -- for sale or lease. And get me a sign for my hotel that says, 'No vacancy -- long-term lease.' "

The Sailfish, Mr. Roberts's smallest property, opened in January and may also be his most lucrative, at least indirectly. Even with the power off, the place remained open and Mr. Roberts did his best to make the clientele comfortable, doling out warm beers to hurricane survivors and even smashing in the bar's cigarette machine so stressed evacuees could indulge.

As the days passed, Mr. Roberts snagged provisions from a shuttered local grocery owned by an uncle of a survivor. Mr. Roberts is the landlord of the Sailfish, not its operator, but he keeps a close eye on the kitchen, often whipping up menu items himself, including the huge pots of white beans he began making after the hurricane in a big propane-fired cooker out back. The food was free in those days, though Mr. Roberts repeatedly admonished patrons to generously tip the overwhelmed staff.

The fare became more elaborate after the power returned, like the recent gumbo he oversaw, a dark, savory concoction that drew raves. As with almost everything else, his culinary skills are self-taught. "I've never followed a recipe in my life," Mr. Roberts says.

Mr. Roberts's largess and ingenuity paid off: Sitting in a sea of storm-shuttered fast-food franchises, the Sailfish became the only place for folks to congregate over drinks and food, the preferred milieu for a Louisiana business deal. The Sailfish also became the only reliable place to see Mr. Roberts, as well as the state senator who provides introductions, the parish president (who can issue business permits) and the local judge (who operates a hotel outside the parish).

Two days before Katrina hit, Joe Green, an assistant manager for administrative services for State Farm Insurance in Tulsa, Okla., was watching a weather report when it became apparent he and his nine-man crew were about to enter a race toward the storm. Mr. Green's job is to set up the company's catastrophe, or "cat," office near the epicenter of major disasters.

Mr. Green drove for three days, splitting the team in half to scour Louisiana and Mississippi on a desperate search for office space and hotel rooms.

At almost every turn, the team found itself competing with nimble electric company crews, who were after the same commodity. Mr. Green blew into the Sailfish the day after the storm, having been directed there by the local Wal-Mart manager. Mr. Roberts was inside and the negotiations began. The Kmart went for $25,000 a month, plus an upgraded climate system, for which State Farm is paying.

Mr. Green initially got beat on the 30 hotel rooms that Mr. Roberts owns next door to the Sailfish. But after working a complicated swap involving the sprucing up of an independent motel down the street, Mr. Roberts managed to pawn the power crews off to his competitor, taking the more lucrative State Farm deal.

The independent hotelier ended up with steam-cleaned carpets, new linens and a clientele that pays twice the normal $30 nightly rate. Mr. Roberts in turn, inked a one-year State Farm deal: all the rooms at $89 a night -- a premium over the $49 rate the hotel usually commands. "Jay's the ultimate landlord: He helps me with everything and he's indispensable in a town like this," Mr. Green says.

Dreams Are Emerging Of A 'new' New Orleans — But Which One? (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, September 14, 2005

Three days after the New Orleans flood walls broke on Aug. 29, a visit to his hometown left Harry Connick Jr. feeling desperate.

"It is hard to sit in silence, to watch one's youth wash away," the singer and piano player wrote on his website. "I can only dream that one day she will recapture her glory."

On a follow-up visit a week later, Connick saw things that raised his hopes. Floodwaters were receding, violence was being contained, and at least one bar had reopened on Bourbon Street, where the 37-year-old Connick cut his musical teeth. "Man," Connick wrote, "if this isn't a sign of New Orleans coming back to its former state!"

Maybe. As the shock of one of America's worst natural disaster wears off and floodwaters are pumped out of New Orleans, public figures from local performers to President Bush are beginning to speak of reviving the 287-year-old city as if such a thing is inevitable.

They are contemplating what urban planner Robert Lang of Virginia Tech says has "never been done before in America": Using what could be hundreds of billions of public and private dollars to rebuild a modern city on a scale far beyond what happened in San Francisco after its 1906 earthquake, or in Chicago after its 1871 fire.

But what kind of city will rise from the receding waters, and when, and how?

Rebuilding is a complex issue, layered with racially sensitive questions about how to revamp the city while luring back the blue-collar and low-income residents — most of them black — who made up the bulk of the roughly half-million evacuees from the area who now are scattered across America. At stake is how much of New Orleans' identity — its unique combination of grit and refinement, bawdiness and charm — will be washed away for good.

Politicians, urban planners, business leaders and local residents with different views of a "new" New Orleans already are campaigning for their competing visions.

U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., whose New Orleans home was flooded, would focus on creating a city where tax credits, housing subsidies and jobs programs would be used to encourage the return of its working class.

U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-La., whose home in nearby Kenner also was damaged, would appoint a rebuilding czar and dust off plans to diversify the city's industrial base and modernize its hospitals and public housing.

Scientists such as John Rennie, editor of Scientific American, are talking about a safer and perhaps smaller city in which wetlands would be expanded to protect against storms.

Singer Art Neville of the Neville Brothers is calling for a "Newer Orleans" — a city re-populated by returning evacuees and protected by a new set of the "best levees ever built."

And Dane Ciolino, a criminal defense lawyer and a law professor at the University of New Orleans, wants a rebuilt city that excludes the "looters and the shooters" but that remains racially and economically diverse. He fears that restoring only the upper-income residential areas such as the Garden District and the tourist sites of the French Quarter — the areas in New Orleans least damaged by the flooding — would turn the city into an "adult Disneyland with cocktails."

"It's too much to say that (rebuilding) is the storm's silver lining, but there's no denying that it's given us an opportunity no one's ever had before," says Jindal, whose district includes part of New Orleans and its suburbs. "Now the challenge is to bring everyone together, to get the best thinking and planning and ideas out there, and to get together and do it right. … That hasn't been done before, either."

Whatever shape the rebuilding of New Orleans takes, rebuilding the city's psyche will be a key issue.

“I have great faith” in the ability of New Orleanians to rebound, Neville says. “But morale has taken a real blow. The people are down, man.”

Several factors unique to the New Orleans disaster make it less likely that people will want to return to a rebuilt city, some analysts say.

“We've never seen scattering (of disaster victims) on this scale before,” says Robert Fishman, an urban historian at the University of Michigan. Evacuees “have been relocated to any number of places, and told they'll be staying there for a long time. If it's months or years before people can get back in there, how many are going to want to go?”

Hurricane recovery specialist Michael Lindell says the images of widespread lawlessness and the suffering of many evacuated residents could have a profound impact on rebuilding efforts.

“If folks don't think government and their fellow citizens are up to the task, they may not feel that they are, either,” says Lindell, senior scholar at the Hazard Reduction and Recovery Center at Texas A&M University in College Station. “What's civic morale going to be like, long term? I don't think we can say yet. We haven't ever seen anything like this.”

With about 40% of New Orleans still underwater, it's unclear how long even the initial cleanup of the city will take.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers says it hopes to pump all the floodwater out of New Orleans by Oct. 8. Electric power and drinking water still must be restored. Des Moines needed nearly three weeks to restore potable water to 350,000 people after a flood crippled its water system in 1993.

Meanwhile, the water that has accumulated on New Orleans' streets poses health risks to recovery workers and residents. Besides leaves and dirt, it now carries backed-up sewage, feces and bacteria from decomposing bodies, as well as toxic chemicals from small businesses such as dry cleaners whose storage tanks flooded.

Tests by the federal Environmental Protection Agency indicated that bacteria are present in floodwaters at 10 times the acceptable level. That means workers wading in the water are at a high risk for health problems, says John Pardue, a professor of environmental engineering at Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge.

Even when it dries, the polluted stew will coat streets, parks and yards with a film of toxic chemicals and sewage. Cleansing the land of contamination could take months, maybe years.

“Are the schoolyards and people's yards going to be so contaminated that we're going to have to scrape them up? That's the big unknown right now,” Pardue says. “It's not a very rosy picture, I'm afraid.”

After electricity, water and basic services are restored, homes and businesses will have to be rehabilitated or demolished and rebuilt before New Orleans residents can return home. Given the extent of water damage, many buildings likely will be beyond salvaging, Lindell says.

“The issue is not just structural damage that water is going to do to wood and Sheetrock, but the likelihood of mold,” he says. “That's going to make some places that appear to be relatively undamaged turn out to be health hazards that have got to be gotten rid of.”

Pete Carkhuff, sales executive for National Property Damage Experts in West Berlin, N.J., says that “you're probably talking about bulldozing entire blocks, maybe whole neighborhoods.”

Once cleanup is completed and basic services are restored, New Orleans will face some difficult choices. Among them: Whether the city and its surrounding area should be made smaller, but safer, by restoring wetlands that have disappeared during the past several decades.

Even when the flood barriers are repaired, the city will remain substantially below sea level, making more flooding likely. And New Orleans is often wet, with an annual average of 64.16 inches of rain from 1971 to 2000, according to the National Climatic Data Center. Only Mobile, Ala., with an average of 66.29 inches, was wetter among major cities in the continental USA.

New Orleans has had more than 20 major floods since 1978, up from just two in the previous 50 years.

Any rebuilding plan, specialists say, should take New Orleans' topography and frequent rains into account. “You can bring the city back without making it any safer,” Rennie says. “You want to avoid that.”

The problem, Rennie says, is the gradual disappearance of barrier islands and wetlands between the city and the Gulf of Mexico, a process hastened by development in New Orleans and its suburbs. Building flood barriers to keep water away from homes and businesses, Rennie says, ultimately destroys surrounding wetlands and puts development at risk.

“The natural pattern of flooding supplies nutrients and sediment to wetlands areas, keeping them as kind of a buffer and a natural absorber when a really big storm hits,” says Rennie, who published a report in October 2001 that said New Orleans was due to face major flooding from a hurricane.

The answer, he says, is to buttress the flood barriers needed to protect central New Orleans, then eliminate or downsize barriers and canals that sustain development on the city's fringes and in its suburbs. That would allow wetlands to resume their natural role of taking the brunt of smaller storms and protecting the city from catastrophe.

“We're talking about a smaller city, but a safer and hopefully more sustainable one,” Rennie says. “The alternative is to continue as we are, losing 60 acres (of wetlands) a day. By 2090, New Orleans would be exposed to the open sea, with no protection at all.”

The insurance industry could help direct New Orleans' reconstruction by declining to insure homes or businesses rebuilt in high-risk areas, or by making hurricane insurance easier to acquire if rebuilders agree to make new structures safer.

After Florida was struck by four big hurricanes last year, insurers played a “consultative role” in the rebuilding, says Robert Hartwig, chief economist of the Insurance Information Institute, a group funded by companies, trade associations and agents.

Industry representatives advised governments how to strengthen building codes, set up emergency cash pools and identify the riskiest areas in which to rebuild.

“We don't want to promote ‘serial rebuilding,' ” Hartwig says. “The industry does weigh in in post-disaster debates.”

So, too, may Uncle Sam. Private insurers write most policies that cover hurricane damage, but the U.S. government is the principal insurer against flood loss through its National Flood Insurance Program. But the NFIP, Hartwig says, has become increasingly reluctant to insure replacement dwellings in high-risk areas.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., has said that the federal government “ought to take a second look” at supporting the rebuilding of a city that will remain at risk for hurricanes.

Hastert's office later said that he wasn't advocating abandoning New Orleans, but rather taking risks into account before deciding what to rebuild.

Federal flood insurance will pay up to $250,000 to repair or replace a dwelling and up to $100,000 for lost or damaged contents.

But only about one-third of New Orleans homeowners appear to have taken out flood policies, Hartwig says, apparently trusting that “federal disaster efforts” will bail them out. Given the extent of the damage, and attitudes such as Hastert's, that may not be possible this time.

New Orleans also will have to decide how to rebuild its tourism industry.

The city's Convention & Visitors Bureau has opened an office in Baton Rouge, where New Orleans business owners have discussed plans to reopen attractions in the French Quarter and other relatively unscathed parts of the city's restaurant and entertainment district, perhaps by the end of the year.

But even by then, says urban historian Joel Kotkin, tens of thousands of tourists and conventioneers will have been redirected to other destinations. Rather than spending time and money to woo all of them back, Kotkin says, the city could consider trying to attract new industries that could complement a downscaled version of the tourism industry.

That's a tall order: Tourism in New Orleans has employed 80,000 people and each year has attracted 10 million visitors who have spent nearly $5 billion, the Convention & Visitors Bureau says.

“There's always going to be a Mardi Gras — at least, a lot of Americans hope there will always be,” says Kotkin, author of The City: A Global History. “But that doesn't mean that has to be the only reason for your economic existence.”

New Orleans, he notes, has been a center for government, agricultural trade, banking and transportation at various times since it was founded as a French colony.

“Some of those industries have gone away, but some have migrated to other more energetic places,” Kotkin says. “Look at Houston. It was nothing at the start of the 20th century, (but) now it has the port business and the energy industry that used to belong to New Orleans.”

History seems to support that point. Major cities — Kobe, Japan, in 1995, San Francisco and Chicago — have suffered huge damage from earthquakes and/or fires and have rebounded smartly.

San Francisco's experience from 1906, detailed in A Crack at the Edge of the World, by Simon Winchester, appears to parallel many aspects of the New Orleans disaster: extensive destruction, loss of life, looting and the permanent relocation of some residents to nearby places such as Oakland. In the aftermath, San Francisco's economy shifted from manufacturing to finance, law and tourism, a mix that sustains the city to this day.

“As long as they've been around, cities have been flooded, burned, shaken by earthquakes or otherwise destroyed,” says Thomas Campanella, a professor of urban planning at the University of North Carolina and co-editor of The Resilient City, a 2005 book that examined the revival of a dozen once-devastated cities. What ensures a city's recovery, he says, is the “extent to which (its) social and cultural fabric persists.”

He cites the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, after which “New York City took on a small-town feel” as strangers took in stranded travelers and helped families search for loved ones.

“The extent to which citizens can really come together and help each other will go a long way toward determining how resilient New Orleans will be,” he says. New Yorkers, he says, essentially told themselves, “Hey, we can come out of this better than ever.”

DOJ_NMG_0005345

Whether New Orleanians will adopt that approach remains to be seen.

Winchester says the slow-building nature of the disaster — leaking barriers that led the city to flood over several days — could harm the civic psyche.

“This isn't (like San Francisco's disaster), a boom followed rapidly by a fire before you can even think about it,” he says. “This (was) water creeping up, inch by inch, day by day. It sounds maddening.”

Shalom Matthews knows what he means.

The 30-year-old hotel auditor says she had never ventured beyond the New Orleans city limits before she and her sister were evacuated to Baton Rouge. Four terrifying nights at the New Orleans convention center were enough to persuade her to leave the city for good, she says.

But other New Orleans residents such as Eric Morgan seem eager to join in its rebuilding. Lounging on the balcony of a home in the city's Lower Garden District last week, Morgan, 46, said he wasn't going anywhere, despite the mayor's order for residents to evacuate.

Morgan, a construction worker, said he had a working generator and enough food and water to last about two months.

“The police came by to ask if we were all right. We're doing fine,” he said, nodding to a friend. “We're gonna get (the city) back.”

New Orleans Works To Open 4 Districts As Services Return (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 13 - An upbeat Mayor C. Ray Nagin announced on Tuesday that he hoped to reopen four neighborhoods, including the city's central business district and the French Quarter, to residents and business owners in the next few days.

"I have started to get into the mode of how do we reopen the city and how do we move it to the next level," Mr. Nagin said, appearing relaxed, even cracking jokes, while speaking to reporters in the French Quarter.

At the same time, he conceded that the city's financial problems were enormous. "The city is out of cash," he said. "We do not have the cash to make the payroll coming up."

Mr. Nagin said that city officials were trying hard to secure a line of credit. Many contractors who are helping the city clean up are working under the assumption that the city will get money to pay them.

The final go-ahead to reopen the city's central business district and the French Quarter, along with two residential neighborhoods - Algiers and Uptown - depends on an environmental report he said he expected to receive later in the day. He had been briefed on the report, on the quality of the air and water, he said, and things "looked good."

The four areas are now dry.

As for what residents will return to, Mr. Nagin cited progress on a number of fronts. City officials were working to get two hospitals - Touro Infirmary and Children's Hospital - running soon. The water is safe to drink in Algiers, and Mr. Nagin said he hoped drinkable water would be restored to the three other neighborhoods by the end of this week.

The city is working with Wal-Mart, Home Depot and other companies to open temporary stores in the convention center.

Daniel F. Packer, president and chief executive of Entergy New Orleans, said 264,000 of the 1.1 million customers in Louisiana and Mississippi who lost power after Hurricane Katrina were still without it. Most of those, Mr. Packer said, are in the metropolitan area.

He said he expected electricity would be restored to the central business district and the French Quarter in 10 days to two weeks. With more than 40 pumping stations online, water was now being drained at a significant rate from the city, Mr. Nagin said.

Teams will soon finish a door-to-door search of every home in the city, said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, commander of the 82nd Airborne Division of the Army.

General Caldwell estimated that 3,000 people remained, in defiance of a mandatory evacuation order.

As for the long term, the mayor said he would establish a commission to plan major aspects of the city's restoration. "I'm tired of hearing these helicopters," he said. "I want to hear some jazz."

Exhausting, Frustrating Work On Water Pumps Is Paying Off (USAT)

By Alan Levin

USA Today, September 14, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005346

NEW ORLEANS — Fred Young paces through the muck outside one of the city pumping stations, surrounded by hundreds of blocks of submerged neighborhoods.

It's Sunday, nearly two weeks since Hurricane Katrina sent waterways surging over levees and floodgates to flood New Orleans. More than half a million evacuees are waiting for Young, a manager with the Army Corps of Engineers, to dry the city out so they can salvage what's left of their belongings or, worse, locate the dead.

Young has come here with a work crew and four armed guards to restart the pump. It's not going well. His cellphone battery just died. The crew needs more equipment to make the pump work. And daylight is fading fast.

“God, we're ready to go, and I'm stuck here,” he shouts to no one in particular.

This is ground zero in one of the biggest natural-disaster relief efforts in history. The Army Corps' emergency construction project is being managed by a bedraggled team that sleeps on cots at night.

The effort is paying off. As of today, perhaps half of the flooded areas have re-emerged. Temporary pumps and the giant permanent pumping stations are throwing as much as 9 billion gallons per day over the levees and out of the city.

It hasn't been easy. For Young and the other workers, it has been one of the toughest weekends of their lives.

Young, a civilian engineer, is tearing around New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish in a four-wheel-drive sport-utility vehicle with an armed guard. He is talking non-stop, taking cellphone calls and offering a running description of the devastation. He guns the car the wrong way onto an offramp on the deserted interstate.

Young, a heavyset man with shaggy black hair, returned to the Army Corps' headquarters on the banks of the Mississippi River three days after the hurricane and has been based there ever since. He was named project manager for pumping.

He pulls up to New Orleans Pumping Station No. 6, the heart of the city's elaborate system to keep the surrounding waters at bay. Rotting fish lie on the road into the facility.

When Katrina swelled the waters of Lake Pontchartrain and the Gulf of Mexico, four sections of the walls that protect New Orleans against flooding gave way, and water poured into this below-sea-level bowl. The floods turned most of the pumping stations into mud and grease pits.

Three days before, power had been restored at Station No. 6, and it was the first of the flooded pumping stations switched on. It's pumping at a fraction of its capacity because most of the aged pumps won't be dried out for weeks, but the water in this neighborhood has dropped about a foot. “Look how far it's come down,” Young says. “That's great.”

By 4 p.m., the news gets worse. The attempts to bring back Pumping Station No. 7 caused a massive short circuit that has blacked out No. 6.

A shower and food haven't raised Young's spirits. He was out past midnight, meeting with the manager of an equipment company providing more than 20 temporary pumps.

He also saw his house for the first time since the storm. Water got in and ruined his plaster ceilings. “But at least I have a house,” he says. “A lot of people, they're going to have to bulldoze their houses.”

Young heads back to Pumping Station No. 6, which is still blacked out. He meets up with Chief Warrant Officer 4 Thomas Black, an expert in restoring electrical power. Black, who wears long-sleeve combat fatigues and a black beret despite temperatures in the mid-90s, assisted the failed effort to restart Station No. 7 the day before.

Young works the phones. He calls the manager of a nearby levee district. “I need pumps!” he says. “It's not raining. I need your stinking pumps. Whatever you've got.” He pauses, then says into the phone, “I'll take them.”

Shortly after 5 p.m., Young, accompanied by two other corps engineers, arrives at the London Avenue Canal. The engineers whip out cellphones in unison and shout a cacophony of instructions. If the canal can hold water, the water board can fire up Pumping Station No. 3. It was one of the few facilities that kept operating after the storm. It, too, was flooded, but a lone pump remained dry.

“We're going to start that sucker,” Young says.

Young and his crew are at Station No. 3. At 5:15 p.m., Black arrives in a helicopter provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Al Vosbein, a pump operator, is with him.

Vosbein, 55, wheezing from emphysema, says he rode out the hurricane here on the second floor of the concrete electric control room and lived there above the water for the next two days. All he wants to do is get back to his flooded house to retrieve an urn holding his wife's ashes.

Vosbein says he needs more equipment to get the pump to actually push water. He boards the helicopter again to fetch it.

Just before dark, the helicopter returns with Vosbein. Thirty minutes later, the pump operator notifies the water board control room that he's ready to start the pump. A whir gradually rises from the innards of the station. After a few minutes, the water behind the station gurgles. At 7:39 p.m., a great surge of white foam exits the plant. The workers let out yelps and slap one another's backs.

There's still a lot of work to do around the city. But little by little, they're getting the water out.

Polluted Waters Drown Environmental Efforts (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian And Marla Cone

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The high-stakes effort to bail out New Orleans is sending plumes of contaminated, brown, stinking water into Lake Pontchartrain, setting back years of effort to restore the environmentally sensitive home of Gulf Coast marine life.

After festering for two weeks in neighborhoods, commercial districts and industrial zones, the water is laden with bacteria, silt, petroleum products and possibly toxic substances.

City officials confirmed Tuesday that they were also releasing untreated sewage into the Mississippi River from one of two treatment plants operated by the New Orleans Sewerage and Water Board.

Hurricane Katrina has forced the abandonment of normal environmental and sanitation practices as workers scramble to preserve what's left of the city and prevent a breakdown of public health.

"We are still trying to save lives," said Col. Richard Wagenaar, who heads the Army Corps of Engineers' New Orleans district.

The floodwaters are overrun with fecal material, silt and other substances that could damage the marine environment.

Martha Sutula, a senior scientist at the Southern California Coastal Water Research Project who has studied the ecology of Louisiana wetlands, said nutrients in the floodwaters, such as nitrates and ammonia, would probably cause algae and phytoplankton blooms in the shallow lake and surrounding estuaries. The blooms can deplete oxygen and suffocate marine life.

"I would imagine that you're going to have a pretty tremendous dead zone," Sutula said. "This is going to set them back quite a few years."

Al Naomi, senior project engineer for the Army Corps of Engineers, agreed. "It will take years to clean up our estuaries. The lake was coming back with manatees and fish. Twenty years of effort has been wiped out in an afternoon storm surge."

Although few experts criticize the extreme measures being taken to save New Orleans, the practices are believed to violate federal laws in normal times.

"We have multiple disasters in Hurricane Katrina," said William R. Freudenburg, a professor of environmental studies at UC Santa Barbara. "Much of the disaster was caused by the initial decision of where to put the city's levees. It was turned into a human disaster by the worst response I have ever seen by the government. Now we have a disaster on one of the most environmentally sensitive and valuable wetlands in America."

Much of the nation's seafood catch spends some portion of its life in the marshes of Louisiana, areas that were damaged by the storm surge. On the east flank of New Orleans, marshlands have been stripped clean of vegetation. "It looks like the surface of the moon," Wagenaar said.

So far, tests have not discovered any toxic pollution.

The flood inundated at least one Superfund site, the Agriculture Street landfill. The cleanup was completed before the flood, although toxic residue remained in the soil. Tens of thousands of inundated homes are thought to have solvents, pesticides and other toxic substances stored in garages and under sinks that could be leaking.

The Environmental Protection Agency has tested floodwaters in six locations for more than 100 chemicals. Only one chemical has exceeded EPA standards. Lead in water near an Interstate 10 exit ramp was 15 times higher than the level allowed in drinking water.

Most of the hazardous chemicals — including polychlorinated biphenyls, found in electrical equipment, and benzene, found in crude oil and gasoline — were undetectable in the EPA's first round of tests conducted Sept. 3.

Lake Pontchartrain, a brackish, shallow body of water that is affected by ocean tides, normally appears blue. But the view from a helicopter this week showed at least three large plumes of brown water leaving the 17th Street Canal, the London Avenue Canal and the Inner Harbor Navigation Canal.

Those waterways are the main channels for billions of gallons of floodwaters per day from the city's pumping stations. Even several hundred feet above the city the air stinks of sewage.

The water pumped into the 630-square-mile lake eventually drains through two narrow outlets to Lake Borgne and then to the Gulf of Mexico. The sewage going into the Mississippi River flows into the gulf at the river's mouth, about 80 miles from downtown.

Marcia St. Martin, executive director of the sewage board, said there was no evidence to support the contention that the water was a "toxic brew."

Although it may contain bacteria, she said, the city never treated the massive quantities of storm water routinely pumped into Lake Pontchartrain.

"Fecal coliform in floodwater is normal," she said.

New Orleans has two sewage-treatment plants, one on each side of the Mississippi River. The southern plant remains operational but the northern plant is underwater. It may require weeks or even months of repairs.

As a result, the city is releasing raw sewage into the river, St. Martin said. No EPA waivers are required under the circumstances, she said.

EPA tests show astronomical levels of bacteria in the floodwaters. The pollution could cause problems for downriver communities that draw drinking water from the river as well as marine life at the river's mouth. That area is already a dead zone exceeding 8,000 square miles in some years, resulting from nutrients in the river.

Bacteria can live longer in the bottom sediment of the lake and gulf than in the water. "I think Lake Pontchartrain will serve as a reservoir for pathogens," Sutula said.

Meanwhile, the Army Corps of Engineers is trying to mitigate problems. "We are taking prudent measures," said Col. Duane Gapinski, who leads the corps' "dewatering" team. "We have set up [pollution containment] booms at all the outlets."

Many of the worst pollutants, including petroleum products that give the floodwaters an oily sheen, have floated to the surface. That means the early pumping is removing relatively clean water.

"As you draw down the water, that top level of pollution will become more concentrated," Gapinski said. "So we have to make some decisions about how to deal with that."

After Storm, City's Heart Pumps Again (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- The giant heart that makes this city's life-sustaining water went into cardiac arrest on Tuesday, Aug. 30, at 5 a.m. Its many chambered ventricles stopped pumping. The pressure in its six great arteries fell to almost nothing. The flow in its 350-square-mile circulatory system became sluggish and then stopped.

At the time of its apparent death, the Carrollton Water Purification Plant was 99 years old. Today, it's alive again, after three heroic resuscitation attempts, the last one successful. It'll be in critical care for a while. But it's getting stronger.

The people of New Orleans could not let the Carrollton plant die -- not if they want their city to survive. For a century, New Orleans has depended on the 70-acre complex of pumps and generators and pipes to draw water from the Mississippi River, treat it with purifying chemicals, filter it and send it out to the city's half-million residents.

The death and reanimation of the water plant is a story of ingenuity, self-reliance, loyalty and luck. It required doing something that had never been done -- the first cold start of Carrollton since it opened in 1906. Before that could be tried, however, the workers who stayed at the plant had to fight a dangerous fire in the middle of Hurricane Katrina. In the flood that followed, they had to tourniquet-off a water-main break that was bleeding the plant dry. Along the way, many had to confront the fact that their houses were gone.

"There are a lot of heroes here," Vincent P. Fouchi Jr., the assistant superintendent of water purification, said as he and more than half a dozen workers described the events after the storm.

Fouchi, who turned 40 two days ago, came to work the Saturday before Katrina's landfall. He brought with him three changes of clothing and more food than usual for the work marathon everyone knew was required for big storms. He is now well into his third week. His wife and two children, ages 7 and 11, are in Jackson, Miss. His house, in the Lakeview neighborhood, still had water up to the eaves last week. He saw it on an aerial photograph. He says he'll be here "until they send me home."

The Carrollton water plant is like those of many old American cities -- only more so. It is from an age of limitless steel, heroic engineering, and the belief that public works were such an accomplishment they should be housed in beautiful buildings.

Carrollton's 20-odd structures are blinding white stucco under tile roofs. Their windows have divided panes set in starburst patterns, surmounted by semicircular reliefs that look like giant red eyebrows. It could be the summer place of an Italian king.

But much of it is out of date. Key functions operate on century-old specifications that simply can't be changed without tearing the place apart. The plant feeds a distribution system in which 40 percent of the water is "unaccounted for" -- not paid for by customers, who are the sole source of revenue. The water probably leaks into the city's already soggy ground. A consultant to the Sewerage and Water Board of New Orleans recently estimated that it would cost $4 billion to make the system fully modern.

The plant has about 200 workers. When Katrina arrived, 111 were on the job. It's hard to say exactly when things started going bad. But there was no question that something was very wrong the night of Monday, Aug. 29, when demand for water suddenly started to rise.

The plant normally pumps 120 million gallons a day. When a big water main breaks, moment-to-moment consumption may go up the equivalent of 10 million to 15 million gallons a day as water gushes out of the system. The plant kicks in to compensate and increases its output to maintain pressure and flow in the distribution system.

Soon after the height of the storm, however, demand rose the equivalent of 40 million to 50 million gallons a day, a step-up never seen before. It was something, Fouchi said, "that shouldn't be happening in a city that doesn't have a lot of people in it."

In New Orleans, water pipes run beside the roads, not under them. On many streets, live oaks grow over the pipes. When trees blow down, as hundreds did during Katrina, their roots pull up the small distribution lines, creating leaks. That was certainly happening. But it probably wasn't the whole story. There must have been an immense leak somewhere.

As a first step to try to stanch it, one worker, Christopher Fontan, 49, bear-sized and 51 days from retirement, went out into the storm and closed the 50-inch main serving the area where the instruments suggested the leak was. It is one of six huge distribution pipes, and closing the valve required 200 turns of a 10-foot-long T-shaped key, delivered down a hatch, to close.

"It was a good move because we got instant relief," said John R. Huerkamp, chief of operations.

But other bad things had already happened.

The city's electric system had failed. The plant, however, has its own generators that supply part of its electricity needs.

Its power system was running when the wind blew an eight-foot-high window and frame out of the wall of the powerhouse. Horizontal rain poured onto a motor control unit, shorting it out and starting a fire. The huge building, which contains six boilers and whose subroof is made of wood, began to fill with smoke.

As the storm raged, a dozen men frantically collected fire extinguishers from nearby buildings and fought the fire. The depleted devices, in every style and vintage, were in three piles on the floor.

"If it hadn't been for these guys putting it out, this whole building would have been gone," said George Belteau, the superintendent of power.

But it wasn't enough.

When the levees broke, New Orleans began to flood, and with it the Carrollton plant. The water could destroy the generators, and with reluctance, officials shut them down. For the first time since Theodore Roosevelt was president, the plant stopped making drinking water.

Over the two-way radio, the people in the plant could hear of the worsening plight of colleagues at pumping stations around the city. Some were being told to put on their life jackets and get to the highest place they could. At the Carrollton plant, the small trickle of people abandoning their posts became, briefly, an exodus. But about 65 stayed.

"We had fought the battle, and we were winning. If we had not had a levee failure, we would not be where we are today," Huerkamp said.

"That's why this is so horrible. We've never failed the city before," said Marvin R. Russell Jr., the white-haired superintendent of water purification.

By the Wednesday after the storm, gas-driven pumps had gotten enough water out of the powerhouse for Fouchi and the others to try a resuscitation. They were like medical students at their first code blue -- except there was nobody with experience to teach them.

They faced a chicken-or-egg problem: The boilers needed water to make steam to generate electricity to drive the pumps that could then replenish the water in the boilers and keep them running. If the boilers could stay up long enough, they could generate enough power to work the pumps that pull water out of the river and keep the system from running dry.

The first try required manually filling the boilers and overriding all sorts of safety mechanisms. The plant came back to life for 20 minutes, but the boilers ran out of water and had to be shut down again.

The operators regrouped and tried again the next day, with a firetruck delivering water to help prime the boilers. This time the system stayed up for an hour.

On the third day, the plant had enough city power to run the pumps drawing water from the river, which flows by gravity into the acres of open basins and treatment tanks. This essentially "primed" the plant.

This time it worked. The engineers fired up the boilers, which did not run out of water. The turbines made enough power to drive the high-pressure distribution pumps, keeping the boilers full.

On Sunday, Fouchi and his colleagues started disinfecting the water for the first time since the storm. It's not yet good enough to drink. But 90 million gallons a day are in circulation, driven by the big heart that's back at work.

La. Deaths At 423; Facility Owners Charged (AJC/AP)

By Adam Nossiter, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005350

NEW ORLEANS — In a day of reckoning across battered New Orleans, the owners of a nursing home were charged in the deaths of dozens of patients killed by Hurricane Katrina's floodwaters, the death toll in Louisiana jumped to 423, and the mayor warned that the city is broke.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin said the city was working "feverishly" with banking and federal officials to secure lines of credit through the end of the year, but for now, it is unable to make its next payroll.

Amid the discouraging news, there were also clear signs of progress on many fronts: The New Orleans airport reopened to commercial flights, the port resumed operations, and the mayor said dry sections of the ravaged city — including the French Quarter and the central business district — could be reopened during the daytime as early as Monday, provided the Environmental Protection Agency finds the air is safe.

"We're out of nuclear-crisis mode and into normal, day-to-day crisis mode," Nagin said.

Entergy-New Orleans said it had restored power to 75 percent of the 1.1 million customers that were out at the height of the storm. And Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said most of the military's search and rescue work was complete.

President Bush also put a final word on what he had called the "blame game" among politicians, saying: "I take responsibility" for the government's failures in dealing with the hurricane.

The death toll from Hurricane Katrina climbed more than 50 percent in a single day Tuesday to 423, including last week's grisly discovery of 34 dead patients and staff members at St. Rita's nursing home in the town of Chalmette in hard-hit St. Bernard Parish.

In the nursing home case, Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti charged the husband-and-wife owners of St. Rita's with 34 counts of negligent homicide for not doing more to save their elderly patients.

"The pathetic thing in this case was that they were asked if they wanted to move them and they did not," Foti said. "They were warned repeatedly that this storm was coming. In effect, their inaction resulted in the deaths of these people."

Salvador A. Mangano and his wife, Mable, were released on $50,000 bond each.

Their attorney, Jim Cobb, said his clients were innocent.

Cobb said they followed the nursing home's evacuation plan that had been filed with officials, and he blamed the St. Bernard Parish officials for not ensuring the plan was proceeding.

"They sat and waited for a mandatory evacuation order from the officials of St. Bernard Parish that never came," he said.

Cobb said the Manganos were forced to make a difficult decision as the hurricane approached: evacuate the patients, many of them elderly and on feeding tubes, or keep them comfortable at the home through the storm.

"If you pull that trigger too soon (on evacuation) those people are going to die," Cobb said.

Tammy Daigle, a nurse who worked at the home, also said the owners had been worried about trying to evacuate some residents of the home who they knew wouldn't survive the move.

Tom Rodrigue, whose mother was among the dead, was still angry and near tears.

"She deserved the chance, you know, to be rescued instead of having to drown like a rat," he told CNN.

In addition to St. Rita's, the attorney general said he is investigating the discovery of more than 40 corpses at flooded-out Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans. A hospital official said the 106-degree heat inside the hospital as the patients waited for days to be evacuated probably contributed to the deaths.

Even though the airport and waterfront were running at just a fraction of their capacity, the symbolic importance was not lost on a city that only days before had all but collapsed into looting and desperation.

"From a commercial and psychological standpoint, this is five stars," port president Gary LaGrange said between an outgoing barge shipment of auto parts to Alabama and the arrival of a ship carrying coffee and wood from Argentina, Brazil and Mexico. "This shows the people of New Orleans their city is back in business."

Some experts had predicted it would take up to six months to get the port operating again after the hurricane damaged terminals and knocked out the electricity to operate cranes. A backlog of vessels had formed along the Mississippi River, waiting to load and unload cargo.

The Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport, which escaped widespread damage from Katrina but was reserved for humanitarian flights in the storm's aftermath, received its first commercial arrival, a flight with about two dozen emergency workers and returning residents.

"Welcome home," airport director Roy Williams said as he greeted the passengers. "We're glad to see you."

Airport officials hope to be up to 60 flights a day within the week and back to full operation of 350 flights a day in six months. Before Katrina hit, the airport was on pace for a record 10 million passengers this year.

During a tour of hurricane-stricken Mississippi, U.S. Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta pronounced Katrina the worst disaster for transportation in U.S. history and estimated the damage to bridges and highways — including broken and disjointed stretches of vital Interstate 10 — at $3 billion.

The Army Corps of Engineers reported significant progress running the operation to pump out flooded areas of New Orleans and neighboring parishes.

Col. Duane Gapinski estimated that half of the flooded area or less was still under water, and at the rate of 8 billion to 9 billion gallons a day, the city was on target to be almost completely drained by Oct. 8.

The mayor said more than 40 pumping stations were operating in the city, including the city's biggest pump.

"That will change the world as we know it," he said.

Amid the encouraging signs from the streets, there were promises from the White House and the Federal Emergency Management Agency to learn from their mistakes and intensify efforts to help the victims.

In Washington, Bush said "I take responsibility" for the government's failures in dealing with the hurricane, and he said the disaster raised questions about the nation's ability to respond to natural disasters as well as terrorist attacks.

"Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack? That's a very important question and it's in the national interest that we find out what went on so we can better respond," the president said.

The new acting director of FEMA, R. David Paulison, also promised to get thousands of evacuees out of shelters and into temporary housing.

"We're going to move on and get them the help they need," Paulison said in his first public statements since taking over the job.

Port Comes Back Early, Surprisingly (WP)

By Keith L. Alexander And Neil Irwin

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 13 -- The Port of New Orleans began unloading its first cargo ship since Hurricane Katrina on Tuesday night, months sooner than was predicted, a sign that disruption to the nation's shipping capacity may be less severe than originally forecast.

After the storm, port officials figured it would take six months to resume service in New Orleans and at facilities throughout the Gulf Coast. Importers scurried to reroute coffee, steel and other commodities, and Midwest farmers worried that they wouldn't be able to ship their grain to the rest of the world during the harvest. The disruption threatened the supply of goods across the United States, and some forecasters said it would cause a drag on the economy.

But Tuesday, the port was coming back to life, with electrical power restored to parts of the facility by late afternoon. About 8:30 p.m., the Lykes Flyer container ship pulled into the port, and towering cranes began lifting boxcar-size containers of plywood and coffee beans from the ship, as if they were children's building blocks. The goods were to be placed on trucks that would carry them out along newly cleared roads, for distribution across the nation.

Gary P. LaGrange, chief executive of the port, said he expects it to be at 80 percent of capacity within three months. The Port of South Louisiana and Port Fourchon, on the Gulf Coast, have also partially restored service, and the Port of Pascagoula, Miss., expects to resume service by early October, according to the American Association of Port Authorities.

That has made economists more optimistic about the hurricane's impact on the nation. "I was surprised at how quickly the ports got going again," said Mark M. Zandi, chief executive of Economy.com, a research firm. "The longer they remained closed, the greater the risk that we'd all be paying higher prices for coffee, cocoa, lumber, steel, zinc, aluminum and any number of other things. Now that things are going well, there's likely to be no measurable disruption at all."

That doesn't mean the economy is in the clear. Zandi noted that disruptions to energy production have been more persistent, and the drop in employment and production in the Gulf Coast is likely to be great. The improved expectations depend on continued progress, and there are no guarantees that it will continue at this pace, analysts said. Coastal Cargo Co., for example, operates barges from a terminal at the Port of New Orleans and on Monday shipped out a load of steel coils to an automaker in Alabama. But that was after a two-week effort to get back to business, and the company has only two -- instead of its usual 10 to 15 -- "gangs" of workers, each of which has about a dozen people. One of Coastal Cargo's barges was washed ashore in the storm, but was in decent condition, said Mike Lauland, the company's director of risk management. So it has been put to use to help clear out barges clogging shipping channels.

More will be needed to get the local economy fully back in business.

For example, Folgers coffee has a roasting plant in New Orleans that accounts for more than half its supply. For the first 10 days after the storm, it was unreachable except by helicopter, because of downed trees and security concerns on the roads. For the plant to be reopened, it needs a return of water, sewer and natural gas service, said Doug McGraw, vice president for global coffee at Folgers' parent company, Procter & Gamble.

There is enough green coffee in storage to supply the roasting plant for now, but without water and fuel, the company lacks the ability to turn bitter green coffee beans into the Folgers that shows up on shelves.

"We're hopeful that between starting some initial production, and living on inventories in the distribution centers and at retailers, the disruption to consumers will be limited," McGraw said. "But it's going to be a problem."

Nonetheless, the work at the Port of New Orleans proceeded at full speed Tuesday as workers toiled to reopen a trading hub through which 31 million tons of cargo flowed last year.

The faster-than-expected reopening came about through some bureaucratic arm-twisting, coordination between groups, and a careful focus on the most urgent areas for repair, said LaGrange and outside analysts.

"They're moving at light speed," said C. James Kruse, director of the Center for Ports and Waterways at the Texas Transportation Administration. "It's been an example of good cooperation between federal agencies and the port authority, and an action plan to get to the critical things first and fix other problems later."

LaGrange, a large, jovial man who Tuesday wore tennis shoes and a purple baseball cap that reads "Port of New Orleans," was celebrating his fourth year as head of the port. The most immediate problems, he said, were finding workers and getting a place for them to stay. The federal Maritime Administration provided ships with sleeping quarters , which are docked at the port and serve as floating dormitories for longshoremen and managers .

The port also collaborated with the dockworkers' union, the International Longshoremen's Association, to bring in workers from other ports. LaGrange said it was necessary because most Port of New Orleans employees were forced to leave the area and could not be located.

And state police are guarding the access roads from hijackers, and agreed to give truck drivers delivering goods to and from the port clearance to deliver their loads. Tyrone Dolese, 51, of Destrehan, La., is a clerk for the Port of New Orleans who usually works in the office. But because of a shortage of help, Dolese agreed to work outside under the hot afternoon sun at the Napoleon Avenue Container Terminal about five miles down the road to help prepare the cargo for export . He helped inspect containers that were to be a part of the first shipments exported.

"We are going to get this place back," he said.

The Region Starts To Stagger Back (WP)

By Evelyn Nieves

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

WIGGINS, Miss., Sept. 13 -- Once the local television station announced that hurricane money was finally coming to Stone County, word spread fast.

People began showing up in front of Stone High School just after 10 p.m. Monday. By 8 the next morning, when the Red Cross opened for business, the line was 4 1/2 blocks long.

This line was just to get a number for an appointment later in the week that could land a cash voucher. "We've been waiting 15 days, so I guess we can wait some more," said Waymon Parker, whose trailer was wrecked.

As relief agencies are starting to get around to the last coastal towns left on their lists, assessments of Hurricane Katrina's devastation to 80 miles of coast and reaching 150 miles inland are just getting underway. State officials could offer no figures for damage to the Gulf Coast, but they say that Mississippi will take years, if not decades, to rebuild.

More than 115,000 evacuees remain in Red Cross shelters or temporary housing, and tens of thousands of others are staying with relatives or in other temporary housing. Debris is virtually all that is left of some smaller coastal towns. The Federal Emergency Management Agency remains swamped with cries for help. The agency has identified more than 154,000 people in need of assistance so far, said a spokesman, Gene Romano. It anticipates perhaps hundreds of thousands more as hurricane victims who have been trying to reach FEMA finally get through.

At the same time, life has noticeably improved in the five coastal counties where Katrina unleashed the brunt of her fury -- Stone, Hancock, Harrison, Jackson and Pearl River, where about 435,000 people lived and the death toll has reached 218, with 600 people reported missing. More businesses open every day, power is back to 80 percent of the buildings that could receive power and lines for gasoline are back to normal.

The Gulf Coast has a future; on that, most agree. But whether it can re-create a culture that took more than 200 years to build, return with its blend of residents, black and white, rich and poor, old money and new immigrant, or will become an entirely new and unfamiliar version of itself -- that is another story.

Even as the immediate mop-up of Katrina has brought in thousands of National Guard crews and relief workers from all over the country, some in once-booming Mississippi coast towns are worrying about what will come afterward.

Mayor A.J. Holloway of Biloxi (population 55,000) is among them. Biloxi, home to 10 casinos and most of the Mississippi coast's shrimp industry, was devastated from its waterfront to well inland, with more than 5,000 structures destroyed and uncounted others too damaged to fix.

"We've lost our history, all of our landmarks," Holloway said. "We have some completely devastated areas, especially along the east end." Those included the city's old, working-class and poor neighborhoods, which casinos had coveted for years as prime real estate.

The Gulf Coast was the heart of Mississippi's floating casino industry, accounting for nearly half of the state's nearly $2.93 billion a year in gambling revenue. With the coast's 13 casinos destroyed by the hurricane, Mississippi, already the poorest state in the nation, is losing $500,000 in gambling taxes every day. Now the casino industry is lobbying for land-based alternatives to their former barges, and some fear the coast will look like a cut-rate Las Vegas, with slablike condominiums, cinder-block subdivisions and gaudy hotels.

The $700 million-a-year shrimping industry lost not only much of its fleet but also the processing plants needed to bring the shellfish to market, at the peak of the season.

The immediate cleanup of Katrina is just beginning. Garbage trucks have just started to roll through towns in the last few days, and schools are gearing up to open, in some places as early as next Monday, in others by the beginning of next month. Officials on the Gulf Coast are also trying to find a way to ease traffic, now that it appears that Interstate 90, the major coastal highway, will not reopen for at least 90 days.

"If I'd said on August 29th that two weeks later we were going to be where we are now -- well, no one would believe me," said Col. Joe Spraggins, the relentlessly upbeat director of emergency operations for Harrison County (population 185,000). "I mean, we're doing great," he said. "I could see now that the future of the coast will be better than ever."

Others are not so sure. "We've lost 80 percent of Hancock County, at least," said Eddie Favre, the mayor of Bay St. Louis, which had 8,000 residents.

Its neighbor, Waveland, which had 7,000 residents, lost virtually its entire infrastructure and population. Only about two dozen residents remain, living off relief food and water.

Pass Christian, a city of about 8,500, was considered the little jewel of the coast, a place where tourists came just to gawk at its mix of antebellum mansions and century-old shotgun shacks. Almost the entire city is gone, save for between 50 to 100 houses on the east side, where residents have been holed up since the hurricane, said Joseph Piernas, an alderman there.

Those who lost their houses or businesses were finally allowed into Pass Christian to survey the damage Tuesday morning, though lines hours long have tried to get into the town every day for a week, only to be turned away by the National Guard.

"The good news is, people are saying they'll rebuild," Piernas said. "We have no idea when that can start."

The governor's office said 1,250 FEMA trailers or mobile homes were in a staging area in Jackson, 135 were ready for occupancy and 20 have been delivered to evacuees in Biloxi, where perhaps as many as 20,000 people need new places to live.

Much Wider Damage To Levees Is Disclosed (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The massive levee system protecting New Orleans has sustained heavy damage well beyond the five breaches that are widely known to have caused flooding after Hurricane Katrina, the Army Corps of Engineers said Monday.

Miles of levees that protected the eastern flank of the region, which borders Lake Borgne, washed away in the storm surge from Katrina, which swept inland and caused deep flooding in St. Bernard Parish and the 9th Ward of New Orleans.

Army officials disclosed the destruction of the city's eastern levee system in a detailed helicopter tour of the region Monday. Unlike some of the levees in New Orleans that continuously hold water back from areas below sea level, these levees exist mainly to repel storm surges.

The loss of the levees has left portions of New Orleans with little or no protection midway through the hurricane season, senior Army officials said. And rebuilding the levees will be a massive undertaking that could take years, meaning the city could be vulnerable for a long time.

"It is gone," said Col. Richard Wagenaar, the Army Corps' head engineer for the New Orleans district. "It is literally leveled in places. The power of the surge in this storm was greatly underestimated."

Wagenaar estimated that 90% of the levee system protecting the region's eastern flank had been knocked out.

The region is protected by two levees. One is formed by a 17-foot-high barrier along a shipping channel known as the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet. The controversial channel was built in the 1960s and has long stirred the ire of environmentalists and local officials, who say it has made the area more vulnerable to flooding by destroying the natural marshes that can blunt storm surges.

The other, lower levee further inland provides a second layer of defense for St. Bernard Parish and the 9th Ward.

DOJ_NMG_0005354

As Katrina approached the Louisiana coastline from the south, it accumulated a wall of water possibly higher than 18 feet. As the storm continued north, its counterclockwise winds pushed the water westward. First, it surged into the bay known as Lake Borgne and then through a narrow barrier island. It next swept across the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet and then encountered the first levee.

Giant sections of that levee are heavily eroded or gone. The levees are made with piled dirt and rock with a steel sheet sandwiched vertically in the dirt. The steel is completely exposed in most of the area and badly deformed.

After sweeping past the levee, Katrina continued inland through a large marsh. Along the way, it deposited more than a dozen large shrimp boats and shipping barges, tossing them like toys.

"I don't know where those shrimp boats came from," Wagenaar said, shaking his head. "There are some pretty nice boats down there."

He predicted that many of the barges stuck hundreds of yards into the marshes would never be removed.

After the surge moved through the marsh, it hit the second levee, the last line of defense for residential neighborhoods. It destroyed that barrier, leaving deep bowls in the dirt where the surging water and waves scoured the soil. It then swept over the suburban neighborhoods on the other side.

The first blocks were heavily damaged or destroyed. An entire row of houses was pushed back a quarter of a mile into the woods. Other houses ended up in the middle of the street. It appears that much of the area will be a total loss, because the damage involves serious structural failures.

Army officials have said repeatedly that the levees and storm walls protecting New Orleans were never designed to handle a Category 4 or 5 hurricane such as Katrina. But now, without any levee system, the city's eastern flank could be vulnerable even to smaller storms.

It appears that St. Bernard Parish and the 9th Ward were hit from two sides. In addition to the surge from Lake Borgne, water poured through a breach in the Inner Harbor Navigation Channel.

The channel is part of the complex system of shipping, flood control and industrial ports that snakes its way through this city. It connects the Mississippi River, Lake Pontchartrain, the Intracoastal Waterway and ultimately the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet.

Engineers have temporarily patched all five of the breaches in sea walls around the city that are designed to keep water at bay. In addition to the Inner Harbor Navigation Channel, breaches also occurred at the 17th Street Canal and the London Avenue Canal.

Progress is being made in removing standing water from the city. The Army reports that about 6.5 billion gallons are being pumped out each day. Col. Duane Gapinski, who was appointed Sunday to run the "dewatering" team the Army has set up, estimates that the city should be dried out by mid-October at the latest.

Engineers Say A Key Levee Won't Be Set For Months (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - Hurricane Katrina washed away a 17-foot-tall earthen levee that had protected St. Bernard Parish, east of New Orleans, from the waters of a shipping canal, and the Army Corps of Engineers said Tuesday that the ravaged parish would be left defenseless against even small storms at least until early next year because replacing the structure would take months.

In a conference call with reporters, Col. Duane P. Gapinski of the corps acknowledged that the levee might not be rebuilt even by the start of next year's hurricane season.

On the other hand, Colonel Gapinski and other corps officials said, at this point there is little for the levee to protect. "St. Bernard Parish is complete destruction," he said.

Local authorities have ordered the parish evacuated and have said no one will be allowed to return for four months.

"It's going to take longer than four months to rebuild that levee, a lot longer than four months," even to restore it to the level of protection it afforded before the hurricane, Colonel Gapinski said. "But it's going to take a lot longer than four months to rebuild St. Bernard Parish."

The parish, which unlike New Orleans lies above sea level, was protected by the levee from the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet, a canal built by the corps that is now a subject of scrutiny. Completion of the canal four decades ago allowed saltwater intrusion that, the corps acknowledges, was a factor in the death of marshes that once helped protect the city from storm surges. Some experts say the canal may also have provided an express lane for the Aug. 29 surge to reach populated areas.

Corps officials report progress in pumping out floodwaters from New Orleans and adjacent areas. The city is now 50 percent inundated, they said Tuesday, from a high of 80 percent, with 27 permanent pumps and 46 temporary pumps moving a daily total of seven billion to eight billion gallons.

The corps on Tuesday stuck to its estimate of "dewatering" the main part of New Orleans by Oct. 2, and the East New Orleans section and St. Bernard Parish - barring new flooding - by Oct. 8. Plaquemines Parish will be dry by Oct. 18, the corps said.

Officials also reported that the Mississippi River was now open to deep-draft navigation along its entire length, although a small part of the southern end is limited to daylight transit because some aids to navigation have not yet been replaced.

Canal May Have Worsened City's Flooding (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

On May 19, Hassan Mashriqui addressed a roomful of emergency planners and warned of a "critical and fundamental flaw" in the coastal defenses for New Orleans. Mashriqui, a computer modeler at Louisiana State University's Hurricane Center, singled out the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet, a 40-year-old shipping canal aimed at the city's gut.

For years, local residents had decried the little-used canal as a "hurricane highway" that would deliver massive storm surges into their neighborhoods.

But now Mashriqui was offering proof. His hydrodynamic modeling showed that a "funnel" created by the Gulf Outlet and a nearby waterway would amplify storm surges by 20 to 40 percent. He described the funnel as "Crescent City's Trojan Horse," carrying the Gulf of Mexico's waters into the city.

"I showed how dangerous that outlet was -- there was no ambiguity," says Mashriqui, who came to the United States after a tropical cyclone devastated his native Bangladesh. "And now it's all come true."

Authorities have not yet concluded what caused the drowning of New Orleans, and most attention has focused on two breached floodwalls near Lake Pontchartrain, to the city's north. But now experts believe that the initial flooding that overwhelmed St. Bernard Parish and the Lower Ninth Ward of New Orleans came from the Gulf Outlet, a channel that was an ecological and economic disappointment long before Hurricane Katrina.

Satellite images show that levees along the outlet were severely damaged by storm surges. Flyovers by the Army Corps of Engineers have revealed a path of destruction consistent with Mashriqui's theory that the Outlet provided a pathway for storm surges from the Gulf and neighboring Lake Borgne.

Mashriqui had warned that the confluence of the MRGO and the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway created a funnel that would direct storm surges into the New Orleans Industrial Canal and on into St. Bernard Parish. On the Friday before Katrina made landfall, the parish's state senator, Walter Boasso, complained at a congressional hearing that the federal government was "playing Russian roulette" with his constituents.

Katrina's first storm surges apparently shot up the Gulf Outlet and neighboring Lake Borgne from the southeast, then overtopped levees along the Outlet and the Industrial Canal. The floodwaters eventually breached the Industrial Canal's levees, and officials believe a large portion of the Outlet's levees have been destroyed as well.

"That funnel was a back door into New Orleans," said G. Paul Kemp, an oceanographer at the LSU Hurricane Center. "I don't think there's much doubt that was the initial cause of the disaster."

In 1965, the Corps of Engineers completed the MRGO -- pronounced "Mr. Go" locally -- which was a larger dirt-moving project than the Panama Canal. It was designed as a 76-mile shipping shortcut from the Gulf of Mexico to the Port of New Orleans that would give cargo ships an alternative to the sinuous Mississippi River.

But less than 3 percent of the port's cargo -- fewer than one ship per day -- passes through it. MRGO's freight totals had dropped by half since 1994, while the port's had increased overall. But the Corps still spent $13 million dredging the canal last year.

Critics have calculated the cost to taxpayers at more than $12,000 per vessel per day, and the Outlet has destroyed or damaged more than 20,000 acres of adjacent wetlands.

Shirley Laska, director of the Center for Hazards Assessment, Response and Technology at the University of New Orleans, says local flood-control meetings have been dominated for years by complaints about the Outlet, but nothing has changed.

Before Katrina, the Corps was already studying whether to close the canal. The initial conclusion was no, but the Bush administration ordered the agency to redo its analysis.

The main advocates for the channel were the Port of New Orleans and its supporters in the Corps of Engineers and in Louisiana's congressional delegation. "You had the people of St. Bernard Parish against the Port of New Orleans," Boasso said at a community meeting Monday. "And the Port of New Orleans had the clout."

Port Director Gary LaGrange said "the jury is still out" on whether MRGO contributed to Katrina's devastation. But he said the port would have been willing to give up the Outlet if the Corps had completed a $750 million project to expand a lock on the Industrial Canal, another little-used shipping channel.

Most ships heading to New Orleans use the Mississippi River, but LaGrange said many local businesses rely on the alternative routes, including America's largest chicken exporter -- which now has 5 million pounds of rotting meat on its hands.

In any case, LaGrange said, the city would never have drowned if Congress had authorized levees protecting it from a Category 5 hurricane, instead of a Category 3.

"We've been stuffing a 250-pound body into 180-pound pants," he said. "That's your problem right there."

But in 1998, the St. Bernard Parish Council unanimously called for the channel's closing. In 2002, an LSU study noted that "locally, the MRGO is perceived as a superhighway for storm surge because of the channel's susceptibility to inundation by tropical storms and hurricanes." In 2004, a federally funded simulation drill called Hurricane Pam concluded that surges from a Category 3 hurricane would overwhelm the MRGO "funnel," flood surrounding areas and kill tens of thousands of people.

Mashriqui has dedicated his career to preventing a repetition of the Bangladesh catastrophe, and after the grim experience of the Hurricane Pam study, he became an evangelist for building a floodgate across the throat of the funnel.

When he spoke to emergency responders at the Metairie, La., library on "Hurricane Vulnerability Modeling for Southeast Louisiana," the next speaker was an Army Corps engineer. But he said Corps officials told him they could not study anything that was not in their congressional authorization. One colleague at the Hurricane Center predicted that nothing would happen until hundreds of people died.

"I told everyone: If New Orleans is a boat, here are the holes," Mashriqui said. "This is my passion; I don't want people to die in hurricanes. But nobody did anything."

Several current and former Corps of Engineers employees say the Corps' New Orleans district was reluctant to give up MRGO.

In recent years, Corps officials have spoken about closing it. But last year, they estimated their "project capability" for dredging the outlet at a whopping $38 million, signaling their desire to keep it open. "The general feeling was: 'There's no way we're closing that,' " says one biologist who left the district this year. "They wanted all the business they could get."

John Paul Woodley Jr., the assistant Army secretary who oversees the Corps, said the Bush administration had to instruct the agency to restart its study of whether to close the channel, because it hadn't taken into account the channel's destruction of wetlands, even though it was conducting a separate study of a $14 billion project to restore Louisiana's coastal wetlands. Woodley said there was also concern that further erosion could merge the channel with Lake Borgne -- which happened after Katrina.

Yesterday, Woodley pointedly declined to rule out the possibility that MRGO contributed to the tragedy of Katrina. "I've heard those concerns, and I wouldn't discount them," he said.

Woodley cautioned that the investigation of the catastrophe has just begun, but many scientists, environmentalists and St. Bernard Parish officials said they do not need a forensic investigation by the Corps of Engineers to know that their warnings have come true. Larry Ingargiola, the head of emergency management in St. Bernard, said he knows exactly why only 52 of its 28,000 structures made it through Katrina unscathed.

"That's where the damn water came -- right up MRGO," he said. "We've been screaming about it for years. I don't know how many politicians I've taken on tours. But there it is."

Death Toll In Louisiana Climbs Past 400 (AJC/AP)

By Adam Nossiter, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Hurricane Katrina's death toll in Louisiana jumped by more than half Tuesday to 423 as recovery workers turned more of their attention to gathering up and counting the corpses in a city all but emptied out of the living.

The state Health Department announced the new death toll, which represented a sharp increase from 279 a day before.

The number of dead is all but certain to rise, because some flooded-out areas of the city have not been fully searched. But how high it might go is unclear.

Mayor Ray Nagin said earlier this month that New Orleans could have 10,000 dead. But a street-by-street sweep of the city last week yielded far fewer bodies than feared, and authorities said the toll could be well below the dire projections. They offered no specific estimates.

DOJ_NMG_0005357

Up until the past few days, authorities were slow to release numbers, saying they were concentrating on rescuing the living first. Rescuers reported pushing corpses aside, or tying them down to banisters or roofs for others to collect later.

As of Monday at least 236 people were reported dead elsewhere along the Gulf Coast, most of them in Mississippi.

"Let me caution everyone: We have not done the secondary searches in the areas where the water was the highest. So we still have a lot of work to do, and those numbers probably will go up," Nagin said Tuesday.

Over the weekend, at least 44 patients found dead at a flooded-out hospital.

Dr. Frank Minyard, the Orleans Parish coroner, suggested that further such discoveries are possible as the floodwaters recede.

"There just may be a lot of people who are still down in those deep waters, and some of waters were 10, 12, 15 feet deep," he said. "My biggest fear is that we will find something down there that is way out of proportion. Hopefully, it doesn't happen, but we worry."

The updated Louisiana numbers were released as Gov. Kathleen Blanco lashed out at the federal government, accusing it of moving too slowly in recovering the bodies.

The dead "deserve more respect than they have received," she said.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, who took charge of the hurricane rescue efforts last week, said Tuesday that federal agencies involved had been meeting their mission to recover the remains quickly "and to treat them with the dignity and respect they deserve."

But Blanco said FEMA has slowed down the process by failing to sign a contract with the company hired to handle the removal of the bodies, Houston-based Kenyon International Emergency Services. Kenyon is working without a contract but threatened to pull its workers out of Louisiana unless either the state or the federal government offered it a signed agreement, Blanco said. Calls to Kenyon were not immediately returned.

"No one, even those at the highest level, seems to be able to break through the bureaucracy to get this important mission done," Blanco said.

Troops Returning To Duties (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 - In a sign that initial rescue efforts after Hurricane Katrina are coming to an end, Pentagon officials said late Tuesday that about 4,000 active-duty troops, two large Navy vessels and three dozen helicopters ordered into the relief effort would return to their regular duties.

Officials said a sizable active-duty contingent remained, including the approximately 5,200 ground soldiers from the 82nd Airborne Division and the First Cavalry Division. At the height of the effort, more than 20,000 active-duty troops were committed to hurricane relief, military officials said.

Some Forces To Be Pulled From Storm Relief (AJC/AP)

By Robert Burns, Ap Military Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is preparing to pull back some active-duty forces it sent to Mississippi and Louisiana in the early aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, even as it sends in some new groups for specialized work like the processing of corpses and aerial spraying for disease-carrying mosquitos.

The role of active-duty forces, including Navy ships like the aircraft carrier USS Harry S. Truman and Army ground combat units like the 82nd Airborne Division, may diminish within days or weeks, officials said Tuesday.

Maj. Gen. Bill Caldwell, commander of the 82nd Airborne, said on Monday in New Orleans that it appeared the search for city residents who still want assistance could be completed within 10 days. He said it remained to be determined by state and federal civilian authorities what tasks his soldiers would be assigned after that.

As the Army's premier quick-response force with important wartime roles in Iraq and Afghanistan, the 82nd Airborne seems unlikely to stay in New Orleans for an extended period. The first of the 3,800 soldiers it has in New Orleans began arriving Sept. 3 from Fort Bragg, N.C.

Operating with the 82nd Airborne are about 1,400 soldiers from the 1st Cavalry Division, based at Fort Hood, Texas.

National Guard troops under the direct control of Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco are expected to remain on the scene much longer, although likely on rotations of one month or less.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Tuesday there are about 45,800 National Guard troops and about 22,400 active-duty personnel participating in recovery operations in Mississippi and Louisiana, plus about 1,900 Reserves.

DOJ_NMG_0005358

While traveling in Europe, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Tuesday the search-and-rescue portion of the military's mission on the hurricane-battered Gulf Coast is about over.

"Some helicopters can undoubtedly be moved out over the period ahead," Rumsfeld told reporters. He stressed that nothing would be withdrawn without authorization by the two states' governors and the president.

The Pentagon's internal news service quoted Rumsfeld as also saying the Navy's dock landing ship USS Whidbey Island, which brought bridging equipment and supplies to the region, would be departing. Some sailors from the Whidbey Island went ashore at Biloxi, Miss., on Sept. 8 to deliver goods and help in other ways.

The Truman aircraft carrier, which deployed from its home port at Norfolk, Va., three days after Katrina struck the Gulf Coast and arrived in waters off Mississippi on Sept. 4, was another candidate for an early return home, officials said.

Rumsfeld said there is a large surplus of hospital beds for victims of Katrina, so those could also be decreased. The USNS Comfort, a hospital ship based at Baltimore, arrived off the Mississippi coast late last week.

The Pentagon's internal news service said Rumsfeld approved the Federal Emergency Management Agency's request that the military take over the mortuary affairs mission in New Orleans. It reported that nine mortuary affairs teams from the 54th Quartermaster Company at Fort Lee, Va., were preparing to deploy to the region, and that nine other teams from that unit are on alert and are ready to deploy if ordered.

C-130 transport planes with the Air Force Reserve's 910th Air Wing began mosquito-spraying operations in St. Bernard and Jefferson parishes in New Orleans.

Officials Fear Texas May Have To Foot Bill (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON – The bills are piling up: rent, police overtime, meals, transportation, hospital beds. Texas is already spending hundreds of millions of dollars caring for Katrina victims – but exactly how much may not be known for weeks.

And as they start tallying costs, state officials are becoming increasingly worried that despite a federal disaster declaration, Washington will leave Texas taxpayers stuck with huge bills.

The biggest items not yet covered by Congress: up to $450 million for schools and as much as $400 million for health coverage for the 205,000 evacuees thought to be in Texas.

"Are we concerned? Yes," Gov. Rick Perry's spokesman, Robert Black, said Tuesday after the latest in a series of meetings between state and local leaders and federal emergency officials. "We are not completely comfortable with the federal response in terms of education and Medicaid."

Mr. Black noted that Texas still hasn't received $2 million it sought from the Federal Emergency Management Agency after Tropical Storm Allison four years ago.

Direct costs for states that took in evacuees include Medicaid, welfare payments, unemployment coverage, housing and public safety. Many of these costs will be completely covered by federal disaster funding, though there will be headaches along the way.

"It's going to be a huge accounting process," said William Ayres, Texas Emergency Management Agency spokesman. "We don't even have ballpark estimates."

At last count, Texas schools had enrolled 33,000 evacuee students, and the state's education commissioner, Shirley Neeley, said she expected as many as 60,000. The annual cost per pupil is about $7,500.

The other big-ticket item is Medicaid. Albert Hawkins, chief of the Texas Health and Human Services Commission, estimated that Katrina could add $85 million a month to the state's Medicaid bill. The federal government covers 61 percent. So unless Congress steps in, Texas taxpayers could be forced to absorb nearly $400 million over the next year.

And there are smaller items. Emergency food stamps have gone to about 110,000 families who sought refuge in Texas. The federal government pays for the stamps but splits administrative costs 50-50 with states. U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt has assured Texas officials that he would work to find funding to cover that extra burden.

President Bush's Sept. 2 disaster declaration made Texas eligible for full reimbursement on a range of outlays. But many of the costs associated with long-term resettlement aren't covered.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, said that inevitably, some evacuees would end up as Texas residents, so the state will have to accept responsibility. "We will have to come up with some arbitrary timeframe," he said.

On Monday, Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison introduced legislation to ensure that states get repaid fully for at least six months on Medicaid and children's health coverage. Her Texas counterpart, Sen. John Cornyn, is a co-sponsor, and he is also pushing for federal funding for education and health care costs, as are other Texans.

Meanwhile, costs are mounting for school districts, cities and counties.

The Dallas school district, with an enrollment topping 160,000, has taken in 1,248 evacuees at 134 schools – roughly doubling the number of new students. But as soon as they start attending classes, the district starts collecting money from the state based on average daily attendance.

Dallas City Manager Mary Suhm said the city has kept meticulous records of supplies bought and overtime paid, especially to police officers who've staffed the city's evacuee shelters by the dozen. Officials haven't tallied the costs, but they do expect full reimbursement through FEMA.

El Paso officials said the city had spent $475,000. San Antonio officials say they expect to spend $1 million on food and shelter for evacuees, and Bexar County officials say they've spent more than $1 million already, mostly on health care and sheriff personnel. In Houston, police overtime alone is estimated at $1 million.

Last week, Ken Welch, director of fiscal management at the state comptroller's office, urged state agency heads to keep careful records, on the assumption that Congress will issue refunds.

Other states are struggling with the price tag, too.

"Even the categories are still up in the air," said Bill Wyatt, spokesman for the National Council of State Legislators. "We don't know how many lives have been affected."

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Tuesday signed legislation allowing California to join 47 states in a pact to provide rescue responders and other resources to disaster locations.

California's firefighters had balked at the Emergency Management Assistance Compact out of fear that they would have less legal protection and reduced death and disability benefits if they were hurt while assisting in another state.

After a prolonged standoff, Schwarzenegger and Democratic legislators, in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, fashioned a compromise that protects the firefighters.

The Schwarzenegger administration said that without membership in the compact, California had to negotiate individual arrangements with other states, potentially delaying response times.

The legislation, AB 823, was sponsored by Assemblyman Pedro Nava (D-Santa Barbara).

Owners Of Nursing Home Charged (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 13 -- Louisiana authorities charged the owners of a New Orleans area nursing home with negligent homicide Tuesday after 34 patients perished in the facility in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

On a day in which Louisiana's death toll escalated to 423, state Attorney General Charles C. Foti Jr. said the owners of St. Rita's nursing home in St. Bernard Parish had been warned repeatedly by government officials and the news media that Katrina was coming, and also declined to evacuate the patients when asked if they wanted to do so. "In effect, their inaction resulted in the deaths of these patients," he said.

Foti announced the charges against the owners, Mable B. Mangano, 62, and Salvador A. Mangano, 65, at a late-afternoon news conference here. He said they had turned themselves in and had been booked on 34 counts of negligent homicide at the East Baton Rouge Parish jail.

Foti also said the state would investigate the deaths of 45 patients whose bodies were discovered Monday at Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans, as well as any other instances in which negligence may have led to the deaths of senior citizens or others unable to care for themselves.

"I'm going to look at every place in the affected area where patients died of unnatural causes," he said. A hospital or health care facility with "people that can't make a free choice because they are sick or unable to care for themselves has a duty to provide for their safety."

Bob Habans, an attorney for the Manganos, said they are "completely innocent." He said the couple and their children and grandchildren had attempted to evacuate residents, and had saved 50 people at the nursing home. "When all of the facts come out, everyone will know that they were heroes in this tragedy," he said.

As state officials issued an updated death toll, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) once again ripped into the Federal Emergency Management Agency for not moving more rapidly to collect the bodies of those who died in the storm and its aftermath.

Saying she had expressed her "absolute frustration" to federal authorities about the pace of recovering bodies, Blanco told reporters, "I cannot stand by while this vital operation is not being handled appropriately." She said the state signed a contract with a body-recovery company that had been in prolonged discussions with FEMA to do the same work.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, the on-scene federal coordinator of disaster relief, responded in a written statement: "The state has always maintained direct control over the mortuary process following this tragedy. We are committed to a process that treats the victims of Katrina with dignity and respect and accomplishes the mission as quickly as possible. We will work with state officials on what they believe to be the best solution for their constituents."

Meanwhile, there were additional signs of recovery along the battered Gulf Coast. Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport resumed limited commercial service with the arrival of a Northwest Airlines flight that carried only about 30 passengers, including federal emergency relief officials. The Port of New Orleans was due to handle its first ship since before the hurricane hit on the morning of Aug. 29 -- well ahead of predictions that it could be out of business for months.

The overall death toll from the storm topped more than 640 on Tuesday, including 218 in Mississippi and a few deaths in Alabama. In Louisiana, the number of confirmed dead leapt from 279 to 423, and officials in New Orleans said many more bodies are likely to be found as waters recede an average of one city block a day and allow them to reach neighborhoods that experienced the most severe flooding. State mortuary workers said they were ramping up their manpower in New Orleans on Tuesday to remove more bodies.

A California National Guard unit looking for bodies rescued an unconscious and emaciated Edgar Hollingsworth, 74, from his house, and doctors said they expected him to survive, the Orange County Register reported.

As the work shifts from rescue and evacuation of the living toward the recovery of remains, the U.S. military has begun planning for withdrawing some of the 68,000 troops, 21 ships and dozens of aircraft from the Gulf Coast region, senior military officials said.

A large-scale troop pullout is already underway in Mississippi, with all of the several thousand out-of-state National Guard forces there scheduled to depart within eight to 10 days, Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore, commander of Joint Task Force Katrina, said in an interview.

Military forces are expected to remain longer in Louisiana, but with the primary search effort in New Orleans expected to be completed by Wednesday, thousands of troops are expected to start departing within weeks, according to FEMA and military officials.

"It will be weeks, not months," when active-duty soldiers begin departing Louisiana, said Brig. Gen. Mark A. Graham, deputy commanding general of the 5th U.S. Army. About 7,200 active-duty troops, including 5,200 soldiers and 2,000 Marines, are engaged in relief work.

Honore said that as lifesaving missions such as search and rescue, providing food and water, and medical evacuation wind down, so will the military presence. He said some helicopter crews are already departing, including those from the 4th Infantry Division, which is preparing to return to Iraq.

In terms of providing security, Honore indicated that the city has an adequate law enforcement presence without federal troops. But Honore and other officials said the military is likely to stay to assist the city with planning, logistics and basic services until it can bring back a full contingent of municipal workers. "Until we've got these city workers back, we've got to keep the city running," he said.

One military unit winding up its mission Tuesday was a contingent of the 20th Special Forces Group, which has rescued nearly 8,000 New Orleans residents using inflated Zodiac boats since the flood hit. The unit, trained to partner closely with indigenous forces abroad, used those skills to help organize the search effort for the New Orleans Police Department.

Now, its officers say, the police are ready to work on their own. "We think they'll be on their feet in the next two days. They'll be able to handle it and we'll pull out," said Warrant Officer Bruce Erick, from a 20th Special Forces Group team based in Birmingham. The team helped the police carry out a systematic search plan.

As recovery efforts continued, FEMA's newly named acting director, R. David Paulison, spoke to reporters in Washington and said he will examine later the lessons learned from FEMA's failures.

"I can't deal with what happened in the last two weeks, but I can tell you, from this point forward, we are going to be focusing on the victims of this hurricane," he said. "But we've had a hurricane of unimaginable proportions, and we're going to deal with it. We're going to get those people out of shelters, and we're going to move and get them the help that they need."

At the same news conference, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff once again praised Michael D. Brown, who resigned as FEMA director on Monday after being yanked back to Washington amid withering reviews of the agency's performance the first week of the disaster. "As I said previously, I believe Mike Brown did everything that was within his capability to manage this crisis effectively," he said.

Owners Of Nursing Home Charged In Deaths Of 34 (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan And Al Baker

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 13 - The owners of a nursing home where 34 people died in the floodwaters that inundated the New Orleans area were charged Tuesday with multiple counts of negligent homicide, shortly after a new dispute broke out between the State of Louisiana and the federal government over the retrieval of hundreds of other bodies.

Mable B. Mangano and her husband, Salvatore A. Mangano Sr., owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home in Violet, just east of New Orleans, turned themselves in after the charges were filed, Attorney General Charles C. Foti Jr. said. He said the couple had not acted on several warnings to move the residents as Hurricane Katrina approached.

"They were warned repeatedly, both by the media and by the St. Bernard Parish emergency preparation people, that the storm was coming," Mr. Foti said at a news conference here. "In effect, I think that their inactions resulted in the death of these people."

The charges represent the first major prosecution to emerge in the hurricane's aftermath.

The legal action came as the pace of recovery of the storm's other casualties increased. Louisiana authorities said the number of confirmed dead in the state increased to 423, a substantial rise from the 279 reported on Monday. Bob Johannessen, a spokesman for the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, said the number of confirmations was expected to rise each day.

Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said the pace of recoveries should have been much faster, however, and accused the Federal Emergency Management Agency of slowing the retrieval of the dead to the point where the contractor responsible for that work had threatened to pull out.

After days of news reports of bodies in the streets of New Orleans, Ms. Blanco, with palpable frustration, said the state would bypass FEMA and sign its own contract with the company, Kenyon Worldwide Disaster Management.

"In recent days, I have spoken with FEMA officials and administration officials to convey my absolute frustration regarding the lack of urgency and the lack of respect involving the recovery of our people whose lives were lost as a result of Hurricane Katrina," Ms. Blanco said at a news conference in Baton Rouge. "We have pleaded for contract resolution. In death, as in life, our people deserve more respect than they have received."

FEMA officials responded by saying that the recovery of bodies was a state responsibility, while the federal role was to assist state officials.

"The state has always maintained direct control over the mortuary process following this tragedy," Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen of the Coast Guard, who is directing FEMA efforts in the region, said in a written statement. "We are committed to a process that treats the victims of Katrina with dignity and respect and accomplishes the mission as quickly as possible. We will work with state officials on what they believe to be the best solution for their constituents."

Kenyon officials said they had been struggling under cumbersome conditions to execute a task that gets grislier by the day. The company, which has a contract with FEMA to respond when called, arrived Sept. 1 but was not asked to begin recovering bodies until Sept. 6, said Bill Berry, a company spokesman.

The company's 100 or so workers have bunked in a funeral home in Baton Rouge, forcing them to drive four hours round-trip each day, and Kenyon officials said they had repeatedly asked for living quarters in New Orleans.

On Sunday, Kenyon officials told FEMA that they would not enter into a contract with the agency and would pull out as soon as a replacement was found, Mr. Berry said.

Mr. Berry said the company was already responding to Ms. Blanco's request that it increase its staffing even before the new contract was completed. "We just keep moving the cots a little closer together," he said.

Mr. Berry said he did not consider it appropriate to discuss why the company did not want to continue working under FEMA. But he had high praise for the state, which reached out to Kenyon after the company notified FEMA on Sunday that it would not accept a contract.

"I can't say enough about the Louisiana state people," Mr. Berry said. "They heard our problems, and they simply fixed them. It's beautiful to see a general sitting there from the National Guard saying, 'I can do that,' and it's done."

In an effort to explain why Kenyon may have walked away from a federal contract, a senior official from the Department of Homeland Security, who would not allow his name to be used because the department had already issued an official statement, said Tuesday that the state's proposed contract was "less detailed than the plan we were negotiating" and had four provisions compared with nine that FEMA had wanted.

For example, the official said the federal proposal would have required that the Kenyon employees have specialized training and use personal protective gear and have appropriate security, provisions that the federal official said were not included in the state contract.

Mr. Berry declined to respond, except to say that the company had 76 years of experience in disasters. It was hired in the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001, and last year's tsunami. "We will let our record speak for itself," he said.

Kenyon - a unit of Service Corporation International, a giant funeral company - operates worldwide and handled preservation of remains after the World Trade Center attacks and the cleanup of mass graves in Iraq under government contracts. The company, which is based in Houston, has contributed heavily to President Bush's campaigns. The chairman and founder of the company is Robert L. Waltrip, a longtime friend of the Bush family and a trustee of the George Bush Presidential Library Foundation.

In New Orleans, anger over the slow collection of bodies, which officials say has been hampered by floodwater and debris, still smoldered. Dr. Brobson Lutz, a former health director for the City of New Orleans, led an impromptu and morbid tour on Tuesday that he said reflected the extent to which those who perished had been neglected.

It included a nursing home on Dauphine Street, where three bodies had stayed until Dr. Brobson had mentioned them on Fox News, and the kitchen area of his own office, where he wiped at blood from the body of Michael Lala, the owner of Old N'Awlins Cookery. Mr. Lala had died from heart failure a week after the storm, but the authorities did not respond to requests to pick up the body, Dr. Brobson said, so he stored it in his office for a week until it finally was collected on Tuesday morning.

"FEMA couldn't get the live people out in time and they can't get the dead people out in time," Dr. Brobson said. "They failed the living and the dead."

The residents of St. Rita's did not have to die, Attorney General said, and he warned that other nursing homes that failed to remove residents also faced prosecution.

Local officials had ordered a mandatory evacuation amid news reports about the approach of the storm, Mr. Foti said. Because St. Rita's was licensed as a Medicaid facility, it had an evacuation plan in place, but it did not use it, he said.

In addition to the mandatory evacuation order, officials offered to send two buses to the nursing home, but Mr. Foti said the Manganos declined that offer. Also, the owners had an agreement with an ambulance company, signed in April, to provide ambulances to evacuate special-needs patients, but "they were never called," Mr. Foti said.

At least two drowning victims at the home could have been family members who went to the scene or people who took refuge there, he said, adding that the remains were being identified.

James A. Cobb, the lawyer for the Manganos, said that they were not guilty of the charges and that they were unaware a mandatory evacuation order had been issued. Mr. Cobb said that if the patients - some on feeding tubes, oxygen and in need of medication - had been put on a bus for 12 hours to evacuate, "people are going to die."

A deputy at the East Baton Rouge jail said the Manganos had posted a bond of $50,000 and were expected to be released.

La. Nursing Home Owners Charged In Deaths (AJC/AP)

By Doug Simpson, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. — The husband-and-wife owners of a nursing home near New Orleans were charged Tuesday with negligent homicide in the deaths of 34 people during the flooding unleashed by Hurricane Katrina. The case represents the first major prosecution to come out of the disaster.

The owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home in Chalmette "were asked if they wanted to move (the patients). They did not. They were warned repeatedly that this storm was coming," Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti said.

"In effect, their inaction resulted in the deaths of these patients," Foti said.

Salvador A. Mangano and his wife, Mable, surrendered and were jailed on 34 counts of negligent homicide. They posted bond of $50,000 each later Tuesday. Each count carries up to five years in prison.

The attorney general said he is also investigating the discovery of more than 40 corpses at flooded-out Memorial Medical Center, in New Orleans' Uptown section.

The Manganos' attorney, Jim Cobb, said his Tuesday night that his clients are innocent, and he blamed St. Bernard Parish officials for not ensuring an evacuation plan was proceeding.

The nursing home owners had to make a difficult decision between evacuating the patients, many of them elderly and on feeding tubes, or keeping them at the home and weathering the storm, Cobb said.

"If you pull that trigger too soon those people are going to die," he said. Three people from another nursing home had died during the evacuation ahead of the hurricane.

DOJ_NMG_0005363

The Manganos had an evacuation plan as required under state law, both their attorney and the attorney general said.

But Foti said the nursing home had a contract with an ambulance service to evacuate the patients, but the owners didn't call the company. They also turned down an offer from St. Bernard Parish officials who asked if the nursing home wanted help evacuating, he said.

The victims at St. Rita's died Aug. 29, the day the hurricane hit, and on Sept. 6, at least 14 unrecognizable bodies were still inside the nursing home, the New York Times reported last week.

St. Bernard Parish Councilman Ricky Melerine said the water rose 3 feet in 15 minutes that morning and then even faster, the Times said.

Several men tried to rescue the nursing home's residents by floating them out on mattresses, and others were able to walk to a school, the Times said. In all, the home had about 60 residents.

There were apparent efforts to fight the incoming water inside St. Rita's. A table was nailed against a window and a couch was pushed up against a door, the Times said. There was also evidence that water had reached the roof.

Tom Rodrigue, whose mother died in the nursing home, was angry Tuesday and near tears.

"She deserved the chance, you know, to be rescued instead of having to drown like a rat," he told CNN.

Foti said the bodies have not all been identified and he was not sure how many of the victims were patients or staff.

"They had a duty and a standard of care to people who could not care for themselves," Foti said of the owners. "If you or I decided we are going to stay, we do it of our own free will. ... The people at the nursing home don't have that choice."

Louisiana Charges Nursing Home Owners With Negligent Homicide (KRT)

By Chris Gray, Brandon Bailey And Scott Dodd

Knight Ridder, September 14, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. - Hurricane Katrina killed them, but the Louisiana attorney general said Tuesday that he's also holding the owners of a nursing home responsible for the deaths of 34 victims, mostly elderly, found after the storm.

People in St. Rita's Nursing Home, in a small town southeast of New Orleans, tried to fight the rising floodwaters by blocking windows and lashing themselves together with rope, but they lost their battle when water reached the roof.

Attorney General Charles Foti said Salvador and Mable Mangano, a married couple who owned the facility, turned themselves in to authorities on Tuesday and have been charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide.

The nursing home had a contract with an ambulance company to evacuate residents, Foti said, but it didn't call for help. It also turned down offers from St. Bernard Parish to send buses.

"Their inaction resulted in the death of those people," Foti said. "They did not die of natural causes. They drowned."

In Washington, President Bush accepted responsibility for the federal government's failures in the aftermath of Katrina, as the death toll along the Gulf Coast climbed to more than 600.

After more than a week of White House refusals to play "the blame game," Bush acknowledged that mistakes were made and that the government's halting, disorganized response raised questions about the country's ability to cope with a terrorist attack.

"Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government," Bush said in a midday White House news conference. "To the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility."

Facing the lowest approval ratings of his presidency - a Newsweek poll found just 38 percent of Americans say he's doing a good job - Bush planned a prime-time speech from the disaster area on Thursday night.

"I want to know what went right and what went wrong," Bush said at a joint appearance Tuesday with the Iraqi president in Washington, "to answer that very question that you asked: Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm?"

Back in Baton Rouge, Foti said that some people at St. Rita's survived, including a man who got his elderly relative out of the facility by floating to safety on a mattress.

"Of all of this, that's the thing that hit the heart of most people," St. Bernard Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said of the nursing-home deaths. "I personally know two people who had their families in there and went to get them, and they were floating."

An attorney for the nursing home said the owners would fight the charges. "I can promise you there's another side of the story," lawyer Jim Cobb told CNN.

Dan Wagner came to the St. Bernard parish emergency operations center Tuesday looking for news about who was found in the nursing home. He couldn't find out what had happened to his 95-year-old grandmother, Mary Alma Wagner.

"They said they were going to evacuate her," he said. "We're just trying to find out if she's there. She's not on the list of the people brought out."

Foti said his office will also investigate other hospitals where bodies have been found, including Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans, to see if they died of anything other than natural causes.

About 45 bodies were removed from Memorial over the weekend. Hospital spokespeople said many elderly and sick people died at the flooded, powerless facility in the four days after the storm while doctors and nurses tried to keep them alive, waiting for rescuers who never came.

In the nation's capital, homeland security officials pledged a house cleaning of political appointees in top jobs who have little experience in disaster management, and more fingers were pointed in New Orleans over the snail's pace of retrieving bodies that litter the flood-ravaged city.

Meanwhile, the hard work of finding a place to live for thousands of now-homeless evacuees across the Gulf States promised to provide another major challenge for the government. The American Red Cross said thousands of people could be living in shelters for months.

State officials said the confirmed number of dead in Louisiana had reached 423, up from fewer than 200 last weekend. In Mississippi, emergency officials reported 218 deaths.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said workers haven't finished door-to-door searches for bodies in every sector of the city, so officials expect the death toll to rise. The grim job should be completed by week's end, he said.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld approved FEMA's request for the military to take over mortuary affairs in New Orleans. Nine mortuary affairs teams from the 54th Quartermaster Company at Fort Lee, Va., were preparing to go, and nine others are on alert.

Nagin said he's waiting for official results of an Environmental Protection Agency study of air and water quality. If the results are as good as he's heard, he hopes to open downtown New Orleans, the French Quarter and some neighborhoods to residents and businesses in the next few days.

In his first public statements, new acting FEMA chief R. David Paulison said he will focus on the hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast evacuees living in shelters, tents or their cars. He pledged to "get these people out of the shelters into some type of either semi-permanent or permanent housing."

The American Red Cross said nearly 7,000 people are housed at shelters in Mississippi, with 75,000 around the country. Most emergency shelters weren't meant to serve as homes for more than a night or two.

"We expect we'll be sheltering people for several months," said Red Cross spokesman Kevin Titus.

State and federal officials say they're scouring the Southeast for up to 300,000 trailers and mobile homes to serve as free or subsidized housing for as long as two years.

The government is also looking for spots to establish miniature "communities" of several thousand mobile homes, but locations with enough space and needed utilities are hard to come by.

"You've got to have a place to put `em," said Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour.

Some of the first trailers were delivered to an RV park in Biloxi, Miss., where some local families were moving in Tuesday and unpacking the few belongings they were able to salvage from the hurricane.

"It's wonderful just to have a place to say is yours," said Peggy Nitcavic, 57. The home where she grew up and later raised two sons was destroyed by Katrina.

Nursing Home Owners Charged With Negligent Homicide (LAT)

By Ashley Powers And Nicholas Riccardi

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Parts of this hurricane-devastated city could reopen by Monday, an upbeat Mayor C. Ray Nagin said today as officials announced the first homicide charges connected to the Hurricane Katrina disaster.

State Atty. Gen. Charles C. Foti Jr. announced today that the owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home in St. Bernard Parish had been charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide after 34 bodies were recovered at the facility.

Mable B. Mangano, 62, and Salvador A. Mangano Sr., 56, were each charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide and lodged in the East Baton Rouge Parish prison.

Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years incarceration.

"Thirty-four people drowned in a nursing home that should have been evacuated," Foti said.

The attorney general alleged that the Manganos declined to accept the two buses authorities had offered to send, and did not call an ambulance company they had contracted.

Officials discovered the bodies after the hurricane. They have yet to be identified, and could include staff members or relatives of patients, Foti said.

DOJ_NMG_0005365

Foti also said his office would investigate other nursing homes, hospitals and care facilities where bodies were found, including Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans, where 45 bodies were discovered.

The criminal charges came as officials grew optimistic more than two weeks after Katrina struck, killing at least hundreds, perhaps thousands, and causing tens of billions of dollars in damage.

Nagin held his first news conference in the city since the weekend and was noticeably upbeat.

"We are in a situation now where we are out of nuclear crisis mode and in regular crisis mode," he told reporters.

Both the airport and the port reopened today as crews continued to clean up the city that has been under floodwater since Katrina hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29. Waters still covered more than half of the city today.

But Nagin, cheered by a verbal report from federal Environmental Protection Agency officials, said some the driest and most famed parts of the city — the downtown business district, the French Quarter, Uptown and Algiers — will hopefully reopen to residents by Monday.

"We are bringing New Orleans back, we are bringing its culture back, we are bringing its music back," Nagin said. Glancing up at the military helicopters, he said: "I'm tired of hearing these helicopters. I want to hear some jazz."

He estimated that 100,000 to 150,000 residents could return to the four open districts, if air quality test results were good, but insisted that no one will be allowed to go to areas that are still wet. Nagin said he was sure the evacuees, scattered across the country, would want to return.

"I know New Orleanians, and once the beignets start cooking up again and the gumbo's in the pot, and the red beans and rice are being served on Monday, and not where they are, they'll be back," he said.

In the capital of Baton Rouge, the governor lashed out at the federal government, accusing the Federal Emergency Management Agency of moving too slowly to recover the bodies of those killed in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

At a speech this morning, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco expressed her "absolute frustration" with FEMA officials, whom she accused of moving too slowly.

"In death as in life, our people deserve more respect than they have received," Blanco said.

On an optimistic note, Blanco said she hoped to allow state buildings in seven parishes affected by Katrina to reopen next week.

Blanco said that the state would contract with Kenyon International of Houston to remove the bodies because Kenyon could not agree with FEMA on a contract.

"I have taken action today to resolve a matter that involves life, death and dignity," the governor said from a conference room at state police headquarters while surrounded by state elected officials.

"No one, even those at the highest level, seems to be able to break though the bureaucracy to get this important mission done.... I am angry and outranged," Blanco said.

Collecting bodies is the responsibility of the state with FEMA only in a supporting role, David Passey, a FEMA spokesman, said today of the delays in signing a contract. From the start, the state has been in charge of the effort to locate and transport the dead to morgues, he said.

"The collection of bodies is not normally a FEMA responsibility," Passey said.

The governor's press secretary, Denise Bottcher, said FEMA would need to approve the contract so that the state could be reimbursed, or the state would have to pay.

"What they're there for is to have someone with experience of a natural disaster or a terrorist attack," Bottcher said.

After observing a moment of silence for Hurricane Katrina's victims, the governor said that most New Orleans residents had heeded the call to evacuate because the death toll appeared to be in the hundreds, not thousands.

The official toll in Louisiana was 423, but was expected to rise.

Blanco announced that seven parishes would conditionally re-open Monday: Lafocorche, Livingston, St. Charles, St. John, St. Tammany, Tangipahoa and Washington. State offices there can be reopened.

Parishes still closed are Jefferson, Orleans, Plaquemines and St. Bernard.

With the cleanup of New Orleans continuing, Mayor Nagin said he will attempt to get Wal-Mart, Lowe's and Home Depot to open temporary retail areas near the convention center so returning residents can buy necessities. He warned that anyone trying to commit crimes would be dealt with harshly, noting that the streets were still full of military troops.

"This city is probably the safest it has been in many, many years," he said.

The mayor said the restoration would become easier now that what he called "the big daddy of all pumps," Pumping Station No. 6, came back online Monday.

Officials said only about 30 people were evacuated Monday and that all had previously been urged to leave by rescue workers. Because there were so few evacuees, there will no longer be airlifts from the city after today's flight departs.

DOJ_NMG_0005366

The first commercial passenger flights landed at New Orleans' international airport, named for jazz great and city native, Louis Armstrong.

There were two inbound flights from Memphis on Northwest and one Delta flight from Atlanta.

The Delta flight arrived with passengers but flew out empty. The two Northwest flights departed with passengers.

The airport, which until last night was a military bunkhouse filled with cots, looks like an airport again, but one filled with military personnel rather than passengers.

One passenger, Donna Brazile, a political science professor at Georgetown University, sat in a metal chair outside the Northwest terminal, waiting for a flight that would take her home to Washington DC.

Brazile came to New Orleans to help her family, who she said had lost everything in the storm. She said that her father had been evacuated to Texas and that she had gone after him, brought him back, and found him an apartment in the region.

She had been scheduled to fly out on one of the Northwest flights this morning, but was unable to get to the airport in time because of the military checkpoints along the road that slowed her down.

"I got lucky," she said. "Northwest put me on the next flight out. I'll get home, even though it will be late. I am not sure what I am going to do in the meantime. It's not like there are a lot of comfortable places to hang out in the airport right now."

Most shops in the airport remained closed, but one convenience type store was opened, anticipating that there would be passengers to serve.

The store was filled with dozens of military police, who browsed through clothing racks filled with pastel-colored New Orleans T-shirts. They stood around reading the first few pages of books designated New York Times bestsellers, and buying magazines that ranged from People and Vogue to Business Week. Most paid in cash, though the cashier said that the phone lines were up to take credit cards.

Pair Charged In 34 Deaths (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, September 14, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The owners of a nursing home where 34 residents are believed to have drowned during Hurricane Katrina were charged Tuesday with negligent homicide.

Before the storm arrived, St. Bernard Parish officials had asked the owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home — Salvadore Mangano Sr., 65, and his wife, Mabel, 62 — whether they wanted to move the residents, Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti said.

“They did not,” Foti said. “They were warned repeatedly that this storm was coming. In effect, their inaction resulted in the deaths of these patients.”

Neighbors described a horrible scene that unfolded on Aug. 29, the day Katrina hit. Floodwaters rose to the roof of the one-story nursing home in St. Bernard, outside New Orleans, trapping elderly and infirm residents inside. Neighbors came in boats and smashed a hole in the roof.

“We tried to get out as many as we could,” said Steve Snyder, 29, an oil rig worker. “All we could go by was the hollering and screaming, ‘Help, help!' ”

“We got 25 to 27 people out alive,” Snyder said. “And then we didn't hear anymore screaming, anymore people calling for help.”

The Manganos surrendered to authorities Tuesday and were charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide. Each count carries a maximum five years in prison. The two were released on $50,000 bond each.

A lawyer for the Manganos said they were being scapegoated. “They are completely innocent,” lawyer James Cobb said.

Cobb said the Manganos have a “spotless record” caring for the elderly and were presented with “a horrible choice” of risking the lives of patients on feeding tubes by evacuating them 70 miles away or keeping them at the facility. The Manganos contacted all relatives of the residents and told them of their plans to ride out the storm, he said. “To pick on these two people with the colossal failures of the federal, state and local government is out of bounds,” Cobb said.

The father of Steve Galladore, a St. Bernard Parish firefighter, was among the dead. Galladore said he talked to the Manganos three days before the storm and was assured they would evacuate. But when he talked to Salvadore Mangano a second time, the nursing home owner had changed his mind, he said.

“He was sure the levees were going to hold, and if he put people on the bus, there was a good chance of losing two or three people on the ride to Lafayette,” Galladore said.

Held Behind Walls In Katrina's Wake, They Also Serve (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

DOJ_NMG_0005367

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

BOGALUSA, La. -- James Cox plunged his scarred, rough hands into the ice bucket to fish out two bottles of Gatorade and handed them to Tammey Duncan. A resident of devastated Washington Parish, she was waiting in line at the emergency-aid station in an industrial park here.

Mr. Cox, a prisoner for nearly 30 years, is serving time for armed robbery at the Washington Correctional Institute. In the past two weeks, though, he has also been a first responder, one of dozens of inmates in orange jumpsuits who have been driving forklifts, clearing debris and handing out food and water to people living here near the Mississippi line.

As Louisiana digs out from Hurricane Katrina, convicts have been opening roads with axes and chainsaws and doing other useful work. At Angola State Penitentiary, near Baton Rouge, inmates produced mattresses for shelters. Some prisoners have even donated money from what little they are paid so evacuees can buy postage stamps.

"I've been a thug since 1966, and this feels good," said Mr. Cox, a brawny, tattooed 53-year-old. "When people come up and you look into their faces and see all the sadness, and then they thank you like you are the one giving this stuff to them, it makes you tear up."

Opened in 1983 to house 500 inmates, the Washington Correctional Institute now holds 1,200 men, most here on drug charges, and it employs 418 people, making it one of the largest employers in the parish. Since Katrina struck, this medium-security prison 70 miles north of New Orleans has sent scores of inmates every day with corrections officers to work in the parish. The jobs don't pay well -- 20 cents an hour, at best. But unlike the vast majority of the 43,900 people of this parish, the prisoners go back at day's end to hot showers, warm meals and electric lighting.

All of the prisoners who have been helping are "trusties," men who are given special privileges -- like getting to leave the prison grounds under supervision -- because of their exemplary disciplinary records.

The hurricane has resulted in neither riots nor escapes. Because the prison is surrounded by dense, forbidding woods, running away isn't much of an option. Indeed, since Katrina hit, the Louisiana state prison system has been relatively peaceful despite moving 8,000 inmates from prisons damaged by the hurricane to 13 different facilities.

In large part, that's because some of the prison authorities, such as Warden James Miller here at the Washington Correctional Institute, were a lot better prepared for the hurricane than state and federal authorities were.

On Aug. 29, the morning Katrina's eye passed about 30 miles east of here, prisoners huddled in the dorms watching the horizontal rain, listening as the gravel on the roof whipped off and shattered windshields a half-mile away. Heating units were torn off the buildings. About that time, two 10-foot-high fences topped with razor wire were breached by the storm.

While most inmates were locked in their cells, one crew of officers and trusties rushed to turn off a leaking main gas line. Fifty others, standing in the rain and wind, raised and welded the downed fence that confines them. As the storm began to subside, Warden Miller, who lives on the prison grounds, sent six crews of inmates and corrections officers out. Their instructions were to clear one lane on all the main roads in the parish.

As the men made their way out among downed power lines and roads littered with fallen trees, a radio call came in asking for help clearing the road to the emergency management center in Bogalusa. Another team from the prison headed that way with their axes, hatchets and saws to cut and move the downed trees from the roadway.

Mr. Miller, 50 years old, had his own personal emergency management plan in place. He had backup generators with a stockpile of fuel. The prison was already equipped with one of the largest food-storage facilities in the parish. It was so well stocked there was no chance food would run out and the prison was able to help out the school system, which had food in danger of spoiling.

The warden's biggest concern was gasoline to power the generators. As soon as the storm passed, Mr. Miller pulled out the satellite phone he had reserved for such emergencies and called Richard Stalder, the state's corrections chief, to arrange for additional fuel supplies. Mr. Miller has been able to give each of his workers 10 gallons of gas every two days so they can drive to work. Others, including a few officers, stayed over at a makeshift shelter on the prison grounds. "This isn't the kind of place where you can just let everybody take off work -- I've got to have them here," Mr. Miller said.

It has been hard for many inmates to grasp what has been happening outside the prison. About 85% of the inmates here are from the New Orleans area, and they had no access to news reports until the warden videotaped a newscast and played it on the prison's television system.

The TV rooms were silent as inmates crowded in. Darrell Johnson, 49, who has been here nine months for a parole violation, was watching the screen when he saw his neighborhood, then recognized his street and family home, all underwater. "I'm just hoping everybody got out safe," he said of his two brothers and two sisters. "You can't call because of the phone situation here, and there's no sense in writing a letter. The mail ain't got nowhere to go. I have no idea what shelter they went to or even what city they might be in."

Pausing while he moved pallets of baby formula, Keshawn Patterson, 27, said, "We can't help our families … At least doing this, helping, it takes your mind off it for a while."

A challenge for the prison is finding the families of prisoners who are soon to be released. The institute has already located the families of 180 prisoners and will continue to make calls and to use the Red Cross and other means to try to find them. The state still needs to figure out how to keep track of inmates on parole or probation should they leave Louisiana -- and to coordinate with other states.

Meanwhile, to keep operations here normal, Mr. Miller hasn't canceled regular visiting days. And letters will go into the files of inmates who have helped out in the hurricane relief effort, intended to help the men when they come up for parole..

DeLay Declares 'Victory' In War On Budget Fat (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay said yesterday that Republicans have done so well in cutting spending that he declared an "ongoing victory," and said there is simply no fat left to cut in the federal budget.

Mr. DeLay was defending Republicans' choice to borrow money and add to this year's expected $331 billion deficit to pay for Hurricane Katrina relief. Some Republicans have said Congress should make cuts in other areas, but Mr. DeLay said that doesn't seem possible.

"My answer to those that want to offset the spending is sure, bring me the offsets, I'll be glad to do it. But nobody has been able to come up with any yet," the Texas Republican told reporters at his weekly briefing.

Asked if that meant the government was running at peak efficiency, Mr. DeLay said, "Yes, after 11 years of Republican majority we've pared it down pretty good."

Congress has passed two hurricane relief bills totaling $62.3 billion, all of which will be added to the deficit.

Republican leaders have been under pressure from conservative members and outside watchdog groups to find ways to pay for the Katrina relief. Some Republicans wanted to offer an amendment, including cuts, to pay for hurricane spending but were denied the chance under procedural rules.

"This is hardly a well-oiled machine," said Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican. "There's a lot of fat to trim. ... I wonder if we've been serving in the same Congress."

American Conservative Union Chairman David A. Keene said federal spending already was "spiraling out of control" before Katrina, and conservatives are "increasingly losing faith in the president and the Republican leadership in Congress."

"Excluding military and homeland security, American taxpayers have witnessed the largest spending increase under any preceding president and Congress since the Great Depression," he said.

Mr. Keene said annual nonmilitary and non-homeland security spending increased $303 billion between fiscal year 2001 and 2005; the acknowledged federal debt increased more than $2 trillion since fiscal year 2000; and the 2003 Medicare prescription drug bill is estimated to increase the government's unfunded obligations by $16 trillion.

Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste (CAGW), said if Mr. DeLay wants to know where to cut, "there are plenty of places to reduce."

His group soon will release a list of $2 trillion in suggested spending cuts over the next five years, and he said Congress also could cut the estimated $20 billion to $25 billion in pet projects that make their way into must-pass spending bills each year.

CAGW and the Heritage Foundation also suggest rescinding the 6,000-plus earmarked projects in the recently passed highway bill.

But Mr. DeLay said those projects are "important infrastructure" and eliminating them could undermine the economy as Congress tries to offer hurricane relief.

"It is right to borrow to pay for it," he said. "But it is not right to attack the very economy that will pay for it."

Mr. Schatz, though, said the highway bill included projects such as flowers for the Ronald Reagan freeway in California, which he said aren't essential spending.

Mr. DeLay said the budget this year was pared down and 100 programs or offices were eliminated in this year's spending bills. "We have been doing that for 11 years," he said. He said it's an "ongoing process" that will be more complete after this year's budget process, which calls for cuts to Medicaid and other entitlement programs.

Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican, agreed that Republicans "have been more fiscally sound than the Democrats were in their decades in the House." He acknowledged that "we're still trying to improve," and noted Mr. DeLay is leading the fight to reform the budget process.

"We've had a good start, but many of us want to see the government be more fiscally sound and conservative in the future," Mr. McHenry said.

Aside From Roberts And Katrina, What Else Is New Lately? (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 14, 2005

In case anyone needed reminding of how consumed Congress is by just two issues at the moment, GOP senators left yesterday's policy lunch with matching talking point cards — one with a small graphic of the Supreme Court, the other with a photo of a hurricane.

Only five daring lawmakers convened hearings to compete with the morning appearance of chief justice nominee John Roberts before the Senate Judiciary Committee. And one of the four, Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), cleverly changed the focus of his pre-planned hearing, from nonprofit organizations to nonprofit organizations in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Santorum noted the fortunate coincidence that all three of his invited charity groups happened to be involved in the disaster relief effort, but turned skeptical at the suggestion that "Katrina-izing" the people's business was turning into a trend.

"In this case, the parallel is pretty obvious," Santorum said.

Sen. Joseph Biden's (D-Del.) immersion in Roberts was so complete that, heading for the policy lunch, he mistakenly referred to the judge as "Ginsburg" and volleyed away a ubiquitous Katrina question by explaining that preparing his confirmation questions had taken up the majority of his time. Still, Biden defended the chamber's ability to manage both hurricane reconstruction and the ongoing war in Iraq while dealing with Roberts.

"We ought to be able to walk and chew gum at the same time," Biden said.

For many on the Hill, the priority most in danger of slipping through the cracks is entitlement cuts mandated by the congressional budget resolution but put off to accommodate the response to Katrina. Democrats are strategizing on how to turn the month-long budget reconciliation delay into an indefinite one, with Republicans parrying that they can walk, chew gum and tighten penalties for sex offenders at the same time.

"This is something that can help bring the nation together" during a post-Katrina mourning period that has turned partisan, said Charlie Keller, spokesman for Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite (R-Fla.), whose sex-offender verification bill was folded into a broad package that House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) shepherded to a floor vote today.

"While the House is trying to continue its business of the things American people are looking for, I think cracking down on sex offenders definitely falls under that category," Keller said. House GOP leadership agreed, touting an appearance by Sensenbrenner and his cosponsors in addition to one from the House "Lawsuit Abuse and Voter Values Public Affairs Teams" cheerleading for Roberts's confirmation, on which they have no vote.

The Congressional Hispanic Caucus was kept busy by a three tasks, preparing for its institute's annual convention this week, releasing its first survey on corporate employment of Hispanic-Americans and using the hurricane to push for an abandonment of mandated cuts in food stamp funding.

"One of the methods we can use to get attention for that is to put out [word of] the importance of food stamps for those who have suffered because of Katrina," said Michael Levin, spokesman for CHC member Rep. Joe Baca (D-Calif.). As for the other major story at hand, "I was going to say 'who's John Roberts,' but I guess that wouldn't be a good answer," Levin joked.

Lest the public worry that Roberts and Katrina have intercepted integral deliberation, Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah) offered to set it straight.

"You're making too big a deal out of it," Bennett said. "Of course the Senate set aside other things to deal with emergencies. Yeah, we delayed the debate over Hawaiian statehood. We're carrying forward in a normal fashion and I think we'll be fine."

Normal Hill sights were in abundance, with crews of grassroots lobbyists visiting staffers to argue for their cherished causes. The National Association of Insurance and Financial Advisers (NAIFA) dispatched local representatives from as far away as Colorado to peer at Capitol maps and promote their call to make September "Life Insurance Awareness Month."

A cadre from environmental group American Rivers was also seen traipsing through the halls, although "River Lobby Day" had the perfect news peg lined up. "The Mississippi River and its tributaries are lined with countless miles of levees," said American Rivers president Rebecca Wodder in a Katrina response statement. "Each of these provides an unfounded sense of security for the communities behind them."

Katrina Gives Urgency To TV Transition (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, September 14, 2005

Last Friday, roughly 15 first responders came to Capitol Hill. Their visit, timed to coincide with the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, was designed to make an urgent call for a speedy transition from analog to digital television.

DOJ_NMG_0005370

Television policy might seem like an odd rallying cry for fire and police officials. But there's a good reason for their interest: Once that transition takes place, first responders such as fire, rescue and police officers stand to benefit from a windfall of new frequencies that they can use to communicate with each other when handling emergencies. (The rest of the spectrum will be auctioned off, netting an estimated $10 billion for the government's coffers.)

What the group didn't plan on was that yet another tragedy, Hurricane Katrina, would occur in the interim — if anything, making their case stronger than ever. But the hurricane also has set their cause back, at least temporarily, as Congress' legislative course has been thrown into disarray.

Before Katrina, digital TV was supposed to move on a budget reconciliation package — by Congressional standards, a seemingly sure bet. But now that measure has been delayed. One GOP lobbyist put it this way: "It's delayed somewhere between a few weeks and never."

Alan Caldwell, a retired former fire chief in Fairfax County, Va., now serves as senior adviser of government relations for the International Association of Fire Chiefs. He took part in Friday's meetings with Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) as well as get-togethers with such Members as Reps. Eric Cantor (R-Va.) and Hilda Solis (D-Calif.) and Sen. George Allen (R-Va.).

"Right now, so much is in flux, I would hate to be a betting man on something like this," Caldwell said. "But what has changed ever so slightly is the absolute critical need. There are more needs for communication. Police chiefs and fire chiefs don't make any money off the spectrum. We just need it to do a better job for the people we're sworn to protect."

Burson Taylor, a spokeswoman for Blunt, said the first responders at the Friday meeting were "advocating for a hard deadline, and it was a good conversation. [Blunt] believes it's imperative to get the spectrum to the first responders just as soon as possible."

Taylor added that while reconciliation is on hold, there is no indication that the DTV measure won't be included when it moves. "Even with the delay," she said, "everything is still lined up for consideration."

Veronique Pluviose-Fenton, principal legislative counsel for the National League of Cities, said her association has joined with first-responder groups to urge Congress to free up spectrum ever since the Oklahoma City bombing in 1995.

During the Katrina aftermath, Pluviose-Fenton said, emergency workers were down to one channel. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) "himself witnessed it," she said. "People were using runners where a doctor says something and a young person runs it across to the other part of the airport to a nurse. Post 9/11, that is an embarrassment."

The independent commission that studied the 9/11 attacks put first-responder communications on its list of priorities.

Pluviose-Fenton added that as soon as a date is certain, local governments can begin investing their homeland security funds in new communications. "If we can talk, we can save lives," she said.

Bill Anaya, the senior director of legislative affairs for the electronics and communications giant Motorola, said he expects reconciliation to be delayed until next month. His company cares about the issue because it does business with first responders and because it manufactures boxes that can convert a digital signal for reception on an analog TV.

"That's all we know right now. No decisions have been made," Anaya said. "It's unclear whether they will go forward with reconciliation or not."

But, he added, "there is growing momentum that this public-safety spectrum piece must be taken care of. Do they get to use the vehicle of budget reconciliation or do they become part of a Katrina relief piece? That's the razor it's sitting on."

Anaya added: "I think if reconciliation happens, this is in it — it's just a question of whether reconciliation happens at all."

Wherever the DTV language might end up, the revenue stemming from the auction could be in high demand. "It brings with it $10 billion in a wheelbarrow. There are a lot of places where that kind of resource can be quite beneficial," he said.

The call for a "hard" date for the DTV transition has gained enough legislative traction that some proponents have indicated it could even go as a standalone measure.

Dennis Wharton, spokesman for the National Association of Broadcasters, said his group has abandoned its opposition to a hard date for the transition to digital.

"We accept the fact that Congress is going to set a hard date. We're not going to stand in the way or fight that," he said.

But what the broadcasters want is for cable carriers to carry all the channels that broadcasters send out over their digital stream, some of which offer 24-hour local weather programming. Wharton said NAB argues that such "multicasting" should be included in whatever final legislative package carries the DTV measure.

"We would make the case that broadcasters provide a critical role in times of crisis," Wharton said. "Countless lives are saved every year by emergency weather warnings. But that is not meant to diminish the efforts of public safety providers."

Pluviose-Fenton, like her colleagues, said no matter the vehicle, the DTV measure needs to pass.

"We want it to go on a legislation that is moving," she said. "We have technology that shouldn't force people to make a choice between television and public safety. Now is the time for Members to say what happened in Katrina matters, what happened on 9/11 matters. How many lessons learned do we have to go through?"

GOP Counterpunching On Ethics (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, September 14, 2005

Cognizant of how their effective portrayal of a Democratic Party drunk with power led to their historic takeover of the House in 1994, Republicans are moving quickly to ensure that Democrats do not get traction on the ethics issue for the 2006 elections.

For every Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee news release calling on Congressman So-and-So to return campaign contributions from indicted Republican ber-lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the National Republican Congressional Committee accuses Democratic leaders of hypocrisy — or worse.

When the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and the Montana Democratic Party made a television buy last month criticizing Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) for his Abramoff ties, the National Republican Senatorial Committee wasted no time quibbling with the ad's imprecise wording.

The swift counterattack paid off: At the request of some local stations, the Democrats agreed to tweak the ad.

Democrats think the indictments of Abramoff and political allies of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) taint enough Republicans to make ethics a salient issue for them in next year's midterm elections.

But Republicans, in addition to counterpunching, maintain that Democrats are talking about ethics so much because they have nothing else to say.

"The fact that they are chasing this rabbit demonstrates they don't have issues to talk about and they don't have an agenda," NRSC spokesman Brian Nick said. "So what recourse do they have? Well let's go throw spaghetti at the wall and see if it sticks."

Democratic pollster Celinda Lake said Republicans have to move aggressively to counter ethics charges because the issue hits home.

"It's a huge issue," she said. "We've also tested the statistic that the number of lobbyists has doubled [recently] and what we've found in general is there is a strong belief that Washington is really out of touch and that can really resonate, so it's a good overall umbrella argument."

In the case of Burns, it's especially powerful because "you have two very clean Democratic candidates — one is a true outsider candidate" — who can draw clear distinctions between themselves and an "out of touch" Senator, Lake said.

Montana state Auditor John Morrison and state Senate President Jon Tester are competing for the Democratic nomination to take on Burns next year.

While individual Republican Members may be in exceptionally hot water, Democrats have a long way to go before they can truly nationalize the issue, warns Brad Coker, president of the independent Mason-Dixon polling firm.

"It's not registering on the Richter scale yet," Coker said.

At least at this early stage, voters are unhappy with lawmakers in general but Congressional Democrats are faring only a little better than Congressional Republicans in opinion polls.

A Gallup poll released Tuesday showed that only 36 percent of Americans approved of the job Congress is doing, while 58 percent disapproved. A Newsweek poll released earlier this week showed 50 percent of Americans preferring generic Democratic Congressional candidates compared to 38 percent who expressed a preference for Republicans.

Whether the GOP's low poll numbers, coupled with Democratic attacks on ethics, make the Republicans vulnerable in the long run is debatable.

"As long as there's been Congresses, there's been individual Members caught in ethical lapses," Coker said. "I'm not sure if [the Abramoff scandal] is seen as anything other than typical political rhetoric. It's hard to say" if the issue can really take root, because "more details need to come out but right now, Abramoff — he's not a household name."

Maybe so, but Democrats think they have enough time to hammer the point home so come November 2006, voters will know who he is — and seats that no one thought were competitive will be.

"We're going to keep talking about them," said Sarah Feinberg, spokeswoman for the DCCC. "The truth of the matter is they have several Members who are very much riddled with ethics matters and having to defend themselves each day."

Among others, Democrats are targeting DeLay, House Administration Chairman Bob Ney (R-Ohio), and the seat being vacated by embattled Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) — not traditionally favorable terrain — because they think questions about those Members' ethics can put their seats in play.

Feinberg said Republican attempts to counter each DCCC allegation is a sign of their "desperation."

"Every step of the way, those releases and those attempts to get press have been pretty see-through," she said, noting that when DeLay's political associates in Texas were indicted last week, the NRCC accused DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) of shady behavior.

DOJ_NMG_0005372

"It's so obviously trying to change the subject," Feinberg said.

Ed Patru, a spokesman for the NRCC, said the only thing obvious is that Democrats are devoid of ideas.

"Republicans had a clear alternative that resonated with the public, the Contract with America," he said, dismissing the notion that 2006 could be like the Republicans' 1994. "There's no indication that Democrats have anything near that."

Patru also said Republicans have no fear of an election based on ethics.

"If they're seeking an ethics war, that's what they're going to get," he said. "Democrats are failing to nationalize the election around ethics because to the public, there is no difference between the parties on this issue."

Many of the recent ethical lapses have involved Republicans, but just as some Democrats think Cunningham's seat is winnable now because of his questionable dealings with a federal contractor, Democrats are not completely innocent, Mason-Dixon's Coker noted. For example, Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) had his home searched by the FBI not long after Cunningham's properties were raided.

Still, Coker said Democrats might be on to something.

"Over time, if there's a steady drumbeat and enough individual lapses come up to back it up" maybe voters will pay heed, he said. "But I don't think you got Watergate here."

Ophelia Nears, Islands Empty, Schools Shut (WP/AP)

By Paul Nowell, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

WRIGHTSVILLE BEACH, N.C. -- Vulnerable islands were evacuated and mainland schools were closed Tuesday as Ophelia strengthened to a hurricane and wobbled closer to land with a threat of flooding rain.

The National Hurricane Center upgraded the storm's status Tuesday evening, saying maximum sustained winds had reached 75 mph, with higher gusts. The center said further strengthening was possible.

"I don't really want to mess with it," Bruce McIlvaine of Logan Township, N.J., said as he packed to leave the Outer Banks' Hatteras Island before his vacation ended. "You're on a spit of land a dozen miles into the ocean."

Others were nonchalant, following the lead of many longtime residents who were staying put.

Brenda and Rich Hooser, who moved to Nags Head from Winston-Salem three weeks ago, strolled hand-in-hand through the surf.

"All the locals _ none of them leave," Rich Hooser said. "If it's not over 125 (mph), they don't go anywhere."

A hurricane warning extended from the South Santee River in South Carolina north to Oregon Inlet at Pamlico Sound in North Carolina, meaning hurricane conditions were expected within 24 hours.

A hurricane watch and tropical storm warning were in effect from the Oregon Inlet north to the North Carolina-Virginia line and southward from the South Santee River to Edisto Beach in South Carolina.

After taunting coastal residents for days, the storm appeared ready to move ashore, as heavy rain battered South Carolina's northern coast and the beaches of southeastern North Carolina.

In Carolina Beach, south of Wrightsville Beach, officials reported a foot of water on one road due to heavy wind and a high tide.

Unlike Hurricane Katrina's devastating charge at the Gulf Coast, the week-old Ophelia had been following a meandering path, making predictions of its landfall difficult. The hurricane center's forecasts showed it running along the coast, then veering through Pamlico Sound, crossing the Outer Banks and heading back out to sea.

Its slow movement meant heavy rain could linger over land, possibly causing serious flooding. The hurricane center said up to 15 inches of rain was possible in eastern North Carolina.

At least six North Carolina counties ordered mandatory evacuations of some areas and eight others had voluntary evacuations.

Along the exposed Outer Banks chain, all residents and visitors were ordered to evacuate Hatteras Island on Tuesday, visitors had been ordered off Ocracoke Island and the National Park Service closed the Cape Hatteras lighthouse and the Wright Brothers National Memorial in Kill Devil Hills.

Schools were closed in several coastal counties in both North and South Carolina, while classes were canceled at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington and East Carolina University in Greenville.

North Carolina Gov. Mike Easley said coastal residents should be prepared to go without power for two to three days.

DOJ_NMG_0005373

"The beaches we expect to take a real beating," Easley said. "The bottom line is we're definitely going to get flooding, not just on the coast but in low-lying areas as the rivers swell from the storm surge itself."

A surfer was missing along the South Carolina coast, and the search had been suspended because of the rough sea.

At 11 p.m. EDT, Ophelia was centered about 115 miles east of Charleston, S.C. The storm was stationary, but a gradual turn toward the north was expected Wednesday, the hurricane center said.

The storm's likely path across Pamlico Sound and the Outer Banks would mean the biggest flooding threat would come not from the Atlantic Ocean but from the sounds _ the bodies of water between the mainland and the barrier islands, said Jonathan Hobbs, a spokesman for the Dare County Joint Information Center.

Ophelia became a tropical storm Wednesday off the Florida coast and later strengthened to a hurricane. It is the 15th named storm and seventh hurricane in this year's busy Atlantic hurricane season, which began June 1 and ends Nov. 30.

Ophelia Poised To Swamp Coastal N.C. (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, September 14, 2005

Hurricane Ophelia is projected to move along the northeast coast of North Carolina today, dumping heavy rain, producing high wind and possibly spawning tornadoes.

Ophelia, the first hurricane to reach U.S. shores since Katrina hit the Gulf Coast Aug. 29, may take an entire day to cross land before spinning back out to sea.

The storm, moving at 4 mph Tuesday night, could inundate coastal communities and lash them with gusts up to 92 mph.

Katrina was a Category 4 monster, with 140 mph winds. Ophelia is only Category 1 (74 mph or more), but Ophelia's slow pace means “the effects will be more protracted,” meteorologist Eric Blake of the National Hurricane Center said.

“The highest winds will last longer. Rainfall totals over a foot are possible. Coastal erosion will be a big problem,” Blake said.

Two years ago this weekend, Hurricane Isabel tore into beaches on North Carolina's Outer Banks, a 120-mile tourist mecca of narrow islands. The hurricane center predicts “large and dangerous waves” today and a 5- to 7-foot storm surge, possibly 10 feet in inlets.

Rainfall could total 10 inches on South Carolina's northeast coast and 15 inches in eastern North Carolina.

Ophelia's track is so erratic that the eye of the hurricane may not reach land, said Steve Lyons, tropical weather expert for The Weather Channel. It will still feel like a direct hit, he said, because the storm's strongest wind bands reach out up to 60 miles from its center.

Hurricane warnings were posted from South Carolina to Virginia. Six North Carolina counties ordered mandatory evacuations. Eight others asked people to leave voluntarily.

Storm Increases Off The Carolinas (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

SALVO, N.C., Sept. 13 (Reuters) - Hurricane Ophelia strengthened slightly on Tuesday as it wobbled toward the coast and sent thousands of people packing from North Carolina's barrier islands.

The storm's center was 110 miles south of Wilmington, N.C. It was creeping north-northwest and was expected to turn north and hit the North Carolina coast on Wednesday night and Thursday, the forecasters said.

The storm has sat off the coasts of North and South Carolina for four days, alternately strengthening into a hurricane and weakening back to a tropical storm.

On Tuesday night it strengthened back into a minimal hurricane, with winds of 75 miles an hour.

Along the 100-mile chain of barrier islands known as the Outer Banks, mandatory evacuation orders were issued for all 20,000 people on Hatteras Island, a popular vacation spot that includes Cape Hatteras Lighthouse and the Cape Hatteras National Seashore.

Delta And Northwest Are Poised To File For Bankruptcy Protection (WSJ)

By Evan Perez and Susan Carey

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005374

The dire financial condition of Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines indicates that recent hopes for a slight recovery of the beleaguered airline industry may have been crushed by the surge in oil prices and the effects of Hurricane Katrina.

The carriers' boards are each scheduled to meet Wednesday to decide whether they'll file for bankruptcy protection. The filings themselves may come as soon as Wednesday, although Northwest is considering holding off to give its unions a last chance to make financial concessions. Indeed, some industry officials speculate that the carrier's surprise board meeting may itself be a gambit to pressure the unions.

Twin bankruptcies could further darken the skies for the industry at a time when prospects seemed to be brightening. Though fuel prices were burdening U.S. carriers even before Hurricane Katrina, many had eked more savings out of their operations and were benefiting from growing passenger traffic. Airlines were able to raise their fares somewhat this summer despite continued tough competition. Thanks in part to the summer surge in traffic, carriers like AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, the leading U.S. carrier in terms of traffic, and Continental Airlines posted second-quarter profit after several quarters of losses.

But bankruptcy filings by Northwest and Delta could make competition in the industry much tougher. Both would want to sharply reduce costs while under bankruptcy protection, which gives them greater ability to abrogate union contracts and make other radical moves.

The wave of bankruptcies in recent years has led to industry complaints that bankruptcy allows too many carriers to stay in the air, when the industry could benefit from less competition. Currently in Chapter 11 are US Airways Group Inc., UAL Corp.'s United Airlines, Aloha Airgroup Inc. and ATA Holdings Corp., parent of ATA Airlines. Hawaiian Airlines emerged from Chapter 11 this summer.

Bankruptcies rarely have much effect on passengers. The carriers continue to operate their route networks, although they often cut back some capacity and reduce their fleets, getting their commuter affiliates to assume more flying. Airlines maintain their frequent-flier plans as well, and sometimes they offer fare sales and mileage bonuses to keep customers who might be leaning toward switching carriers.

While Chapter 11 allows airlines to continue operating, it's a costly and cumbersome process. Carriers must pay bankruptcy lawyers and consultants, including the advisers to their creditors' committees. Dealing with these complex cases also takes up much of management's time. Companies must seek court approval for myriad standard expenditures and decisions, and all of their activities are an open book because filings, contracts and business decisions are outlined in public court filings.

US Airways, after shedding pension plans and getting concessions from its workers, hopes to emerge soon from Chapter 11 through a combination with America West Holdings Corp. The two carriers said the result would be one low-cost airline when the transaction is completed, perhaps in the next two weeks. United, which also shed pensions and won union concessions, last week filed its plan of reorganization after many months in bankruptcy protection. The country's No. 2 carrier in terms of traffic also hopes to emerge as a much-lower-cost airline.

Both No. 3 Delta and No. 4 Northwest have been warning for months about the possibility of seeking bankruptcy protection. The threat has grown more dire as Katrina disrupted flights to the Gulf Coast and crippled oil refineries, sending jet-fuel prices soaring. Delta has been further burdened by its inability to restructure its massive debt load and Northwest by a strike by mechanics.

At a meeting Wednesday, Delta executives and directors are expected to give final authorization for a Chapter 11 filing, capping a four-year financial dive brought on by a heavy debt load and high fuel costs that have overwhelmed restructuring efforts. Delta plans to make its filing after the close of financial markets in the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York, immediately following the directors' approval, according to people familiar with the situation.

In recent days, the company has wrapped up details of an approximately $1.7 billion financing package from creditors led by General Electric Co.'s commercial lending unit. The so-called debtor-in-possession agreement is meant to help the airline continue its operations while under court protection. The financing pact includes as much as $650 million in new financing, according to documents reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. The rest of the financing will go to pay off the approximately $1 billion outstanding on a loan made last fall, also from a group led by GE, that helped Delta avoid bankruptcy at that time.

To obtain the financing, Delta will have to encumber essentially every one of its unencumbered assets, including aircraft, spare parts, its Comair regional feeder unit and AirElite private-jet operation, airport gates and even its routes to Tokyo and London, according to the documents reviewed by the Journal. The assets have an estimated value of $3 billion.

Delta reported more than $20 billion in debt at the end of June and said its cash cushion stood at $1.7 billion. But the carrier warned that it was likely to violate certain debt agreements later this year that require it to maintain at least $1 billion in cash. Among its liabilities due by year end, Delta said, were $470 million in maturing debt, $550 million in interest payments, $460 million due for operating leases and $135 million in pension payments.

As Delta's troubles have worsened, the value of its outstanding shares has fallen to below $125 million, less than even the $930 million market value of low-cost Atlanta rival AirTran Holdings Inc., which operates AirTran Airways, a carrier a fraction of Delta's size.

Delta officials are dispatching teams of supervisors to meet with employees Thursday and Friday to explain the likely impact of the filing on their wages, benefits and pensions.

The company has, along with Northwest, pushed for federal legislation that would give airlines more time to catch up with pension payments. Delta's pensions are underfunded by $5.3 billion. The legislation is making progress, but Delta officials now believe the bill in its current form, offering 14 years to catch up, may not be enough to help Delta preserve its pensions. Creditors are likely to make a move to force Delta into a distressed termination, which occurs when a company in bankruptcy is allowed to jettison its pensions onto the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp.

Last week, Delta met with representatives of the government pension insurer, people familiar with the matter said. No decisions have been made on whether to end the pensions. But such a move would add substantially to growing deficit of the PBGC, which already has assumed the pensions of US Airways and United.

Northwest officially said Tuesday it had made no decision about a bankruptcy filing. But a person familiar with the matter said directors meeting Wednesday are expected to weigh whether to file at once or hold off for a few weeks to give the airline's unions a deadline for making concessions the carrier says it needs.

On Monday, the St. Paul, Minn., airline defaulted on an $18.7 million payment it owed one of its commuter affiliates, and faces a payment due Thursday of $65 million to its underfunded pension plans. Northwest has a grace period that ends next Tuesday to pay MAIR Holdings Inc., owner of Mesaba Airlines, but enjoys no such latitude on the pension obligation.

In a Securities and Exchange Commission filing late Tuesday, Northwest confirmed that it missed the semi-monthly payment to Mesaba. It also said it decided not to make $23 million in payments due last weekend and Monday on aircraft financings. Those agreements give the carrier grace periods of five to 10 business days. The SEC filing also said if Northwest fails to make Thursday's pension payment, a lien would arise against its assets unless it had previously sought bankruptcy protection.

While Northwest has managed to stay aloft through the mechanics strike, helped by temporary replacement workers it may take on full-time, its future without major labor concessions and legislative relief from its pension problems is in doubt. The carrier said its cash cushion, which was $2.46 billion at the end of last year, had fallen to $1.7 billion at the end of August, and the airline is burning through $4 million in cash a day. Still, the $1.7 billion is enough cash that Northwest doesn't necessarily need a debtor-in-possession loan, said a person with knowledge of the matter.

Another person familiar with Northwest's situation said the carrier could arrange such a loan later, but it might not be so easy. The carrier's long-term debt and capital-lease obligations stand at $8.1 billion, and its pension plans are underfunded by $3.8 billion. Since the industry downturn began in 2001, Northwest has produced nearly $3 billion in operating losses. Its liabilities and shareholders deficit total $14.4 billion.

Based on its closing price of $1.57 a share Tuesday, Northwest has a market capitalization of about $136 million.

Northwest's cash cushion has made it hard for the airline to convince unions it needed $950 million in annual savings. Northwest raised the target to $1.1 billion this year and is now telling workers it needs $1.4 billion, according to the striking Aircraft Mechanics Fraternal Association. So far, the pilots are the only unionized group that has granted wage concessions, and recently they agreed to talk about a second round of savings. Negotiations with other unions continue, but the mechanics struck over Northwest's last contract offer, made last month, and further talks this the weekend failed.

Northwest's board, which currently has 13 members, has three directors who represent labor. It's expected that they might press management to set a firm deadline for labor to give concessions, giving the unions notice that they must act now or face a bankruptcy filing, said one person familiar with the situation.

Douglas Runte, who covers airline debt and equity for Morgan Stanley, said Tuesday night that he believes Northwest "is a company that can successfully restructure out of court," adding that the airline hasn't yet pursued all avenues that could keep it out of Chapter 11.

Bankruptcy filings give management more leverage over labor because the company can ask a judge to abrogate current labor agreements and let new terms be imposed. In addition, pension plans can be terminated in Chapter 11 and transferred to the PBGC, resulting in smaller payments to some workers.

Other directors might feel the unions have had plenty of time to reflect on Northwest's precarious situation and want to file now to avoid making Thursday's pension payment and another financing payment due in early October, one person said. In the SEC filing late Tuesday, Northwest said it is engaged in an analysis of its debt, lease and other obligations to determine which "should be targeted for restructuring." The payments it missed in recent days "are among those that the company has identified that it would seek to restructure as part of a transformation plan."

How long Delta or Northwest might be in Chapter 11 depends. US Airways was in and out in eight months on its first filing in 2002-03, and it is just about to emerge from its second filing after 12 months. UAL, on the other hand will hit the three-year mark in court protection in early December. If Northwest doesn't wind up filing until the bankruptcy laws change on Oct. 17, it would have to be quicker about it because the new law doesn't allow the debtor company to continue indefinitely having exclusive rights to field its reorganization plan.

Source: Delta Plans To File For Bankruptcy (FINDLAW/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Ap Business Writer

Find Law, September 14, 2005

(AP) - ATLANTA-Delta Air Lines Inc., the nation's third-largest carrier, plans to file for bankruptcy protection in New York as early as Wednesday, according to an industry consultant who has been informed of the company's plans.

Delta's stock tumbled 25 cents, or 22.7 percent, to close at 85 cents in heavy trading Monday on the New York Stock Exchange.

The consultant, who was not authorized to disclose the information and thus spoke on condition of anonymity, said Delta is working with GE Commercial Finance and other creditors to arrange roughly $2 billion in debtor-in-possession financing. The money would allow the airline to operate in bankruptcy.

Delta, which has lost nearly $10 billion since January 2001, likely will pledge the few remaining assets not already pledged as collateral for loans as part of the bankruptcy financing agreement, the consultant said. "There is nothing unencumbered after this," according to this consultant.

The consultant said the filing was expected to come Wednesday afternoon but could be pushed to Thursday depending on when the bankruptcy financing is completed.

A Delta spokeswoman declined to comment, saying no decision about bankruptcy has been made. Two spokesmen for GE Commercial Finance also declined to immediately comment. Reached at his Connecticut home Monday, Delta director Edward H. Budd said, "Anything that's going to be talked about at Delta is going to come from Delta." Calls to the homes of four other company directors were not answered.

The bankruptcy filing would come as Atlanta-based Delta has been unable to right itself amid persistently high fuel costs and heavy debt and pension obligations.

The filing would make Delta the third major U.S. carrier to enter Chapter 11 since the 2001 terrorist attacks, joining Elk Grove Village, Ill.-based UAL Corp., parent of United Airlines, and Arlington, Va.-based US Airways Group, Inc., which has filed twice in the last three years.

Some smaller carriers, including Honolulu-based Hawaiian Airlines and Indianapolis-based ATA Airlines Inc., also have filed for bankruptcy in recent years.

If it follows the pattern of most big airline bankruptcies, Delta's existing shares would eventually become worthless and portions of the airline's existing debt would be exchanged for equity in a reorganized Delta. One major question is whether Delta would go the route of UAL and US Airways and seek to turn over its pilot and other employee pension plans to the federal government.

Delta's total debt is roughly $20.5 billion, and it listed $21.6 billion in assets as of June 30. The asset figure would make Delta's bankruptcy the ninth-largest in U.S. history, according to bankruptcy tracker New Generation Research, Inc.

Delta has announced up to 24,000 job cuts over the last four years. In September 2004, it also said it would shed its Dallas hub as part of a sweeping turnaround plan aimed at saving the airline. The plan was hampered, however, by soaring fuel costs.

Fort Worth, Texas-based AMR Corp., the parent of American Airlines, the nation's biggest carrier, teetered on the verge of bankruptcy before winning deep concessions from its employees.

The other legacy carriers, those with a large presence in multiple regions prior to deregulation in 1978, are Eagan, Minn.-based Northwest Airlines Corp. and Houston-based Continental Airlines Inc.

Northwest has also been said to be close to bankruptcy.

Two Major Airlines Seen Near Filing For Bankruptcy (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005377

Two of the nation's biggest and most troubled airlines, Northwest and Delta, appeared likely to file for bankruptcy protection as soon as today, people briefed on the airlines' plans said yesterday.

Both airlines have been hit hard by the spike in jet fuel prices this month and by the relentless competition in the industry.

Filings by Northwest and Delta would mean that four of the seven major airlines would be operating under court protection, with the others being United and US Airways. Also, when several smaller bankrupt carriers are included, half the seats available on flights in the United States would be operated by bankrupt airlines, according to an estimate by Standard & Poor's Ratings Services.

Court protection would have little immediate impact on either airline's routes and flights, and frequent-flier programs would remain in place. But consumers may eventually see reduced service to some cities, as the airlines shift their focus to destinations where they can make money.

And if the experience at the other major airlines in bankruptcy is a guide, workers at Northwest and Delta can expect significant job cuts, reductions in wages and benefits and termination of their traditional pension plans as the companies streamline their operations.

Both companies were completing bankruptcy plans yesterday. Officials at each airline said a final decision had not been made to seek Chapter 11 protection.

A filing by Northwest would need the approval of its board, which is set to meet today, its pilots' union said in a statement yesterday. The union has a representative on Northwest's board. Delta's board met last Friday.

Any filing by either airline would be made in United States Bankruptcy Court in New York. Delta's filing has been anticipated for weeks, but any Northwest move was not expected for several more weeks as it continued to try to win the $1.4 billion in concessions from its labor unions that it said it needed to avoid a court filing.

But the jump in fuel prices in the wake of Hurricane Katrina moved the company's timetable forward, people with direct knowledge of Northwest's position said last night. Still, a lively debate was expected at the board meeting over whether to file now or wait, these people said.

Bankruptcy filings give companies a chance to overhaul their operations and negotiate lower payments to creditors as well as streamline in ways they could not accomplish outside of court protection.

But for these airlines, bankruptcy would not eliminate the challenge posed by low-fare carriers, like Southwest and JetBlue, which now carry one-third of passengers on flights within the United States.

They can charge less for tickets because they operate at much lower costs than their major competitors, employing fewer workers for each airplane and having much quicker turnaround times at airports. That, in turn, allows them to make more flights a day than big airlines.

The low-fare airlines' growing presence, up from just 6 percent of passengers in 1990, has kept the big airlines from passing along the punishing rise in the price of jet fuel.

The airlines use 19 billion gallons of fuel a year, and,

even before Hurricane Katrina, they were paying 50 percent more for it than in 2004. Prices jumped 25 percent in the days after the storm, although they have since moderated slightly.

Northwest and Delta, like most of their competitors, have no financial protection to shield them from the higher fuel prices, meaning they must immediately pay more in cash when prices go up.

The struggles of inefficient airlines and the rise of low-fare carriers are exactly what was envisioned when President Jimmy Carter ordered the deregulation of the industry in 1978, freeing the airlines from government controls on routes and fares, said Alfred E. Kahn, chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board at the time.

"This is the continued working out of the restructuring that deregulation promised and made inescapable," Mr. Kahn said yesterday. He added, "I don't know where it is going to end."

At Northwest and Delta, at least, a way of life is coming to an end for employees.

United, which set off the biggest default in the history of the federal pension agency this year when it scrapped its traditional retirement plans, has obtained two deep rounds of cuts from its workers under bankruptcy protection, and it eliminated 25,000 jobs.

US Airways, which had 46,500 workers before the September 2001 terrorist attacks led to deep declines in travel, now has just 22,000. Its workers took three rounds of cuts in its two bankruptcies.

"For American workers, it's an unrelentingly grim scenario," David Gregory, a professor of labor law at St. John's University, said yesterday.

But even though both companies warned repeatedly that they might have to seek bankruptcy protection, workers at each have resisted cutbacks, especially those at Northwest, which has lost $3.6 billion since 2001.

It has been trying for three years to win concessions from its pilots, flight attendants, baggage handlers and other employees, raising its demand for cuts from $900 million to $1.4 billion in that time.

But only Northwest's pilots have agreed to cuts, and the airline is in the third week of a strike by 4,430 members of its mechanics' union, who walked out Aug. 20 over the airline's request for $176 million in concessions.

Northwest has kept operating with 1,900 supervisors, contractors and replacement workers. Yesterday, it began offering permanent jobs to some replacement workers. If the strike is settled, Northwest will not have to rehire workers it permanently replaced.

Northwest shares lost half their value yesterday, after The New York Times reported on its Web site that the company was considering filing for bankruptcy protection today. Northwest shares fell $1.74, or 52 percent, to $1.57.

Delta shares, meanwhile, fell 7 cents, to 78 cents. Delta asked its pilots yesterday for another round of deep cuts, on top of the $1 billion in concessions obtained a year ago, when Delta was on the verge of seeking bankruptcy protection.

Delta and its regional airlines operate about 3,000 daily flights. The airline, based in Atlanta, has about 52,000 employees. Northwest and its regional carriers operate 1,500 daily flights. Northwest, based in Eagan, Minn., has about 40,000 employees.

Leaders of the Air Line Pilots Association, Delta's only unionized group, said they would start a three-day meeting next Monday to decide whether to negotiate with the company.

But by then, Delta may be in bankruptcy, a fate that its chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, has tried desperately to avoid. Mr. Grinstein, 72, took charge of the airline 20 months ago, and has since tried to cut $5 billion in costs under a restructuring plan that included the elimination of 7,000 jobs.

Last week, Delta, which has lost nearly $10 billion since 2001, sold Atlantic Southeast Airlines, one of its commuter airlines, to SkyWest for $450 million. And Delta has been arranging the financing it will need to operate in bankruptcy, believed to be about $1.7 billion, with lenders like GE Corporate Financing.

This week, however, came signs that the airline was running out of time. As it was seeking more cuts from the pilots, Delta did not make an interest payment on its corporate debt, taking advantage of a grace period that gives it more time.

A Delta spokeswoman, Chris E. Kelly, said the airline believed that the move was "a prudent step to take" while it decided whether to seek bankruptcy protection. Delta faces another debt payment on Monday.

Meanwhile, Northwest disclosed in a regulatory filing yesterday that it must make a $65 million pension payment tomorrow, which it cannot skip unless it has filed for bankruptcy protection. Yesterday, the Treasury Department rejected a request by Northwest to delay the payment, saying it was limiting relief to corporations in the gulf region.

Northwest also disclosed that it had delayed $42 million in debt payments. These, and the pension payment, would diminish Northwest's cash, which dwindled to $1.7 billion this month from $2.1 billion at the end of June.

But even that smaller amount could be enough to finance the airline's operations in the first months of bankruptcy protection, serving as the equivalent of debtor-in-possession financing, said Philip A. Baggaley, an airline analyst at S.& P. That would explain why the airline has apparently not sought outside financing as Delta has done.

One advantage for Northwest is that many of its senior executives have experience with airline bankruptcies, particularly its chief executive, Douglas M. Steenland, 53, a lawyer who took part in cases involving Continental Airlines and Eastern Air Lines.

And because Mr. Steenland is said to believe that his airline's bankruptcy case may take more than 18 months, that is probably one reason Northwest as well as Delta may file today.

Federal bankruptcy laws change on Oct. 17; after that management will have only 18 months to draft a restructuring plan.

Companies that file before Oct. 17 can have more time if they can persuade a judge to grant it. United, for example, has been operating under bankruptcy protection for nearly three years, and does not expect to emerge until February.

Ron Adams, a member of the mechanics' union at Northwest, said he was not surprised to hear the airline was contemplating a bankruptcy filing. But he said that did not make him any more willing to accept the cuts.

"I want to keep my job, but if they want to replace me, more power to them," Mr. Adams said yesterday while walking the picket line at Detroit Metropolitan Airport, one of the airline's hubs.

Delta, Northwest On Brink Of Chapter 11 (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 14, 2005

Delta Air Lines, the third-largest US carrier by revenues, is expected to file for bankruptcy protection on Wednesday, as the board of Northwest, its smaller rival, meets to examine strategic options ahead of its own possible filing.

Delta has lined up debtor-in-possession financing, allowing it to restructure operations and repair its balance sheet.

Although Northwest has been weighing a filing, its efforts to secure funding had been thought to be less advanced as management grapples with a three-week strike by maintenance workers.

However, the Minneapolis-based airline is understood to have lined up backing from US Bank, which operates its frequent flyer credit card programme. Airbus, which has financed a large part of the Northwest fleet, is also expected to participate.

The two airlines have sought additional concessions from employees in a bid to cope with rising fuel prices and the weak revenue environment created by intensifying competition from lower-cost rivals such as Southwest, AirTran and JetBlue.

The reorganisation plans are likely to see both airlines shrink domestic operations in favour of more profitable international routes, though analysts cautioned this would still leave the US industry with overcapacity. Independence Air, a Washington-based airline, is also understood to be close to a filing though industry sources suggested this would lead to its liquidation.

Both carriers on Tuesday declined to comment on the timing of any filing under Chapter 11 of the US bankruptcy code, though have repeatedly warned they may need to seek protection. Analysts have pointed to a window of opportunity for filing between the Labor Day holiday and October 17, when new bankruptcy legislation is due to be enacted.

United Airlines, the second-largest carrier after American, has been in Chapter 11 since December 2002, but hopes to emerge early next year. US Airways hopes to emerge later this month following its planned merger with smaller rival America West, whose shareholders on Tuesday approved the combination.

Delta, based in Atlanta, was seen as weaker because of its larger exposure to domestic routes, more onerous pension obligations and the cash drain of renegotiating a deal with its credit card vendors. However, credit analysts on Tuesday noted that Northwest had on Monday defaulted on an $18.7m payment to Mesaba, a regional feeder airline, and saw this as a signal that it was also close to filing.

Airline restructuring experts have warned that filings by Delta and Northwest would increase pressure on American Airlines and Continental Airlines to consider restructuring through the bankruptcy courts. Both carriers have a better cash position ahead of the slacker winter travel season, and have not indicated any plans to seek protection.

Delta lost $5.2bn last year and is targeting $5bn of cost cuts by the end of 2006 through changing its network and securing at least $1bn in cuts from pilots. It has held fresh talks with pilots in an effort to increase the savings. Northwest on Tuesday began hiring permanent replacements for its 4,400 striking mechanics, who walked off the job on August 20 after rejecting the airline's calls for steep job and pay cuts. The airline has raised its targeted annual savings from $1.1bn to $1.4bn.

President Revisits Foreign Policy (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 13 -- After nearly two weeks consumed by Hurricane Katrina, President Bush turned his attention back to the rest of the world Tuesday and confronted again the vexing challenges of an intractable war in Iraq, disputes with Iran and North Korea, and fitful relations with the United Nations.

Bush played host to Iraq's first democratically selected president at the White House in the morning and persuaded him to abandon talk of imminent U.S. troop pullouts. Bush then flew to New York in the afternoon to attend a division-plagued U.N. summit and to solicit Chinese help in pressuring Pyongyang and Tehran to abandon nuclear weapons ambitions.

The full day of diplomacy marked the first time that Bush has resumed a normal schedule since clearing his calendar after the devastation wrought by Katrina along the Gulf Coast. Among other events, Bush canceled a pomp-filled visit by Chinese President Hu Jintao last week to concentrate on getting relief to storm-ravaged areas. But Bush began to make it up to Hu by meeting with him here Tuesday evening, one of the first sit-down sessions with another world leader since the crisis.

The rest of the week is jammed with other foreign policy events, including meetings Wednesday with the prime ministers of Britain and Israel, a U.N. gathering of 170 world leaders and a White House summit Friday with Russian President Vladimir Putin. But aides insisted Bush would keep his attention on the afflicted region, scheduling a fourth trip there for Thursday capped by a prime-time national address.

In perhaps the most sensitive meeting of the day, Bush spent an hour with Hu. Bush gave him a list of human rights cases that the United States is concerned about, a list that a senior U.S. official said is topped by the longtime imprisonment of a researcher for the New York Times on accusations of disclosing state secrets.

During a public appearance, Hu promised "to step up" efforts on North Korea "so that we can facilitate fresh progress" in multilateral talks scheduled to resume in Beijing. During their private session, the U.S. side said Hu was supportive of efforts to curtail Iran's nuclear ambitions as well, but offered no support for Bush's bid to refer Tehran to the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions.

Bush's meeting with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani came a day after he departed from White House talking points and broached the prospect of large-scale withdrawal of U.S. forces from his country. In an interview with The Washington Post on Monday, Talabani said "at least from 40,000 to 50,000 American troops can be [withdrawn] by the end of this year."

After meeting with Bush on Tuesday morning, Talabani joined the president in the East Room to deliver a different message. "We will set no timetable for withdrawal, Mr. President," Talabani said at a joint media availability. "A timetable will help the terrorists, will encourage them [to think] that they could defeat a superpower of the world and the Iraqi people."

Still, Talabani added that he hoped enough Iraqi security forces would be trained by the end of 2006 to take " responsibility from many American troops with complete agreement with Americans."

A longtime Kurdish leader who resisted Saddam Hussein's rule, Talabani effusively thanked Bush for liberating Iraqis from the "worst kind of dictatorship" and praised him as "a visionary, great statesman." Smiling broadly, Talabani said, "We will never forget what you have done for our people."

Bush, in turn, praised the new constitution drafted by Iraqi negotiators as "an historic milestone" that protects fundamental rights and makes all Iraqis equal before the law. In private, though, aides said Bush used the opportunity to urge Talabani to be flexible in considering changes to the constitution, which was written by Shiite and Kurdish leaders but rejected by leaders of the Sunni minority.

The president also delivered a sharp warning to Syria for not doing more to stop foreign fighters from crossing its border with Iraq to fight U.S. forces. "The Syrian leader must understand we take his lack of action seriously," Bush said, adding that he plans to speak with allies about pressuring Damascus.

Bush similarly said he would bring up Iran with Hu and Putin in hopes of forging a consensus approach to blocking any nuclear weapons development by the theocratic state. Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who will be in New York for his first U.S. visit since winning election, has insisted that his country wants to develop only civilian nuclear power.

"Some of us are wondering why they need civilian nuclear power, anyway," Bush said. "They're awash with hydrocarbons. Nevertheless, it's a right of a government to want to have a civilian nuclear program."

That comment caused a stir because the U.S. government has adamantly rejected North Korea's aspirations for civilian nuclear power. Aides later insisted Bush was not trying to signal a policy change toward Pyongyang. "I can guarantee you that's not what he intended to indicate," said National Security Council spokesman Frederick L. Jones II.

Arriving in New York later in the day, Bush met with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan in preparation for Wednesday's summit. Negotiators agreed on a plan to restructure the United Nations and follow up pledges to combat world poverty.

During his subsequent joint appearance with Hu, the Chinese leader acknowledged "some frictions" as trade grows and promised that Beijing will "take effective measures" to address trade imbalances and "step up its efforts to protect intellectual properties." Hu urged the United States to oppose "so-called Taiwan independence."

Bush, who will visit China in November, emphasized the strength of the relationship. "I will bring up human rights," the president said. "But most importantly, I view this visit as an opportunity to continue a dialogue in dealing with a very important relationship for the United States and the world."

Bush Puts Iraq, China And Iran On Agenda (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

For the first time since the Hurricane Katrina crisis, President Bush returned yesterday to dealing with festering global problems, trying to bolster Iraq's president at the White House and then flying to New York to urge President Hu Jintao of China to join him in trying to stop nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea.

Mr. Bush's meeting with Mr. Hu was delayed a week by the hurricane, and was the first in a series planned for coming months, including a trip by Mr. Bush to China in November.

When the session finally took place yesterday at the Waldorf-Astoria, Mr. Bush was lobbying hard to persuade Mr. Hu - who has nurtured a close relationship with Iran - not to block action by the International Atomic Energy Agency next week to refer Iran's work on uranium enrichment to the Security Council.

"We didn't come away with a clear commitment," Michael J. Green, the top official for Asia in the National Security Council, said yesterday evening. But he added that Mr. Hu had agreed to urge Iran to follow the mandates of the I.A.E.A.

Nuclear issues, trade and Taiwan dominated the meeting at the Waldorf, before Mr. Bush held a reception for more than 170 world leaders who have gathered for the opening of the United Nations General Assembly and a meeting on global poverty.

Mr. Bush's aides also turned over to Mr. Hu a list of human rights cases that particularly concern the United States, Mr. Green said. While they declined to describe most of those cases, Mr. Green said one involved Zhao Yan, a researcher for The New York Times in Beijing, who has been accused of leaking state secrets to the newspaper. Mr. Zhao and The Times have denied the accusation, and Mr. Zhao has had no court hearing or any public explanation of why he was arrested.

Earlier yesterday, at a news conference in Washington with President Jalal Talabani of Iraq, Mr. Bush expressed some impatience with Iran's defiance of an agreement it reached last year with three European nations.

"Some of us are wondering why they need civilian nuclear power anyway," Mr. Bush said. "They're awash with hydrocarbons. Nevertheless, it's a right of a government to want to have a civilian nuclear program."

Mr. Bush's aides insisted later in the day that the president was not, with that last statement, signaling a greater willingness to allow either Iran or North Korea to acquire what both have said is their right: control over the complete nuclear fuel cycle, the path to making fuel for either civilian reactors or weapons. Mr. Bush explicitly said Iran's nuclear program should develop "in such a way that they don't gain the expertise necessary to be able to enrich."

But his comments were far milder than they were three years ago, when Mr. Bush first called Iran and North Korea part of an "axis of evil."

Instead, Mr. Green said, Mr. Hu and Mr. Bush talked about ways to pressure North Korea to make what Mr. Green called "a strategic decision" to give up its weapons programs.

Talks on North Korea resumed in Beijing yesterday, with North Korea repeating, as Iran has, that it has a right to develop its own civilian nuclear programs.

While Mr. Hu and Mr. Bush carefully chose words to show their agreement on the issue - "We have always stood for a nuclear-weapon-free Korean Peninsula," Mr. Hu said - some administration officials say they are increasingly concerned that the United States and Tokyo are pursuing one approach, and Beijing and South Korea are pursuing another.

The United States has made full disarmament of North Korea its priority. But both the Chinese and the South Koreans have spoken of the need to assure "stability" in North Korea, a code word for making sure that the North Korean government does not collapse.

At moments, the meeting with the Chinese had echoes of the kind of meetings Mr. Bush's father used to hold with Japan in the late 1980's when he was trying to lower a fast-widening trade deficit with Japan and used to travel to Tokyo to urge Japan, when its economy seemed to be growing without limit, to pay heed to the damage being done to American workers.

Mr. Hu was ready for that.

"What I would like to express here is that China does not pursue a huge trade surplus in its trade with the United States," he said. "And we are willing to work with the United States to take effective measures to increase China's imports from the United States."

The last statement was especially significant, because Mr. Hu steered clear of committing to any restraints in exports to the United States.

The issue may become even more heated if Hurricane Katrina leads to a downturn in American economic growth. Some of the affected industries in the south compete with Chinese companies, and were already calling for greater government protection.

The earlier meeting with Mr. Talabani was notable for the Iraqi leader's change of tone on an issue important to Mr. Bush: setting any parameters for the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq.

On Friday in Washington, Mr. Talabani said he believed that American troops would be required for two years. The Washington Post reported Monday that he had said he thought 40,000 to 50,000 American troops could be withdrawn by the end of the year. But yesterday, he recited the White House talking points: that it was impossible, and unwise, to set a deadline. "We will set no timetable for withdrawal, Mr. President," he said to Mr. Bush.

Bush Packs In Busy Day Of Diplomacy (AJC/AP)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

NEW YORK — President Bush won a pledge from Chinese President Hu Jintao to step up pressure on North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons, but the two leaders remained apart Tuesday over whether to seek international sanctions against Iran.

The two leaders met here as talks resumed in Beijing aimed at persuading North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons.

Bush said his discussions with Hu ranged from how to prevent an avian flu pandemic to economic matters and feared nuclear proliferation in North Korea and Iran. He seemed pleased when Hu said, "We stand ready to step up our communication and cooperation" to gain fresh progress in negotiations with North Korea.

While offering help on North Korea, Hu did not embrace a U.S. proposal to bring Iran before the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions for its suspected nuclear weapons program. "No, we didn't come away with a clear commitment on the tactics," Mike Green, the National Security Council's senior director for Asia, said at a briefing on the Bush-Hu meeting.

"China thinks we all need to step up the diplomatic efforts," Green said. He said Bush did not ask for a commitment on sanctions, but the Chinese side "understands, I think, exactly where we're coming from."

Bush, at a news conference earlier in Washington, appeared to give Iran a green light to have a peaceful nuclear program. But the United States has a different view about North Korea. "North Korea needs to get out, completely out, of the nuclear business," Green said.

Consumed by Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts for two weeks, Bush pivoted to foreign policy for a meeting of more than 160 presidents, prime ministers and kings at a summit on combating poverty and reforming the United Nations. Bush is to address the General Assembly on Wednesday.

Bush has had a testy relationship with the U.N., portraying it as a bloated bureaucracy slow to address global problems. Criticism of the United States is common, particularly over the war in Iraq and Bush's refusal to sign the Kyoto treaty on global warming. Bush arrived here with the lowest approval ratings of his presidency and the perception that his administration had mishandled hurricane relief. He said he took responsibility for whatever had gone wrong.

Bush met privately in a hotel suite with Hu, who is making his first visit to the United States as his country's leader. The White House is concerned about China's growing economic and military might and its voracious thirst for oil — a factor in rising U.S. gasoline prices.

The president broadly raised human rights concerns with Hu, and the administration presented China's delegation with a list of specific cases that the United States regards as particularly important. Green declined to identify the cases or say how many were on the list, saying the goal was to try to resolve them quietly.

Bush accepted an invitation to visit China in November after a summit in South Korea with Asian leaders. The president also is expected to stop in Japan.

For his part, Hu acknowledged tensions with Washington about China's huge trade surplus and said that "it is inevitable that we may have some frictions."

Bush met with Hu at the end of a busy day of diplomacy stretching from the White House to the United Nations. In Washington, the president issued a stern warning to Syria about alleged involvement in Iraq and vowed the United States will not waver from its commitment in Iraq.

The Bush administration is seeking the support of China, Russia and India to bring Iran before the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions for its suspected nuclear weapons program. Iran suspended uranium conversion and enrichment activities last year but resumed them last month. Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, warned of serious consequences if the Security Council considers sanctions.

Bush questioned why Iran needs a civilian nuclear power program, given Tehran's huge oil reserves. "Nevertheless, it's a right of a government to want to have a civilian nuclear program," Bush said. But he went on to say there must be guidelines and "one such guideline would be in such a way that they don't gain the expertise necessary to be able to enrich."

China has a massive surplus in trade with the United States. Last year's U.S.-China deficit hit a record $162 billion, the largest imbalance ever recorded with a single country.

Hu promised to "work hard" to address the trade imbalance and said China will protect the intellectual property rights of American companies — a major concern of U.S. firms.

"What I would like to stress here is that China does not pursue a huge trade surplus in trade with the United States," Hu said.

Bush began the day at the White House, meeting with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani. Once again, the two leaders refused to set a deadline for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Hu Tells Bush China Will Work On U.S. Concerns (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

NEW YORK -- Chinese President Hu Jintao told President Bush that his government was prepared to take "effective measures" to ease the soaring U.S. trade deficit with China while also moving to crack down on rampant piracy problems at home.

The two leaders met on the margins of a United Nations summit here at a time of varied tensions between the two countries and a week after Hurricane Katrina postponed a long-anticipated White House visit by Mr. Hu. In remarks before the two met in private, Mr. Hu said China "does not pursue a huge trade surplus" with the U.S. and was willing to take steps to increase U.S. imports to China, mainly by strengthening piracy rules and increasing purchases of big-ticket items.

The U.S. last year imported $162 billion more from China than it exported to China. U.S. officials said that Mr. Hu's remarks on intellectual-property protection were particularly important, and among the strongest assurances on that front that any Chinese leader has ever offered. Mr. Hu said that on the whole, relations between the two countries were "developing quite well," although he conceded that the rapid growth in bilateral trade had created "some frictions" between the two economic powers.

The U.S. and China in recent months have tussled over issues from China's restrictive monetary policy and intellectual-property problems to the desire among Chinese energy companies such as Cnooc Ltd. to acquire corporate assets in the U.S. and elsewhere.

Mike Green, President Bush's top Asia adviser, said Mr. Bush used the hourlong session to press Mr. Hu to use China's clout in international efforts to halt nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea. On Iran, Mr. Hu told the president that China wanted to see Tehran live up to its international obligations, but he didn't offer explicit support for any moves to take the matter to the U.N. Security Council.

Mr. Bush also urged the two countries to coordinate efforts to avoid a potential avian-flu pandemic through aggressive containment, and a strengthened early-warning system. Mr. Hu went on at some length during the private discussion to emphasize that China was intent on "peaceful development," Mr. Green said.

On the issue of China's exchange rate, Mr. Bush applauded Beijing's move this summer to allow the yuan to float slightly against other currencies, but urged Mr. Hu to take additional steps to adopt a fully flexible exchange rate. Mr. Bush also agreed to visit Beijing in late November.

Bush Heads To U.N. Summit With Global Views Of U.S. Altered (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS - President Bush joins in the largest-ever gathering of world leaders here Wednesday at a moment when his government's botched response to Hurricane Katrina has changed views of America both at home and abroad.

Opinion columns around the world expressed incredulity that the world's wealthiest country could fail to take care of its own. The hurricane aftermath threw a light on America's class and racial divides.

At home, polls show, Americans want more attention on domestic concerns and less on the war on terrorism.

The president and his top aides have given no sign they intend to change the course from their foreign policy priorities: the promotion of democracy around the world and the war in Iraq. Still, public opinion at home and abroad will pose challenges for this agenda, according to diplomats and other foreign policy observers.

The images of poor, mostly black Americans waiting days for help and rescue collide with Bush's goal of improving the United States' image overseas, an effort headed by his long-time aide Karen Hughes.

"If Katrina has any redeeming impact, it must be to cause us to see ourselves as others see us. I regret to say the picture cannot be a pretty one," Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., said in a Senate floor speech. "The perception of the United States in these troubled times should be a cause of major concern for everyone who holds public office."

Hughes, the undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, vigorously disputed charges, heard at home and abroad, that the Bush administration reacted slowly because Katrina's victims were mostly poor and black.

The world has also seen evidence of Americans' overwhelming generosity in times of need, Hughes said. "The story is, Americans care about our fellow Americans."

But the world also has seen vivid examples of poverty and racial division in the disaster zone.

The U.N.'s 2005 Human Development Report, a look at how the world is doing meeting targets set five years ago at reducing human suffering, examines, among many other things, inequality in the United States.

"U.S. public health indicators are marred by deep inequalities linked to income, health insurance coverage, race, ethnicity, geography and - critically - access to health care," the authors of the report wrote.

Fifty years of declines in the U.S. infant mortality rate are now being reversed, the report states. It added: "The Indian state of Kerala has an urban infant death rate lower than that for African Americans in Washington, D.C."

After briefly hesitating, Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice agreed to accept assistance from around the globe to help deal with the hurricane's aftermath. Aid, from cash for the American Red Cross to blankets and search and rescue teams, has flowed from dozens of countries.

Some diplomats hope the global solidarity will help heal ties with the United States, which were badly damaged by divisions over the Iraq war and other issues.

Canadians were simmering over a long-standing trade dispute with Washington over softwood lumber - until Katrina hit.

"After all we've gone through on Iraq and war and peace, this is a wonderful opportunity," said Wolfgang Ischinger, Germany's ambassador to the United States. Germany has sent three planeloads of military-style meals, or "meals ready to eat," as well as half a dozen airplanes with water purification experts and equipment.

Ischinger said that from his daily talks with top Bush officials, "They know that accepting these offers ... is not something that will be humiliating. ... It will actually have positive effects on America's relationships with these particular countries."

DOJ_NMG_0005384

But Josef Joffe, publisher-editor of the prestigious German weekly Die Zeit, said the United States is unlikely to act more humbly in international affairs as a result.

"The U.S. doesn't need assistance, and help rarely buys compliance. Otherwise so many nations that are beneficiaries of U.S. largesse would do its bidding," Joffe said.

Katrina's main impact on foreign policy could be to simply divert the Bush administration's focus more toward domestic concerns.

Bush's visit to the United Nations is sandwiched between two trips to the Gulf Coast.

He and Rice have been bombarded with questions about Katrina and race issues. And diplomats from the Middle East and elsewhere say they are beginning to worry about sustained U.S. attention to their region.

A poll released last week by the Pew Research Center found that for the first time since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, more Americans felt it was important to focus on domestic issues rather than the war on terrorism, by a margin of 56 percent to 25 percent.

"I think this is really something to watch," said Carroll Doherty, the center's associate director. "You have a clear majority saying domestic policy is important."

The president will gather here with 170 fellow world leaders to sign a document on reducing poverty, raising development levels and reforming the United Nations. The document has been significantly watered down because of deep disagreements among U.N. members.

Bush also planned a series of meetings with other leaders, starting with a Tuesday afternoon meeting with Chinese President Hu Jintao, who expressed sympathy for the hurricane losses.

U.S. Shares Data With China, India To Build Iran Case (WSJ)

By Carla Anne Robbins

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

WASHINGTON -- As the U.S. and Europe prepare to face off with Iran at the United Nations, the Bush administration dispatched intelligence experts to China and India last week to brief them on Tehran's alleged efforts to develop a missile capable of delivering a nuclear warhead.

The decision to share the highly classified intelligence is a measure of the resistance the U.S. is meeting as it pushes, along with the Europeans, for Iran's nuclear activities to be referred to the U.N. Security Council.

Even after Tehran resumed some sensitive nuclear activities last month and ended negotiations with the Europeans, the U.S. and its allies face a challenge persuading China, Russia and other key nations that the situation is grave enough -- or Iran's weapons program advanced enough -- for international reprisals.

The failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq has damaged U.S. credibility, making it even harder to press the case against Iran.

The missile intelligence, which U.S. officials acquired covertly last year, documents Iran's efforts from 2001 to 2003 to adapt its Shahab-3 missile to deliver a "black box" that experts at U.S. nuclear-weapons laboratories believe almost certainly is a nuclear warhead. The data, which include tens of thousands of pages of Farsi-language computer files, diagrams and missile test results, don't include a nuclear-warhead design. But according to several officials who have been briefed on the intelligence, the specifications for size, shape, weight and detonation don't vary and make no sense for conventional weapons.

The U.S. has already shared the intelligence with Britain, which supported the Iraq war, and with France and Germany, which opposed it, as well as top officials at the International Atomic Energy Agency. Intelligence officials in all three European countries have been impressed with the depth and apparent authenticity of the finding, according to European officials.

The U.S. has also offered to brief Russia on the missile data and may share the findings with other countries in coming days, officials said.

The confrontation with Iran will be a central topic at this week's U.N. summit in New York and at next week's IAEA board meeting in Vienna. Iran's new hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is expected to try to deflect Western pressure when he speaks to the U.N. today and later in the week. U.S. and European officials said he might call for wider negotiations -- possibly bringing in China, Russia and India -- after failing to persuade Europe and the U.S. that his country's nuclear program is solely for generating power.

President Bush speaks to the world body today . Officials last night were discussing what, if anything, he would say about Iran at a meeting that is focused on alleviating poverty and U.N. overhauls. Mindful of the ill will created by the Iraq war, the U.S. has left much of the public lobbying until now to the Europeans.

Recognizing the pivotal role China and Russia will play as veto-wielding members of the Security Council, Mr. Bush said he planned to "speak candidly about Iran" in private meetings with Chinese President Hu Jintao and Russian President Vladimir

Putin. "It is very important for the world to understand that Iran with nuclear weapons will be incredibly destabilizing," he said. After Mr. Bush's meeting with the Chinese leader last night, White House Asia expert Michael Green told reporters that Mr. Hu told the President that he would press Iran to live up to its IAEA obligations but didn't commit to supporting a Security Council referral. (See related article on page A8.)

In recent days, Russia and India, among others, have said publicly that they would oppose a Security Council referral.

Iran insists that it has a right to pursue a peaceful nuclear program -- an argument that resonates around the world, especially when backed by Iran's considerable oil wealth. Mr. Bush yesterday acknowledged that right but said constraints need to be imposed to ensure that Iran also doesn't "gain the expertise" to produce nuclear weapons.

U.N. nuclear monitors have repeatedly cited Tehran for concealing and lying about its nuclear efforts. But without solid proof of a weapons program, many members of the IAEA board have resisted a showdown. Some are fearful that a referral could be a first step toward a military confrontation. Other countries have more mercantilist interests, which Iran has deftly played upon. With energy-hungry China and India, in particular, Tehran has emphasized its oil supply; with Moscow its willingness to buy nuclear technology,

In August, Iran restarted its uranium conversion plant, an important first step toward the production of enriched uranium either for nuclear fuel or a nuclear weapon. While the Europeans repeatedly warned Tehran that such a move would provoke a swift referral to the Security Council, neither they nor the Americans have been able to win over a large block of the IAEA's 35-member board, which usually acts on consensus.

U.S. officials said yesterday that it is too early to rate their chances for a referral next week and that much will depend on how conciliatory or confrontational the Iranian leader chooses to be during his meetings in New York.

Some U.S. officials have begun arguing that a simple majority of the board would be enough to go ahead, and that those votes are there. In recent days, the U.S. has come down especially hard on the Indians -- who have status among the nonaligned -- warning that a White House offer to sell it civilian technology could be scuttled if the U.S. Congress believes New Delhi is too supportive of Iran.

But without the support of Beijing and Moscow a referral would likely stall once it got to the U.N.

In a conversation with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice earlier this week, IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei suggested the U.S. and Europe might seek a resolution that gives Iran a few more weeks to suspend uranium conversion and provide more access to agency monitors or face a referral.

U.S. Deploys Slide Show To Press Case Against Iran (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 13 -- With an hour-long slide show that blends satellite imagery with disquieting assumptions about Iran's nuclear energy program, Bush administration officials have been trying to convince allies that Tehran is on a fast track toward nuclear weapons.

The PowerPoint briefing, titled "A History of Concealment and Deception," has been presented to diplomats from more than a dozen countries. Several diplomats said the presentation, intended to win allies for increasing pressure on the Iranian government, dismisses ambiguities in the evidence about Iran's intentions and omits alternative explanations under debate among intelligence analysts.

The presenters argue that the evidence leads solidly to a conclusion that Iran's nuclear program is aimed at producing weapons, according to diplomats who have attended the briefings and U.S. officials who helped to assemble the slide show. But even U.S. intelligence estimates acknowledge that other possibilities are plausible, though unverified.

The problem, acknowledged one U.S. official, is that the evidence is not definitive. Briefers "say you can't draw any other conclusion, and of course you can draw other conclusions," said the official, who would discuss the closed-door sessions only on condition of anonymity.

The briefings were conducted in Vienna over the past month in advance of a gathering of world leaders this week at the United Nations. President Bush, who is to address the annual General Assembly gathering Wednesday, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, plan to use the meeting to press for agreement to threaten international sanctions against Iran.

The president's direct involvement marks an escalation of a two-year effort to bring Iran before the U.N. Security Council, which has the power to impose sanctions, unless Tehran gives up technology capable of enriching uranium for a bomb. U.S. officials have acknowledged that it has been an uphill campaign, with opposition from key allies who fear a prelude to a military campaign.

Several diplomats said the slide show reminded them of the flawed presentation on Iraq's weapons programs made by then-secretary of state Colin L. Powell to the U.N. Security Council in February 2003. "I don't think they'll lose any support, but it isn't going to win anyone either," said one European diplomat who attended the recent briefing and whose country backs the U.S. position on Iran.

Robert G. Joseph, undersecretary of state for arms control and international security, acknowledged last week that despite European support, the Bush administration has traveled a tough road in persuading others that Iran should face consequences for a nuclear program it built in secret.

"There's a great deal of resistance . . . on the part of many governments who don't seem to place, quite frankly, nonproliferation and Iran, a nuclear-armed Iran, at the top of their priority list," he told a congressional panel last week.

Several influential nations such as India, Russia, China, South Africa and Brazil share U.S. suspicions about Iran's intentions. But they maintain profound differences with the Bush administration over how to respond, and are apprehensive about the goals of a U.S. president who has said "all options are on the table," in dealing with Tehran.

Three years ago, the White House used the same annual gathering to put both Iraq, and the world community on notice. In a toughly-worded speech, delivered six months before the U.S. invasion of Iraq, Bush warned that the United States would deal alone, if necessary, with a dictator bent on launching nuclear weapons.

The U.S. intelligence community no longer believes Iraq was trying to reconstitute a nuclear program, as the president said. Those and other U.S. intelligence failures have remained fresh in the minds of international decision-makers now being asked to weigh the case of Iran.

The Iraq experience has had a "sobering effect" on Iran discussions, said President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan, a close ally of the Bush administration. In an interview, he refused to speculate on whether Iran, whose program was secretly aided by Pakistan's top nuclear scientist, had been designed for weapons production. But he said he feels confident Iran's aims are now peaceful and there was no need for Security Council action.

Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who is also attending the U.N. summit, has his own meetings scheduled in New York, and Iranian officials said he would use the gathering to mount forceful counterarguments. Iranian diplomats have been in close contact with countries such as Japan, which relies heavily on Iranian oil.

The outcome of both sides' efforts will be tested on Sept. 19, when diplomats from 35 countries meet at the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna to decide whether to report Iran's case to the Security Council.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns last night suggested the administration may not be able to press for a successful vote and was exploring other options. He said the administration was working "with lots of other governments to devise an international coalition that will call upon Iran to return to the talks," it walked away from this summer with European negotiators. "There is a consensus that Iran has got to return to the talks."

Iran insists its nuclear efforts are aimed at producing nuclear energy, not bombs. The Bush administration contends that the energy program, built in secret and exposed in 2002, is just a cover. "They cannot be allowed to develop nuclear weapons under the guise of a civilian nuclear program, which is what they're trying to do," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said earlier this month.

A recent U.S. intelligence estimate found that Iran, mostly through its energy program, is acquiring and mastering technologies that could also be used for bomb-making. But there is no proof that such diversion has occurred, the estimate said, and the intelligence community is uncertain as to whether Iran's ruling clerics have made a decision to go forward with a nuclear weapons program.

The estimate judged Iran to be as much as a decade away from being able to manufacture the fissile material necessary for a nuclear explosion. A report issued last week by the International Institute for Security Studies, a London-based research group, found Iran was 10 to 15 years from the technical know-how to build a bomb.

Both reports are based in large part on the findings of U.N. nuclear inspectors, now in their third year of investigating Iran's program. While no proof of a weapons program has been found, serious questions about Tehran's past work on centrifuge designs and experiments with plutonium -- a key ingredient for a nuclear weapon -- have yet to be adequately addressed and have furthered suspicions that the country is hiding information.

With little new information from the probe, the Bush administration put together its own presentation of Iran's program for diplomats in Vienna who are weighing whether to report Iran to the Security Council.

The presentation has not been vetted through standard U.S. intelligence channels because it does not include secret material. One U.S. official involved in the briefing said the intelligence community had nothing to do with the presentation and "probably would have disavowed some of it because it draws conclusions that aren't strictly supported by the facts."

The presentation, conducted in a conference room at the U.S. mission in Vienna, includes a pictorial comparison of Iranian facilities and missiles with photos of similar-looking items in North Korea and Pakistan, according to a copy of the slides handed out to diplomats. Pakistan largely supplied Iran with its nuclear infrastructure but, as a key U.S. ally, it is identified in the presentation only as "another country."

DOJ_NMG_0005387

Corey Hinderstein, a nuclear analyst with the Institute for Science and International Security, said the presence of a weapons program could not be established through such comparisons. She noted that North Korea's missile wasn't designed for nuclear weapons so comparing it to an Iranian missile that also wasn't designed to carry a nuclear payload "doesn't make sense."

Decision Time On Iran (NYT)

By Pierre Goldschmidt

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

Brussels

In November 2003, Iran averted a crisis when it agreed to suspend activities that could one day give it the capacity to produce weapons-grade nuclear material. The International Atomic Energy Agency had discovered an 18-year pattern of noncompliance by Iran with its obligations to report all its nuclear activities, during which time international inspectors could not verify that they were solely for peaceful purposes. Because Iran suspended its most sensitive activities, the agency's board agreed to hold off reporting Iran to the United Nations Security Council. This was understood, in effect, as a quid pro quo: suspension of uranium-enrichment-related and reprocessing activities in return for not being reported to the Security Council.

Last November, Iran agreed with Britain, France and Germany to extend its suspension to include "all tests or production at any uranium-conversion installation." Iran also agreed that "sustaining the suspension, while negotiations on a long-term agreement are under way, will be essential for the continuation of the overall process."

But last month, the day before Britain, France and Germany gave Iran a proposal for a long-term agreement that offered economic assistance in exchange for ending its nuclear fuel cycle activities (but not its electrical nuclear program), Tehran announced that it would resume uranium conversion activities in Isfahan, which it did.

The agency's board of governors will meet in Vienna next Monday to decide how to respond. At the moment there is no consensus or even a majority that agrees with Washington, Berlin, London and Paris that Iran's noncompliance should be reported to the Security Council. Iran is vigorously lobbying its fellow developing countries on the board. While the agency's statute makes clear that it should report Iran's noncompliance to the Security Council, many board members are reluctant to do so, fearing a repeat of the dynamic that led to the war in Iraq.

It is important to remember that under the agency's statute, there is no deadline or expiration date after which noncompliance becomes moot. Thus, Iran is still accountable for its past breaches. And Iran's resumption of work related to uranium conversion eliminates the only reason for the three European countries not to report Iran to the Security Council.

A failure by the board to make such a report would considerably weaken the agency and the global nonproliferation regime. It would reveal that the world is unwilling to hold rule-breakers to account, inviting proliferation by other countries.

And it should be made clear that the purpose of reporting Iran to the Security Council is not to seek sanctions. Rather, the Security Council's authority should be invoked to press Iran to give the agency's inspectors the information and access they need to clear up quickly the many remaining uncertainties about what Iran has been doing and why.

Iran has been asked to do this repeatedly. Yet, two and a half years after its noncompliance was discovered, Iran is still holding back both information and full cooperation. Iran has not provided the requested evidence on why its leadership decided in 1985, in the middle of the war against Iraq, to pursue a uranium enrichment program when there was no short or medium-term need to fuel any electrical nuclear power plant. Inspectors are still unable to specify the origin of all enriched uranium particles found in Iran. And they cannot assure the truth of Iran's claims that after receiving more advanced centrifuge designs in 1995, it did nothing with them until 2002. Nor can inspectors rule out the possible involvement of Iran's military in nuclear-related activities.

It is time for the International Atomic Energy Agency to get the authority it needs from the Security Council to complete the verification that Iran's nuclear program is and has been, as claimed, exclusively for peaceful purposes. This is in everyone's interest, including Iran's, unless it still has something to hide. The Iranian people deserve better than a confrontation with the world.

North Korea Talks Resume At Logjam (WSJ)

By gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2005

BEIJING -- Talks aimed at persuading North Korea to give up its nuclear ambitions resumed with no public sign of progress toward a compromise between Washington and Pyongyang on a central issue: whether the North should be allowed to develop atomic energy.

DOJ_NMG_0005388

North Korea's chief delegate to the talks, Kim Kye Gwan, insisted that his country won't give up its right to nuclear power, despite American demands that Pyongyang dismantle all of its atomic programs, military and civilian.

"We have this right, and the more important thing is that we should use this right," Mr. Kim said before flying to Beijing, according to China's Xinhua news agency. "We utterly cannot accept" any U.S.-imposed limits on civilian nuclear programs, he said.

Differences over the North's exercise of atomic-energy rights came into sharp focus during two weeks of negotiations that broke off in August. Other issues also remain, including a U.S. demand that North Korea pledge not to export weapons of mass destruction.

"Nothing is agreed unless everything is agreed," said the top U.S. envoy to the talks, Christopher Hill. "The fundamental question is whether [North Korea] is ready to abandon its nuclear programs."

If the talks again fail to reach an agreement, it could seriously erode support for continued negotiations. But it isn't clear that the administration of President Bush, focused on hurricane relief as well as Iraq and Iran, is prepared to quickly take other steps, such as seeking United Nations Security Council action.

Mr. Hill said it would become clear within "days, not weeks," whether an agreement could be struck laying down guidelines for an eventual resolution of the nuclear standoff. A senior South Korean diplomat concurred, saying: "Having longer meetings may not help if no one changes positions."

During the talks that ended in August, Pyongyang not only asserted its right to nuclear power but demanded that the U.S. and others provide it with reactors to generate electricity as part of any deal to abandon its atomic-weapons programs. In recent weeks, the North has reaffirmed its stance.

Washington, which says North Korea can't be trusted not to turn peaceful nuclear activities to military uses, opposes Pyongyang's demand for reactors. The demand appears to have little support among other participants at the talks. The other countries involved in the negotiations -- China, Japan, Russia and South Korea -- however, have expressed sympathy for the North's position that it must be able to retain its right to develop atomic energy.

A U.S.-led consortium started construction on two so-called light-water reactors for the North as part of a 1994 disarmament deal. That project was put on hold after the U.S. said it had evidence North Korea violated that agreement by starting a covert effort to develop nuclear weapons using uranium. U.S. officials have said the project won't be revived.

Six-Nation N. Korea Nuke Talks Resume (AJC/AP)

By Burt Herman, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

BEIJING — North Korea insisted Tuesday it will not give up its right to civilian nuclear programs, raising questions about the possibility of a breakthrough as six-nation talks aimed at persuading Pyongyang to abandon its atomic weapons resumed after a five-week recess.

Envoys from China, Japan, Russia, the United States and the two Koreas clasped hands together at a state guesthouse in Beijing before continuing the fourth round of talks since 2003 that have so far failed to resolve the standoff.

In New York on Tuesday, Chinese President Hu Jintao told President Bush that China was ready to "step up" pressure on Pyongyang for progress in the negotiations.

"We stand ready to step up our communication and cooperation" to gain fresh progress in negotiations aimed at halting North Korea's nuclear program, he said.

Mike Green, the National Security Council's senior director for Asia, said the Bush administration rejects the notion of North Korea retaining a civilian nuclear program. "North Korea needs to get out, completely out, of the nuclear business," Green said.

Last month, negotiators took a break after a record 13 days of meetings ended without agreement. The main U.S. negotiator said it would likely be shorter than last time.

"We should be able to wrap this up in a matter of days, not weeks," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Tuesday evening.

South Korea's head negotiator Song Min-soon agreed, saying talks would continue until Friday at least and then all parties would consult on a possible closing date, according to official Xinhua News Agency.

The issue of the North's peaceful nuclear program will be raised at the talks but Hill emphasized the focus is on ridding the North of atomic weapons.

"The fundamental question is whether (North Korea) is prepared to abandon its nuclear programs," he said, noting those programs are involved in production of materials for nuclear weapons.

Hill saw the North Korean delegation briefly Tuesday and said he planned a full one-on-one session with them Wednesday where their views would be made known.

DOJ_NMG_0005389

Contacts between U.S. and North Korean diplomats in New York in the past month failed to make any progress, Hill said earlier. But he said "their position does seem to be evolving a little," without elaborating.

Chief North Korean negotiator Kim Kye Gwan said before he left for Beijing that his country will not tolerate any obstruction to its right to a peaceful nuclear program, China's official Xinhua News Agency reported.

"This right is neither awarded nor needs to be approved by others," Kim said in Pyongyang, adding that the country would "utterly not accept" if Washington tries to block that right.

Still, Kim said the North would attend the talks with a sincere and flexible attitude, according to Xinhua.

The Chinese hosts also acknowledged the impasse over the North's demand to keep its civilian nuclear program.

"There is a major difference between the parties, that is the DPRK's (North Korea's) peaceful use of nuclear energy," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said.

The South Korea negotiator urged envoys to be open-minded at the talks.

"If each party can be a little more flexible in its position, there will be good results, but if they stick to their current position, good results will be hard to expect," Song said as he arrived in Beijing.

The two Koreas also began high-level talks Tuesday in Pyongyang separate from the nuclear forum, where the South proposed discussions on how to ease military tension and bring permanent peace to the divided peninsula. The Korean War ended in a 1953 cease-fire, leaving the two countries still at war. But reconciliation efforts have flourished since the first-and-only summit of their leaders in 2000.

The latest nuclear standoff was sparked in late 2002 after U.S. officials accused North Korea of running a secret uranium enrichment program in violation of an earlier deal, in which the North had agreed to stop weapons development in exchange for energy aid and other incentives.

The North has since denied having a uranium enrichment program, which would provide a way to create radioactive material for bombs other than its publicly acknowledged plutonium program.

On Tuesday, the North again called the uranium allegations "a sheer fabrication" in a commentary by the North's main Rodong Sinmun newspaper carried by the country's official Korean Central News Agency.

Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf told The New York Times in an interview released late Monday that he believed North Korea had obtained "probably a dozen" centrifuges — equipment needed to enrich uranium — from a network headed by the father of Pakistan's nuclear weapons program.

N. Korea Insists On Nuclear Energy As Talks Resume (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 13 -- Standing firm on a key disagreement, North Korea declared Tuesday it would not relinquish peaceful nuclear energy as diplomats from six nations opened another round of stalemated negotiations on its nuclear weapons program.

"The DPRK has the right to peaceful nuclear activity," said the chief North Korean negotiator, Vice Foreign Minister Kim Gye Gwan, using the initials for his country's formal name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. "This right is neither awarded nor needs to be approved by others."

Kim's declaration, made to the official New China News Agency as he flew to Beijing, suggested continued difficulties in the talks despite renewed pledges from all participants to show flexibility and goodwill. The talks among China, North and South Korea, Japan, Russia and the United States are aimed at the stated goal of achieving a nuclear-free Korean Peninsula. The issue of peaceful nuclear energy was a major reason the last round was suspended Aug. 7, after 13 days of intense bargaining.

The recess was supposed to be a time of reconsideration in the six nations' capitals, particularly in Pyongyang, U.S. officials said. But Kim's statement indicated that, from North Korea's point of view, the dispute over the production of nuclear energy for electricity remains unchanged.

"If the United States tries to lay down obstacles to the DPRK's using this right, we utterly cannot accept that," the North Korean envoy stated.

President Bush, speaking to reporters in Washington about Iran, which has also declared its intent to generate nuclear power, said, "It's a right of a government to want to have a civilian nuclear program," adding that "there ought to be guidelines" for such programs.

But the Bush administration remains adamant that North Korea must abandon its nuclear weapons programs and forgo nuclear energy production. The reason, the chief U.S. negotiator said in a briefing Friday in Washington, is that North Korea in the 1990s transformed a research reactor at Yongbyon into a source of weapons-grade plutonium.

"What North Korea needs to do is get out of the nuclear business," the U.S. negotiator, Christopher Hill, said. They have "had trouble keeping peaceful programs peaceful."

DOJ_NMG_0005390

The chief Japanese negotiator, Kenichiro Sasae, said North Korea's position on peaceful nuclear energy would be key to determining whether the six-party talks could move forward.

Despite Kim's apparently clear-cut declaration, Hill expressed hope that North Korea may have found a way to alter its position on that and other points since August. "We know precisely what the issues are," he told reporters here Tuesday. "I hope the DPRK delegation has also done its homework."

Chinese diplomats met with Hill and other delegations Tuesday, beginning open-ended discussions on a Chinese-drafted proposal for "agreed principles" to govern North Korea's nuclear disarmament. China has sponsored the six-party talks since they began in August 2003. The search for broad principles was launched at the last round of talks as a way to find a lowest common denominator of agreement, on which more specific accords could then be built. The idea, Hill explained, was to avoid the swift deadlock that had developed in three previous rounds by first finding agreement on broader goals.

But the fourth round bogged down in fundamental discord over peaceful nuclear energy, the timing of recognition and aid that North Korea would receive in return for giving up nuclear weapons and North Korea's desire to address the nuclear protection it says is implicit in the U.S.-South Korean alliance.

Nuclear Talks Restart On Pessimistic Note (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

SEOUL -- Six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons ambitions resumed in Beijing yesterday with Washington and Pyongyang publicly restating opposing positions that had forced a five-week recess.

Separately, South Korean Unification Minister Chung Dong-young arrived in North Korea yesterday for four days of Cabinet-level discussions.

Mr. Chung told reporters in Seoul that he was carrying a confidential message for the North's leadership from Washington.

The nuclear talks -- which were suspended Aug. 7 after 13 days of negotiations ended in stalemate -- resumed on a sour note after the North's chief negotiator, Kim Gye-gwan, told Xinhua News Agency that Pyongyang "has a right to peaceful nuclear activity."

Washington's chief negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, branded Mr. Kim's position "wrong" in comments to reporters in Beijing.

Pyongyang's demand to have a peaceful nuclear energy program has become a major sticking point.

"What the North needs to do is get out of the nuclear business," Mr. Hill said before arriving in Beijing.

North Korea has reiterated that it will not dismantle its atomic program "without getting any proposal compensating for the loss of nuclear energy."

The South has offered to meet the North's power needs from its own grid, but North Korea has not officially responded to the offer.

The U.S. position is complicated by Chinese and South Korean support for civil atomic energy use by North Korea on the condition that it abandon nuclear weapons.

China and South Korea are North Korea's No. 1 and No. 2 trade partners, respectively. They would be expected to resist U.S. efforts to impose sanctions should the talks collapse.

Another point of friction is Pyongyang's human rights abuses, with North Korea criticizing the recent appointment of a U.S. special envoy on the issue.

North Korea also has demanded the removal of U.S. nuclear weapons from South Korea -- weapons Washington insists do not exist -- and repeatedly has demanded an end to what it calls hostile American policy.

There is no deadline to complete the current round of talks. The best that delegates can hope for from the negotiations is a joint agreement on principles for the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula. The meeting yesterday focused on procedural issues.

Analysts saw few grounds for optimism.

"I think we are closer to breakdown than breakthrough," said Peter Beck, the Seoul-based northeast Asia project director of the International Crisis Group.

"The North has been harsh in its public statements, and the U.S. is not going to bend on the peaceful use of nuclear energy."

The talks involve the United States, the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia.

N. Korea, Iran Say They Will Continue Nuclear Efforts (CSM)

By Tom Regan

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2005

In an announcement likely to set up a collision with the United States, North Korea announced Monday that it will continue to demand the right to "peaceful" use of atomic energy. CNN reports that the six-nation talks – which also include China, Japan, Russia, and South Korea – resumed Tuesday in Beijing. AFXNews reports that the North Korea statement is the same demand that broke up the talks five weeks ago. (North Korea) has a right on peaceful nuclear activity. This right is neither awarded nor needs to be approved by others,' the country's chief envoy to the talks, Kim Gye-gwan, told the official Xinhua news agency at Pyongyang airport.

'We have this right, and the more important thing is that we should use this right. If the United States tries to set obstacles to the DPRK's (North Korea) using this right, we can utterly not accept that.'

Bloomberg News reports that the US rejected North Korea's stance. US chief negotiator Christopher Hill said Monday in Beijing that North Korea's position "does seem to be wrong." Still, US negotiators said they will renew efforts to convince North Korea to give up its civilian reactors at the talks. 'I hope the Democratic People's Republic of Korea delegation has done some homework,' Hill said. 'We had more than four weeks to look at the text of the proposed agreement.'

The talks will last 'as long as necessary and will not have a deadline,' China's Foreign Ministry said in a statement. Meanwhile, Reuters reports that Iran is "working hard to gather allies" to defeat a US-European attempt to "refer Tehran to the UN Security Council because of their fears it may be developing nuclear weapons." EU diplomats said Iran was focusing its lobbying efforts on key International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) board members such as China, Russia, India, Pakistan, South Africa and other non-aligned developing states, which have a good deal of sympathy for Tehran's arguments. In the past two weeks, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, visited Pakistan and India. While successfully negotiating a deal to allow Iranian natural gas to pass through Pakistan to India, Xinhua reports he also persuaded both countries to publicly support Tehran's position for "a peaceful resolution of Iran's nuclear issue and Iran's right to the peaceful use of nuclear energy in accordance with related international conventions."

Iran is continuing its diplomatic offensive this week. Mikhail Zygar and Dmitry Sidorov write in a column for MosNews that Iranian Vice-President Gholamreza Aghazadeh is in Moscow to discuss next week's IAEA meeting, where Iran's nuclear program will be the main topic. Russia has indicated that it will support Iran, and fight to keep it from being referred to the UN Security Council, where it would probably face sanctions. Mr. Zygar and Mr. Sidorov say this is "an extremely important victory for the Iranians," and a move likely to "cause the Kremlin a lot of problems." Russian authorities are relying on the fact that the world community will not want to punish Iran too severely and that the Europeans will not vote to transfer the dossier to the UN Security Council. Ariel Cohen, an expert with the Heritage Foundation, who participated in a meeting with Putin, Ivanov and Lavrov in Moscow, told [MosNews] that 'on the Iran subject they were telling mutually exclusive things: from one side — the Russian position is close to the Europeans', but from the other side — the Kremlin is against passing the dossier to the UN Security Council.'

According to Cohen's opinion, 'Russia does not want to spoil its relationship with Iran, because it sees Tehran as a member of a multi-polar coalition, which also includes China, and plays a role of the counter-balance for the US.' Russia has been a nuclear partner with Iran for some years. Russian engineers are currently building a nuclear plant at Bushehr, in southern Iran.

The US, however, is not taking the Iranian initiative lightly. The New York Times reported last Friday that both President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will speak with the leaders of these countries during this week's UN summit in New York in an effort to change their minds on the issue. But experts say their task will not be an easy one. Lacking a consensus, the United States and its European allies have shifted strategy and are now trying to get the matter referred to the Security Council by a simple majority of the agency's board, a step that officials in Vienna say is without precedent. North Korea was referred to the United Nations, for example, by consensus.

By Guy de Jonquières and Anna Fifield

Financial Times, September 14, 2005

US and South Korean officials are holding preparatory talks on a bilateral trade agreement, potentially paving the way for President George W. Bush to launch formal negotiations when he visits the country in November.

A deal with Asia's third biggest economy would give the US an important economic bridgehead into the region at a time of growing concern in Washington that the recent wave of regional trade initiatives in Asia could jeopardise US commercial interests there.

An agreement could pose a dilemma for the European Union, whose 25 members have been discussing for a year whether to seek a trade deal with Seoul. Brussels fears that if Washington forged an agreement first, it could guarantee US companies preferential access to South Korea's market for exports such as commercial aircraft and financial services. Rob Portman, the US trade representative, and Kim Hyun-chong, South Korea's trade minister, are understood already to have discussed the proposed deal at several meetings.

"We are working on it," a South Korean official said. "Whether this will actually materialise by the time Bush gets here is still uncertain."

US trade officials said no decision had yet been taken to launch negotiations with South Korea.

The preliminary discussions between Washington and Seoul are intended to iron out some of their differences on trade to simplify the eventual negotiations process and improve chances of agreement, according to people familiar with the talks.

South Korea is the seventh largest US trade partner, and the countries' bilateral trade exceeded $70bn last year.

Obstacles to a deal include South Korea's cinema quotas which stipulate that 40 per cent of films shown in cinemas are domestic and Korean restrictions on US beef, imposed after the mad cow scare. Korean officials hope the beef curbs can be removed later this year.

Washington also argues that Korea's pharmaceuticals pricing policy does not provide enough rewards for research-intensive drugs and its system of basing car taxes on engine capacity puts US carmakers at a disadvantage.

South Korea hopes a deal would cut industrial tariffs on many of its exports and lead Washington to exercise greater restraint over antidumping actions, of which Korean products have frequently been targets. A deal could also make it easier to resolve bilateral trade problems, such as a recent dispute over subsidies to Hynix, the Korean chipmaker.

Singapore and Vietnam are the only east Asian countries with which the US has so far concluded trade agreements. Mr Bush will visit the South Korean port city of Busan in November for the annual summit of the Asia Pacific Economic Co-operation forum.

U.N. Adopts Modest Goals On Reforms And Poverty (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 13 - The General Assembly unanimously approved a scaled-down statement of goals on Tuesday that Secretary General Kofi Annan said would still give world leaders gathering Wednesday a basis for recommendations to reform the organization and combat poverty.

Loud cheers from the delegates, however, could not disguise widespread disappointment at the weakening of the 35-page document.

When Mr. Annan first proposed the statement, it represented an ambitious blueprint for trying to balance the concerns of great powers over security, human rights and management efficiency with the developing world's needs for increased assistance and measures to cut poverty. In the end, virtually every section underwent severe cutbacks.

"Obviously, we didn't get everything we wanted," Mr. Annan said. "With 191 member states, it's not easy to get an agreement. But we can build on it." He noted that it represented progress in setting up a human rights council to replace the discredited Human Rights Commission and a new peace-building commission. He also singled out language on how to fight terrorism and establish means for international intervention when countries failed to protect their citizens from genocide.

He complained pointedly, however, about the elimination in the final version of language covering nuclear nonproliferation and disarmament, labeling the exclusion a "disgrace" at a time when the world feared a spread of unconventional weapons.

John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, said the United States was satisfied with the outcome, which he said matched the limited hopes he had had for the document.

"It would be wrong to claim more than is realistic and accurate about what these reforms are," he said. "They represent steps forward, but this is not the alpha and omega, and we never thought it would be."

The General Assembly vote ended three weeks of tense talks at which regional rivalries and national ambitions succeeded in scuttling attempts by a majority of nations to act in the broader United Nations interest. The continuing debate exposed in high profile the kind of indecisiveness that the document was supposed to address.

"There were governments that were not willing to make the concessions necessary," Mr. Annan said. "There were spoilers also in the group, let's be quite honest about that."

In his discussions with member states, he said, "I've tried to get them to understand that in our interconnected world, we need to look at issues in much broader terms rather than narrow national interests."

In answer to a question, he said he wished voting procedures could be changed so that a small minority of nations could not block the will of a large majority, as has occurred during recent weeks.

Mr. Bolton, a vocal critic of the organization's practices, seized on the events to say: "This is the way the U.N. operates. And it goes to the question, which is a much longer term question, as to whether the culture of decision-making at the U.N. is the most effective for the organization, and that's something that's not going to be resolved today or tomorrow."

The three-day meeting is expected to attract more than 170 presidents and prime ministers. The document they will be asked to approve does create a human rights council, but it leaves out any mention of its size and duties and drops language proposing that membership be subject to a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly. That was meant to insure that notorious rights offenders would not become members. While it condemns terrorism "in all forms," language saying that making targets of civilians is unjustified was deleted in exchange for dropping language exempting movements to resist occupation.

Management reform does not include strengthening the Secretary General's office, which is considered essential if the office is to have the flexibility to act decisively. In this case, a small group of developing countries blocked action out of fear of seeing power taken away from the General Assembly, where their voices are heard but where real decision-taking is discouraged.

U.N. Reform Bid Exposes Its Woes (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. World Summit on poverty and reform that opens today was supposed to be a watershed moment that breathed new life into the troubled world body and shored up its beleaguered leader, Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

But as diplomats approved the summit's centerpiece document Tuesday after weeks of bitter negotiations that eviscerated many of Annan's boldest reform proposals, many delegates expressed dismay that the meeting was highlighting the U.N.'s core problems rather than solving them.

Though U.N. officials tried to put the best face on the watered-down package of goals and structural changes concerning issues including human rights and terrorism, even Annan called the deletion of a section on nuclear disarmament "a disgrace" and an example of how the United Nations had failed.

How Annan's ambitious plan nearly collapsed and why says much about the way the U.N. works, and doesn't.

The secretary-general is treated more like an employee of the member nations than their leader, which made it difficult for him to guide the process. A culture of consensus allowed a handful of nations with entrenched interests to shape the outcome.

Though the final product retained little of the sweep and aspirations embodied in his original proposal, Annan framed it as a solid beginning for long-term reform.

"It would be wrong to describe this process as a failure. It is in the nature of the organization — when you have 191 member states you do not always get what you want," he said. "But the process is not over. As I said some years ago, reform is a process, not an event."

Annan began the reform process in earnest two years ago, seeking to restore the U.N.'s credibility after the U.S. and Britain invaded Iraq without the world body's blessing. He told the General Assembly that the U.N. had come to "a fork in the road" and must reinvent itself or fade into irrelevance.

In 2004, after a yearlong study, a panel of international experts recommended radical changes to help the organization better meet the challenges of the 21st century, including preemptive war, nuclear proliferation, terrorism, poverty and disease.

In March, Annan built on the panel's report to propose an ambitious plan that said the U.N. was built on four pillars — peace, security, development and human rights — and that the world was safer if countries acted together. Recognizing that nations would act first to protect their own interests, Annan urged them to not cherry-pick the package, but consider it as a whole and give something to gain something.

But in the following months, talks were distracted by the most contentious issue, Security Council expansion, and stalled by a few nations that believed they were better served by no change than the sweeping reforms Annan proposed. Meanwhile, Annan's ability to push the reforms behind the scenes was undermined by the revelations of corruption and abuse in the U.N.-run oil-for-food program for Iraq.

"Kofi was doing it out of the noblest of motives, but didn't have the moral authority to carry it out," said Stephen Schlesinger, author of "Acts of Creation," about the 1945 founding of the United Nations. "He needed to do the political groundwork first, but he just threw the reforms out there, thinking the moral imperative would be enough."

Parochial interests quickly surfaced. Nations including Pakistan and China objected to Security Council expansion because their regional rivals, India and Japan, respectively, aspired to new permanent seats as part of it.

Egypt wanted the struggle against foreign occupation to be excluded from any definition of terrorism. Cuba and others dug in their heels over the creation of a human rights body that would make it tougher for accused violators to be on the panel.

The U.S. said it would rather delete sections related to its key priorities — disarmament, a new human rights body, management reform and financing of development — than to sign on to something "half-baked."

As a result, diplomats had still not agreed on a reform document the day before world leaders began to arrive to endorse it. In the middle of the night, U.N. experts unilaterally created a new document they hoped everyone could agree on and later Tuesday told negotiators to take it or leave it. They accepted it.

Cuban Ambassador Orlando Gual said it took a last-ditch, undemocratic, nontransparent act to bolster the U.N.'s aspirations toward democracy, transparency and efficiency. "It's a Frankenstein," he said. "That's the best we could do?"

Nevertheless, diplomats pointed to a few achievements. For the first time, U.N. members formally embraced the notion that the international community has a responsibility to intervene to protect populations from genocide or war crimes when a national government is unwilling to do so, a proposal known as the "Responsibility to Protect." When Annan first proposed it in 1999, it provoked intense opposition by nations that said it would violate their sovereignty.

The document also creates a Peacebuilding Commission to help nations recovering from conflict, and establishes a new Human Rights Council to replace the current, discredited body. The U.N. Secretariat pried a bit of power away from the General Assembly to make decisions on hiring, budget and oversight, a partial win for the U.S.

But there were many more disappointments than successes, diplomats said. Developing nations wanted stronger commitments to break down trade barriers and to oblige wealthy nations to pledge more money for foreign aid. The U.S. was unhappy to not win clear criteria for the new human rights council, or a clear definition of terrorism.

But Annan said the most significant gap in the document was the absence of any mention of nuclear disarmament and nonproliferation, an omission made at Washington's insistence.

"This is a real disgrace," Annan said. "We have failed twice this year: We failed at the NPT [Nonproliferation Treaty Conference], and we failed now…. So I will appeal to the leaders who are coming here in the next few days to really step up to the plate and accept the challenge and show leadership on this issue."

Annan also said that the U.N.'s culture of consensus caused the most problems, allowing "spoilers" with special interests to hold the whole process hostage.

He suggested that the General Assembly should make more decisions by vote.

"There is unwillingness to do that," Annan said, "and as long as you do not want to do that, you are either going to be negotiated down to the lowest common denominator or you don't get a decision at all."

U.N. Scales Back Plan Of Action (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 13 -- The U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday adopted a declaration on the need to combat world poverty, promote human rights and strengthen management of the organization, but only after negotiators scaled back the document because of intractable disagreements among nations on sensitive issues.

The 35-page declaration will be endorsed by an estimated 170 world leaders at a three-day summit on U.N. reform that is to begin Wednesday, and delegates expressed disappointment that it had fallen short of Secretary General Kofi Annan's aspirations for a broad reorganization of the 60-year-old organization.

Still, they voiced relief that the entire process had not collapsed, which would have left the summit with no tangible result, and they highlighted relatively modest achievements in the document. Those included provisions that call for an increase in foreign aid, condemn terrorism and underscore the obligation of states to halt genocide and ethnic cleansing. Only Cuba and Venezuela voiced reservations about Tuesday's agreement.

The negotiators were forced to put off action on some of the thorniest and most ambitious goals, including proposals to expand the U.N. Security Council, to create an independent auditing board to scrutinize U.N. spending, and to impose basic membership standards for a new Human Rights Council so that chronic rights abusers will not be able to join.

Various proposals for expanding membership in the Security Council, for example, had been opposed by countries that felt they would lose out in the deal. And some developing countries fought proposals for changes in U.N. management practices, which they felt would shift authority from the General Assembly to the secretary general's office.

Negotiators also failed to agree on provisions calling on governments to halt the transfer of weapons of mass destruction to terrorists and urging nuclear weapons states to abide by their commitments to dismantle their atomic arms.

Annan said that the members' inability to adopt these measures on disarmament and nonproliferation constituted "a real disgrace" and that he hoped world leaders would see this as "a real signal to pick up the ashes and show leadership."

"There were governments that were not willing to make the concessions necessary," Annan told reporters after the declaration was adopted by the General Assembly. "There were spoilers, let's be quite honest about that."

DOJ_NMG_0005395

Still, Annan said he was pleased that the declaration reiterated the U.N. commitment to meet targets for slashing rates of poverty, disease and child mortality and that it called for creation of the new human rights council and a peace-building commission to oversee postwar recoveries. "I would have wanted more, all of us would have wanted more, but it's an important step forward," he said. "I think we can work with what we've been given."

The negotiations provided the first test of American diplomacy at the United Nations since President Bush bypassed congressional confirmation to install John R. Bolton as U.S. ambassador for 17 months.

Bolton on Tuesday demonstrated sufficient flexibility to reach agreements on some issues, while fending off provisions that might have restricted U.S. prerogatives and the freedom to use force unilaterally. Bolton, who led efforts to block the disarmament provision, succeeded in eliminating language that would have urged countries to support a host of international treaties or organizations, including the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and the International Criminal Court, which the United States opposes.

But Bolton failed to secure support for a number of key U.S. priorities, including the provision urging states to halt the transfer of the world's deadliest weapons to terrorists and measures intended to expand Annan's authority over hiring and to strengthen the oversight of U.N. finances.

Bolton said that while he would have preferred stronger provisions to ensure greater accountability in the U.N. bureaucracy, Tuesday's agreement would lead to a "somewhat improved U.N."

"But it would be wrong to claim more than is realistic and accurate about what these reforms are," he said. "They represent steps forward, but this is not the alpha and the omega, and we never thought it would be."

"This is not the end of the reform effort," added Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns. "It really is the beginning of a permanent reform effort that must be underway at the United Nations."

Despite setbacks, Burns said that Tuesday's agreement would eliminate the discredited U.N. Human Rights Commission, which includes Zimbabwe, Sudan and other human rights violators. But he acknowledged that "it is going to be a difficult exercise" to win the votes in the General Assembly to create a human rights council that reflects the wishes of the United States.

Burns said that although the United States and other governments had failed to include a clear condemnation of the deliberate targeting and killing of civilians, they had succeeded in extracting an Arab-backed provision that would have excluded so-called national liberation movements that target civilians from being labeled terrorists.

"We have broken the back of this ideological debate here about what constitutes terrorism," Burns said, noting that "sometimes in diplomacy defeating negative measures is very important." U.N. delegates, however, said Arab governments would insist on protections for armed groups fighting foreign occupation in an international convention on terrorism that is being negotiated by U.N. members.

Human rights and development advocates said the membership had squandered a rare opportunity to improve the organization, but praised the negotiators for endorsing the creation of an international obligation to halt attempted genocide.

"There is very little to celebrate," said Nicola Reindorp of Oxfam International. But governments "are showing that they can act boldly, by endorsing their responsibility to protect civilians from genocide, ethnic cleansing, war crimes and crimes against humanity."

General Assembly OKs Compromise Document (AJC/AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday adopted a watered-down document on poverty, human rights, terrorism and reform for world leaders to approve at a U.N. summit, shedding many of Secretary-General Kofi Annan's most ambitious goals after weeks of bitter debate.

The compromise 35-page document is supposed to launch a major reform of the United Nations itself and galvanize efforts to ease global poverty. But to reach a consensus, most of the text's details were gutted in favor of abstract language.

A definition of terrorism and details on how to replace the discredited U.N. Commission on Human Rights will not be included. U.S.-led efforts to overhaul U.N. management have been diluted, while nuclear nonproliferation isn't mentioned at all.

"Obviously we didn't get everything we wanted and with 191 member states it's not easy to get an agreement," Annan said. "All of us would have wanted more but we can work with what we have been given, and it's a step forward."

Diplomats called the document a breakthrough after so much debate. Several were pleased with the creation of a peacebuilding commission and a long section on development. That includes a mention of the desire by "many developed countries" to spend 0.7 percent of their gross national product on development.

"Don't expect Rome to be built in a day, it wasn't," Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones-Parry said. "Against the difficulty of this negotiation, it's complexity, this is a very substantial gain."

DOJ_NMG_0005396

The compromise document came after weeks of debate stretched into several days of marathon negotiation. Some diplomats had feared that negotiations would continue into the summit of world leaders that begins on Wednesday.

The outgoing president of the General Assembly, Gabon's Jean Ping, presented the compromise Tuesday afternoon in hopes of bridging the deepest divides and moving away from bitter line-by-line negotiations that had bogged down the debate.

"It would be wrong to claim more than is realistic and accurate about what these reforms are," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said. "They represent steps forward, but this is not the alpha and the omega, and we never thought it would be."

Though Annan said he was pleased, the document was a significant step backward for him. In March, when he had unveiled his proposals, Annan had urged world leaders to expand the size of the Security Council, come up with a definition of terrorism and accept that they have a "responsibility to protect" those being killed, which requires collective action.

And last week, a committee investigating the scandal-tainted U.N. oil-for-food program had called for wide-ranging management reforms. The committee, led by former U.S. Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, said that the United Nations would need a complete overhaul to tackle programs like oil-for-food in the future.

But efforts to expand the council were abandoned because of longtime national differences. "Responsibility to protect" was whittled down to nations' obligations to protect their own citizens. The document says nations should "make all efforts" toward a convention against terrorism but doesn't try to define it.

Diplomats said it had become clear during the negotiations that they had tried to tackle too much at once, and had to lower their expectations from the document.

"I think we tried to have a full plate and we were unable to eat so much in a single gulp," Costa Rica's U.N. Ambassador Bruno Stagno said earlier Tuesday.

The failure of world leaders to adopt an ambitious plan for development and reform disappointed some non-governmental organizations.

They fear that leaving the tough decisions to the 191-member General Assembly, where even seemingly innocuous initiatives can stall for years, is the quickest way to sink Annan's agenda.

"If world leaders do nothing more than adopt a broad, vague text that defers all substantive decisions to the General Assembly, they will have squandered a historic opportunity," Yvonne Terlingen, Amnesty International's U.N. representative, said in a statement.

Several nations were angry with the way the document was pushed through the General Assembly before it was translated from English into the five other official U.N. languages, a violation of U.N. protocol. That gave ambassadors little time to review it.

"This process is a clear violation of the most basic elements governing democratic processes," Venezuela's Foreign Minister Ali Rodriguez said from the floor after the vote.

The debate over the summit has led some to question if the United Nations can be reformed at all, especially when such decisions have to be accepted by all member states .

Security Council reform, for example, has bedeviled the United Nations for more than a decade. Each time the issue surfaces, diplomats say they believe the will is there for change, and each time they fail.

"I'm very pragmatic in relation to the United Nations," Australia's Prime Minister John Howard said Tuesday. "One cannot ignore the fact that we still live in a world of nation states."

Negotiators Seek Deal On Reforming U.N. (KCS)

By Edith M. Lederer

The Kansas City Star, September 14, 2005

UNITED NATIONS - With the U.N. summit a day away, negotiators tried to agree Tuesday on a watered-down plan for reforming the United Nations, having abandoned many of the sweeping changes recommended by Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

More than 160 presidents, prime ministers, kings and their entourages are descending on New York for Wednesday's summit opening. But it appeared less likely that the 191 U.N. member states would reach consensus on a document enabling the world body to tackle the major global issues of the 21st century.

Annan's chief of staff, Mark Malloch Brown, said negotiations seemed more favorable than a few days ago because "deadlines are starting to loosen minds and positions."

"There's a threshold where we always knew we wouldn't get the full loaf," Malloch Brown said. "We've got to start counting slices. Half or more will do at this stage."

Many countries blame the United States for proposing hundreds of amendments just a few weeks ago to a document they believed was nearing agreement. The major organizations of developing countries, including the Group of 77 and the Nonaligned Movement, then responded with dozens of their own.

DOJ_NMG_0005397

Russia and other countries also offered many amendments.

The United States also has pushed for strong language on its top priorities of management reform and a new Human Rights Council with greater authority.

Germany's U.N. Ambassador Gunter Pleuger said Monday that achieving "great reform" was not possible at this late date with major divisions remaining. Instead, he expects either "a watered-down" or shorter text.

A meeting of the 32 countries in a "core" group trying to negotiate the final text was delayed Tuesday morning.

Incoming General Assembly President Jan Eliasson, who is scheduled to be installed Tuesday, said he did not know what the finished product would be yet, "but I hope it will contain the substance we all want it to have."

The seven issues that negotiators have been focusing on are terrorism; a Human Rights Council with more authority to replace the discredited Human Rights Commission; a new Peacebuilding Commission to help nations emerging from conflict; new responsibility for governments to protect civilians at risk from genocide and war crimes; disarmament and nonproliferation; overhauling U.N. management; and steps to promote development.

Akram said a group of about 15 countries had agreed to language on terrorism, the Peacebuilding Commission and on human rights, though some other countries were trying to reopen that issue.

Negotiators also were close to agreeing on the responsibility to protect civilians, but differences remained on management reforms, trade and climate change, he said.

Pakistan's U.N. Ambassador Munir Akram said he expected a "core" group to decide Tuesday whether the entire text was balanced enough for consideration by all members.

Many of the agreements in the text, however, were reached by leaving the most contentious issues for further negotiations - primarily in the General Assembly.

For example, the United States and many European countries want the Human Rights Council to become a permanent body, with a country's membership requiring approval by two-thirds of U.N. nations. Richard Grenell, spokesman for the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, said Egypt and China opposed that Monday, and other diplomats said Russia did as well.

Egyptian Ambassador Maged Abdelaziz said his country favored a rights council that would be a subsidiary of the General Assembly, which should decide on the criteria for membership.

"Let us give it a chance to function, and then we will review it," he said.

Last year, Annan urged world leaders to take bold action to promote development and reform the United Nations so it can tackle global challenges ranging from conflicts and terrorism to poverty and human rights abuses.

"We have reached a fork in the road," Annan warned member states. "If you, the political leaders of the world's nations, cannot reach agreement on the way forward, history will take the decisions for you, and the interests of your peoples may go by default."

Pleuger said that in hindsight, member states underestimated the amount of preparatory work needed to reach consensus.

U.N. OKs Pared-down Declaration (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

NEW YORK -- The U.N. World Summit opens today with a hard-fought but watered-down declaration that fails to include many reforms sought by the United States, including a replacement for the discredited Human Rights Commission.

"It would be wrong to claim more than is realistic and accurate about what these reforms are," U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton said of the 35-page declaration that is to be endorsed by 150 world leaders at the conclusion of the three-day event

"They represent steps forward, but this is not the alpha and the omega, and we never thought it would be," Mr. Bolton told reporters several hours before the final document was completed.

The document calls for the creation of a peacebuilding commission and a democracy fund, financed by voluntary contributions, to help conflict-riven countries make the transition to stability and good governance.

The text also commits nations to provide free primary education to all children, including girls, and for their leaders to take responsibility for their nations' development by pursuing sound economic policies.

Mr. Bolton, who has worked on little else since arriving here in early August, acknowledged, "I would have liked to have seen a broader discussion much earlier about fundamental changes in management and governance."

Some nations and private organizations were bitterly disappointed with the outcome, saying that it fell far short of ideals on human rights, nuclear weapons, women's rights and other issues.

Development specialists praised the outcome of the final declaration, noting that the passages were mostly strong and encouraging.

DOJ_NMG_0005398

Secretary-General Kofi Annan had sought a declaration that would show that development and security are two sides of the same coin.

"The big item missing is nonproliferation and disarmament. This a real disgrace," Mr. Annan told a press conference, urging the leaders to take up the issue this week.

While acknowledging its shortcomings, he insisted the document was "an important step forward." The final document went through a tortuous negotiation process.

At first, U.N.-appointed regional representatives compiled a text based on input from governments.

In late August, Washington demanded that nations develop the document themselves, in direct negotiations.

That opened the process to line-by-line discussion, in which governments were free to advocate for their pet issues.

For nearly two weeks, the document grew longer instead of shorter, as more provisions were added and then countered.

With the process deadlocked at 1 a.m. yesterday, outgoing General Assembly President Jean Ping made a number of executive decisions on the text, including tossing out all language related to nuclear disarmament and nonproliferation.

When delegations yesterday evening formally closed the 59th session of the General Assembly one day late, they gave Mr. Ping an almost unheard-of standing ovation for his work.

Jan Eliasson, Sweden's former ambassador to Washington and the president of the General Assembly for the upcoming year, praised the declaration and said it should be assessed compared with historic reform measures, not to recent reform proposals.

"We will get a new political energy from the leaders gathering here," he said.

Discussions to strengthen the United Nations and make it more responsive and credible have been under way for nearly two years, when Mr. Annan commissioned a panel to come up with suggestions to restore luster to the world body, which celebrates its 60th anniversary this year.

The United Nations' Missed Opportunity (FT)

By Nancy Soderberg

Financial Times, September 14, 2005

On Wednesday in New York, most of the world's leaders will gather at the United Nations "World Summit" for what was supposed to be a strong endorsement of a visionary plan for global governance in the 21st century. But the ideological clash between the US and much of the developing world has brought the meeting to the brink of failure.

Weary diplomats have been scrambling to come up with face-saving compromises, still being fought over as this is written. But it is already clear that while the summit will make some progress on the development and security goals set last March by Kofi Annan, UN secretary-general, the final document will fail to chart the bold course he urged.

This summit has been years in the making. In the aftermath of the international community's grave failures in the Balkans and Rwanda in the 1990s, Mr Annan set up several commissions to address the issue of protecting civilians when governments fail to do so, and to look at ways to meet the developing world's urgent needs.

After the Iraq war in 2003, he recognised the gap in perceptions of threat between the developing and the developed worlds. For the US, that threat was primarily terrorism and weapons of mass destruction; for the developing world, it was the threat of underdevelopment, poverty, debt, HIV/Aids and other infectious diseases.

Mr Annan offered sensible proposals in his March report, calling for the developed world to commit 0.7 per cent of gross national product to development, ease trade barriers and slash debt in exchange for a commitment by the developing world to implement good governance and get serious about ending support for terrorists and -weapons proliferation. Such steps were part of the effort to reach the UN's Millennium Development Goals by 2015.

All summer, diplomats whittled away at draft after draft, making scant progress. Throughout the process, much of the developing world has seemed stuck in the 1960s, arguing for the legitimacy of terrorism in liberation struggles, undermining the urgent need for UN management reform and pathetically unable to agree on how to expand the Security Council. The strongest opposition to the text has been led by a collection of retrogade states including Pakistan and Algeria, and increasingly, Russia and China which have opposed any perceived intrustion on state sovereignty.

The US is also blocking progress. It is fighting against its own ideological hot buttons, such as the Kyoto protocol on climate change, the International Criminal Court, specific levels of development aid, disarmament and non- proliferation, and abortion rights. Washington only began to engage seriously in mid-August when John Bolton, as the new US permanent representative to the UN, sought initially to restart the process from scratch.

The result of so many pressures from so many sides was a convoluted draft with pages of disputed texts in brackets that diplomats were still arguing over as their leaders arrived in New York.

The end result will be mixed. The US has now agreed that the specific targets for development assistance can be mentioned, but not specifically en-dorsed. The discredited Commission on Human Rights, hijacked over the past decade by Syria, Cuba, Libya, Sudan and others in the club of the repressive, will be replaced by a new Human Rights Council but of still uncertain composition. Argument remains about how much more authority and flexibility to give the UN secretary-general to manage the institution, despite the urgent call for this in the recent Volcker report's recommendations on UN reform.

On the brighter side, diplomats have, after much wrangling, agreed to -recognise the world's responsibility to protect civilians and improve peacekeeping operations. A new Peacebuilding Commission will focus on the needs of nations in, and emerging from, conflict. While important, these achievements are far from sufficient for preparing the UN, and the world, for the 21st century. They fail to address the toughest peace and security issues: terrorism, use of force, non-proliferation and Security Council reform. Even after September 11 2001, a hard-core group continues to block any definition of terrorism, agreeing only to address the issue later in the year.

Facing opposition from the US, -coupled with scepticism from the developing world, the proposals regarding disarmament and non-proliferation, and criteria for the use of force, are essentially dead. So, too, is any change in the makeup of the Security Council. Four Security Council aspirants – Japan, India, Brazil and Germany – failed in their efforts to create six new permanent seats including two African ones. Africa rejected the proposal.

World leaders will put on their game faces for the summit but the depressing truth is they have failed to take up the secretary-general's challenge. His proposals offer the right way forward for the 21st century but they will have to wait for the world to catch up with his vision. Until then, the world will remain the worse for it.

The Lost U.N. Summit Meeting (NYT)

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

A once-in-a-generation opportunity to reform and revive the United Nations has been squandered even before the opening gavel comes down this morning for the largest assemblage of world leaders ever brought together in a single location. The responsibility for this failure is widely shared. But the United States, as the host nation and the U.N.'s most indispensable and influential member, bears a disproportionate share.

There are several casualties of this failure of leadership, including the need to reform the United Nations and to strengthen its role as a monitor of human rights. But the most tragic loss is a genuine opportunity to help the one billion people around the world who each live on less than $1 a day.

Last month, President Bush used a recess appointment to send his notoriously undiplomatic, and Congressionally unacceptable, choice for ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, to New York. He contended that contrary to all appearances and to common sense, Mr. Bolton was just the man to achieve the reforms the United Nations needed. Almost immediately, Mr. Bolton began proving Mr. Bush wrong by insisting on a very long list of unilateral demands. The predictable effect was to transform what had been a painful and difficult search for workable diplomatic compromises into a competitive exercise in political posturing.

With Washington jealously protecting the prerogatives of the Security Council, where it holds a veto, others chose to be equally jealous in protecting the prerogatives of the General Assembly, where the influence of poorer and weaker countries is greatest. And when Washington challenged the right of the secretary general to set specific development goals, others then contested his right to set standards for management or human rights. And so on.

That extinguished the idea that international security issues and international development issues are vitally linked, and can be most effectively tackled in tandem. By the time Washington retreated to a more realistic position, it was too late to retrieve much of the bold original agenda, as set out in earlier United Nations summit meetings on development, in the thoughtful recommendations of several high-level panels and in the constructive proposals of Secretary General Kofi Annan. The failure is even more poignant because the United States is clearly on the right side of some important arguments.

Washington, for example, strongly supported the idea of replacing the discredited United Nations Commission on Human Rights, on which nations like Sudan, Libya and Cuba regularly sit, with a new, reformed body that would exclude such notorious rights violators. The final document dilutes this crucial provision to the point of meaninglessness.

On this and other issues, the document offers little more than a fudge of feel-good phrases and pious wishes for future action that leave everyone off the hook from taking entirely practical actions that are needed right now.

This week's summit meeting should have strengthened international commitments to reach broadly accepted development benchmarks over the next decade that could avert tens of thousands of needless deaths from extreme poverty. It should have given the secretary general the power to bypass patronage and rely on merit in choosing and retaining senior officials, creating a crucial institutional safeguard against a replay of the oil-for-food fiasco. It should have reinforced vital international commitments and understandings on nuclear nonproliferation, including those that Mr. Bolton, in his previous job, did so much to undercut.

Although the ceremonial speeches by national leaders are just beginning, the serious negotiations over this summit meeting's outcome are now over. Every one of the more than 170 national leaders attending, starting with President Bush, should be embarrassed about letting this rare opportunity slip away.

IMF Must Redefine To Stay Relevant (FT)

By Rodrigo de Rato

Financial Times, September 14, 2005

Globalisation has brought enormous benefits in growth and efficiency. Yet this same force has brought cross-border financial crises and heightened the imperative to bring into the mainstream those who are being left behind.

Shortly after becoming International Monetary Fund managing director in 2004, I initiated a strategic review aimed at determining whether the fund is fully prepared to meet the challenges and crises of today and the future. When the review is released next week it will call for adjustments that will give greater focus to the fund's work and ensure the IMF can help all member countries face the challenge of integrating into the global economy.

The review suggests that some of the IMF's activities be scaled back, specifically through: streamlined work on standards and codes and financial sector assessments, a more focused approach to its role in low income countries, closer collaboration with the World Bank and spending less time on procedures and documentation. The new proposals also include an effort to deepen the analysis of globalisation, to broaden our research into the dynamics of capital account liberalisation and assess how best to achieve the UN -Millennium Development Goals.

Redefining the fund's mission is inseparable from reassessing IMF governance. The fund's legitimacy as a global organisation rests on fair representation for all members. The current allocation of quotas – capital shares in the IMF on which voting rights are based – puts this legitimacy at risk in many regions, including in Africa, where the fund is heavily engaged, and in Asia, whose place in the world economy has grown far more than its role in the fund. The issue touches on the interests of many stakeholders but it must be addressed. The reallocation of quotas is not a zero sum game if it results in an IMF with widely held legitimacy and ownership.

Over the past decade the fund has been pulled in new directions: devising and overseeing complex crisis prevention initiatives, contributing to the effort to combat the financing of terrorism and money laundering, and playing a role in poverty-reduction strategies. This accretion of new mandates occurred as old mandates remained unchanged. But many of the initiatives of the past decade have evolved into diffuse, resource-intensive operations.

The strategic review aims at preparing for key, yet unpredictable, challenges. The fund has already taken the lead in calling for concerted action to address global current account imbalances. In future, the nature of the imbalances may change but the IMF must stand ready to help its members anticipate them and respond quickly.

Thus, work analysing and advising on global trends and developments in individual countries must be strengthened and reoriented. More resources will be devoted to global and regional issues, even as our regular country work is refocused on the most pressing macroeconomic issues. More attention will be paid to the cross-border implications of country policies and long-term trends such as ageing and energy demand. Country work will be more closely aligned with analysis of capital markets and financial systems. Even greater progress on transparency is essential, not least for the promotion of strong institutions in all countries.

The IMF's lending has to take account of the evolving needs of the membership. For the emerging market countries, there is an unmet demand for insurance against large and volatile capital flows; this will require careful examination by the whole international community. Meanwhile, the needs of low income countries are becoming more differentiated: some require debt relief, others concessional financing, and others just policy advice and support. More must be done to meet these needs effectively. However, the IMF's work in low income countries is overloaded with procedures that absorb substantial resources yet yield questionable gains. This work must be streamlined to ensure the needs of poverty reduction are met.

The IMF's mandate has evolved considerably since it was set up after the second world war and the great depression. This evolution has been guided by the needs of an international community committed to multilateral co-operation. As we address the challenges of our rapidly globalising world, change is essential if the fund is to remain relevant. There are difficult choices to make but with the commitment of our membership it should be possible to agree on a common vision. The IMF stands ready to remain an adviser and a close partner with member countries.

U.N. Vs. Poverty: Seeking A Focus, Quarreling Over The Vision (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0005401

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

The United Nations General Assembly meeting today was to have been a rare moment when the quest to relieve the crushing poverty of a billion people took center stage. But so far that goal has been overshadowed by Katrina, the oil-for-food scandal and squabbling over reform of the United Nations itself.

Even the debate about the world's common agenda on global poverty began on an unexpectedly sour note, centered around the goals for healing the world's deepest poverty that were to be in the meeting's final document.

The American ambassador, John R. Bolton, initially proposed expunging any reference to specific goals for reducing poverty, hunger and child mortality and combating pandemics of AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria.

Known as the millennium development goals, they emerged from a United Nations conference five years ago. He favored instead citing the broad declaration from which the goals were drawn.

The United States subsequently relented, but not before the administration's opening foray in the negotiations left some African leaders dismayed.

"The thing that shocked me personally was that they're trying to shift and change goal posts," said Charity Kaluki Ngilu, the Kenyan health minister, who is in New York for the meeting. "If this is the case, we African leaders might as well go home and find other methods of developing ourselves."

Mrs. Ngilu, who said she was stunned by the Bush administration's initial position, added that nonetheless, she credits Mr. Bush's anti-AIDS program with helping Kenya to increase the number of people being treated for the disease to 45,000, from 2,000.

Administration officials say Mr. Bush has a vision and a record to offer on development. But as of yesterday, with presidents and prime ministers from more than 170 nations converging on New York, he had yet to put his personal stamp on the debate.

He will undoubtedly address the challenges of fighting global poverty when he speaks today at the United Nations.

But some say he has missed an opportunity to take the lead on poverty - an issue of looming concern in much of the world - even when America itself is preoccupied by terrorism, the war in Iraq and the aftermath of the hurricane.

At the same time, negotiations at the United Nations got absorbed by the issues around United Nations reform.

"It's a failure of the tactical and policy process inside the administration, perhaps because of distractions," said Nancy Birdsall, the founding president of the Center for Global Development in Washington. "It suggests these development issues aren't that high on the agenda. The administration hasn't seized the moment."

Bush administration officials disagree. They say the United States is taking a strong lead. They noted that Laura Bush will be attending an event today in New York to highlight American support to African countries fighting malaria.

John A. Simon, senior director for development at the National Security Council, said the administration's priority had been the substance of the summit meeting, not perceptions.

Officials want to be sure that the final document reflects the president's view that development is about more than the amount of aid rich countries provide to poor ones, but also about good government, sound economic policies and private sector growth.

They also wanted to make it plain that the administration, while agreeing on the need for increased aid, has not and will not promise to give 70 cents of every $100 of national income, as European nations have recently done, with timetables for achieving that level of aid.

"If we do the right things from a policy perspective, the results will speak for themselves," Mr. Simon said yesterday in an e-mail message.

But advocates of the target insist that the United States had already committed to moving toward it in 2002, when Mr. Bush supported a declaration at a summit meeting in Monterrey, Mexico, saying rich countries would "make concrete efforts" to give 0.7 percent of national income in aid.

The United States, the world's largest donor in terms of value, is next to last among richer nations in giving as a share of national income.

In the current negotiations, Mr. Bolton first proposed dropping all references to the target, but later said it could be restored.

The administration's approach and the haggling over the final document contrasts with the way Prime Minister Tony Blair pushed his agenda to alleviate poverty in Africa before the July meeting of the Group of 8 major industrial nations.

Mr. Blair lobbied each leader beforehand. He collaborated with Sir Bob Geldof, the former Boomtown Rats singer, to build public support.

And when the terror bombings in London struck during the Group of 8 talks, Mr. Blair kept them focused on Africa.

He emerged with a commitment from the eight nations to double aid to Africa, to $50 billion a year, by 2010.

It is not clear that much new will emerge at the United Nations. World leaders are likely to affirm their commitment to push forward with the millennium goals to halve extreme poverty and hunger, cut child mortality by two-thirds and ensure the basic education of each child by 2015, among other things.

Those are the same broad goals agreed to five years ago.

Whatever the verdict on Mr. Bush's role, others are seizing the initiative. Former president Bill Clinton will sponsor a three-day conference in New York beginning tomorrow that will focus on poverty and governing, climate change and conflict.

Jeffrey D. Sachs, an economist who headed the United Nation's Millennium Project and is the author of "The End of Poverty," is developing a new organization called Millennium Promise to test his antipoverty ideas in 100 African villages. MTV will broadcast a documentary today, "The Diary of Angelina Jolie and Dr. Jeffrey Sachs in Africa," that recounts their trip to one such village in Kenya.

At a screening on Monday evening at the Museum of Television and Radio, Professor Sachs said of the coming United Nations meeting, "Maybe what we've got to do is lead by action, and the government will follow along." Ms. Jolie, looking every inch the movie star in a figure-hugging black dress, said, "Europe has stepped up, but America should take the lead, or at least more of a lead."

By Jeffrey Sachs

Financial Times, September 14, 2005

Tuesday, September 13

While the governments negotiate to find a least common denominator on which they can agree, the 2005 World Summit is being flanked by an impressive number of commitments from businesses and private philanthropists to take action on their own, indeed to lead their own governments in the fight against extreme poverty. The call for individual responsibility in the fight against global poverty - in which private citizens, businesses, foundations, and scientists act even when their governments don't - is catching on. And like other great movements of the past, including the fight against slavery and the fight for civil rights, it may very well prove to be the case that governments are the last to act, following the lead of private trailblazers.

The Clinton Global Initiative is surely the most visible of these efforts, drawing upon former President Bill Clinton's ability to mobilize friends from in and out of government and industry. Clinton seems intent on achieving practical actions, following the path set by America's great former President, Jimmy Carter, who has proved what post-Presidential leadership can mean in the fight against disease, hunger, and tyranny. If President Clinton takes a page from President Carter's playbook, the results could be spectacular.

President Carter himself has teamed up with a group of universities, private philanthropists, and celebrity-activists in a new effort, serving as Honorary Co-Chairman of Millennium Promise, a new initiative launched yesterday on the occasion of the Summit. This effort, which teams up with the UN Millennium Project, which I direct, will be a broad-based partnership of universities, non-governmental organizations, and private individuals, to spur private action on the Millennium Development Goals. President Carter and I are joined on the Board of Millennium Promise by corporate leaders, heads of major Universities and foundations, and leading voices in the fight against poverty including Angelina Jolie.

The centerpiece of the effort will be the Millennium Village concept, in which communities of around 5,000 people in rural Africa and Asia are encouraged and enabled to take the lead in fighting poverty, through an integrated strategy that focuses on agriculture, health, education, and infrastructure. The early examples of such integrated efforts are remarkable. A Millennium Village in western Kenya was able to quadruple food production this past year by helping farmers in the community to get access to improved seed varieties and fertilizers. This help came at a cost of a few dollars per capita, with benefits in higher food yields that are multiples of that. The village has also been able to build a clinic, step up the fight against malaria, and provide school meals for all of the children in the community.

Other business meetingsaround the Summit are seeing leading companies pledging to make their technologies available on a mass basis to impoverished regions. It's often the case that the marginal cost of supplying these cutting-edge technologies is very low compared to patent-protected prices in rich-country markets. The market prices of drugs, software, and communications technologies are often much higher than cost, with the margin reflecting the returns to earlier research and development. It often costs just pennies (or less) for a company to provide its software and medicines to impoverished communities for products that sell for tens or hundreds of dollars in the rich-country markets. The companies know that they recoup their R&D outlays in the rich-country markets.

Much of the attention in the fight against poverty has been directed at what rich and poor-country governments will or won't do. The answer, too often, is that they won't do much, or not enough. Despite all odds, the fight against extreme poverty is transforming itself from an official aid effort to a broader-based movement. Government remains critical - particularly to providing the large-scale financing that is needed. But in much of the world private initiatives are likely now to lead the way, in terms of innovation, proof of concept, and mobilization of public awareness and support.

Monday, September 12

The negotiations on the draft declaration for the World Summit - which opens on Tuesday - have been nothing short of bizarre. The United States government has fought a relentless battle to dissociate itself from specific obligations regarding international development, and has tried repeatedly to the quash obligations that it has taken on the past. All of this has been taking place at a time when the US itself has become an aid recipient, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

The opening salvo a couple of weeks ago was the remarkable assertion by the United States government that the Millennium Development Goals do not even exist, so that the phrase itself should be expunged from the document. This was news to the rest of the world, who were gathering at the Summit first and foremost to find ways to reinforce the Millennium Development Goals. The US claimed that it had signed the Millennium Declaration but not the Millennium Development Goals.

The argument was not very impressive. All 18 of the targets of the Millennium Development Goals - to halve hunger, fight disease, reduce maternal mortality, ensure access to safe drinking water, and more - are explicitly part of the Millennium Declaration. With 190 countries standing in opposition to the US position, the US relented.

The longer battle has ensued around official development assistance and the target of 0.7 percent of GNP in official development aid. It seems at times that all US foreign policy regarding economic development revolves around the US insistence to pay almost nothing to help the poorest countries.

US official aid levels are 0.16 percent of GNP, an increase from 0.10 percent when President Bush took office but still the lowest or second lowest of all donors (vying with Italy for the bottom slot). US aid levels for Africa are 0.03 percent of GNP, meaning that the US gives Africa just 3 cents in aid for every $100 of US GNP. Much of the rest of US aid still goes to "strategic" countries such as Pakistan, Turkey, and Egypt, or to US consultant salaries.

Why the US government is so dead-set against doing more to help impoverished and dying people is one of the great mysteries of our time. It's not as if the poorest countries are asking for an open checkbook or an unconstrained line of credit. They are asking for rich countries to honor a modest commitment, a mere 0.7 percent of GNP, roughly one seventh of what the US is spending this year on the military and one third of what the US has spent on tax cuts in the first Bush term.

Just as with the Millennium Development Goals, the US government has worked overtime to huff and puff that it never signed the 0.7 target, and thus should not be bound by it. Even if it were true that the U.S. had never signed on, the sight of the world's richest country denying a long-standing international target in this manner is stunning. The US signed on to the 0.7 target in the Monterrey Conference on Financing for Development in March 2002. It has since bobbed and weaved to evade the implications of that agreement.

In paragraph 42 of the Monterrey Consensus, the US and other signatories declared that they "urge developed countries that have not done so to make concrete efforts toward the target of 0.7 percent of GNP in official development assistance."

The European Union took up its pledge, and has defined "concrete efforts" as a new timetable to reach 0.56 percent of GNP in official aid by 2010 and 0.7 percent of GNP by 2015. The US on its side has simply been claiming that the target does not exist, and telling some in the corridors that signing the Monterrey pledge had been a mistake.

This aggressive position has continued down to the details. The US has fought commitments to a "Quick Win" against malaria through the mass distribution of insecticide-treated bed nets and effective medications. It has resisted commitments to quick wins in other areas as well. In the end, every specific target and timetable to help the world's poorest of the poor has come under US fire.

The US fight against the fight against poverty would be bizarre at any moment (remember John Kennedy pledging "to those peoples in the huts and villages across the globe struggling to break the bonds of mass misery, we pledge our best efforts to help them help themselves, for whatever period is required") but it has been especially shocking in the face of Hurricane Katrina. The US is accepting aid from UN agencies, Mexico, Europe, and others, at the very moment it is working overtime to avoid or evade commitments to the poorest of the poor, who are dying by the millions each year due to insufficient assistance from the donor countries.

There is a silver lining in all of this, believe it or not. The American people have been aghast at the failures of Washington to prepare for, and then address, the hurricane. They have been shocked that President Bush could declare that "I don't think anyone anticipated the breach of the levees [in New Orleans]" when that risk was notorious and had been discussed for decades.

Similarly, whenever they have gotten a glimpse of the UN negotiations, they have been shocked. Though the American people know little about the Millennium Development Goals (since President Bush has perhaps never even uttered the phrase), editorial writers around the country, in both liberal and conservative regions, were dismayed that the US delegation was working in America's name to undercut the world's measurable and monitorable poverty alleviation targets that provide a clear framework for accountable results.

Perhaps the most notable bottom line this week will be that the voices of the poor are finally piercing the deep layers of indifference and misdirection.

Palestinian Leader Vows To Restore Order In Gaza (USAT)

By Martin Patience

USA Today, September 14, 2005

JERUSALEM — Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas said Tuesday that he would impose law and order in Gaza in response to the chaos that followed the pullout of Israeli troops from the territory a day earlier.

In a televised speech, Abbas promised, "We are not going to hesitate to put an end to all the negative signs and violations of law and order. … We are not going to tolerate chaos after today."

Earlier, the Palestinian Authority president's chief of staff, Rafiq Husseini, said Abbas would begin disarming small militant groups soon. After parliamentary elections in January, he said, Abbas would insist that big militant groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad disarm in accordance with steps in the U.S.-mediated "road map" to establish a Palestinian state.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, speaking as he traveled to New York for a United Nations General Assembly meeting, called on the Palestinian Authority to put an end to riots in Gaza. "This rioting — even they understand they have to control this," he said.

Palestinian euphoria and celebration were mixed with lawlessness the day after Israel ended its 38-year presence in the territory. Israel withdrew about 8,500 settlers last month and pulled out the last of its troops early Monday. With Israel gone, Abbas is under pressure to restore order. There was more widespread looting in the abandoned Gaza settlements on Tuesday. Thousands of Palestinians also crossed the border from Gaza into Egypt, despite the official closing of the Rafah crossing.

Abbas' attempt to disarm militants could be the toughest test of his eight-month presidency. As he spoke Tuesday, a convoy of hundreds of Hamas gunmen drove through a Gaza refugee camp to celebrate the Israeli withdrawal.

"This convoy is the size of our joy," Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar said in the Jebaliya refugee camp. Hamas, which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, is the largest Palestinian militant group.

Husseini, the president's chief of staff, said Hamas would face a choice: "Hamas can't mix between being a political party and having armed militias." A top Hamas military commander, Ahmed al-Jabari, insisted Monday that the group would "sever any hand" that tries to stop its resistance.

Michael Tarazi, a Palestinian Authority spokesman, played down the fires and vandalism at the former settlements. "For 38 years we were under the gun of a foreign occupation," he said. "Just like the fall of the Berlin Wall and the statue of Saddam Hussein being toppled during the Iraqi war, people are euphoric about a modicum of new-found liberty."

The celebrations hit Gaza's economy. Tuesday, Palestinians looted dozens of the more than 3,000 greenhouses that American Jewish donors had bought from Gaza settlers for $14 million last month. The greenhouses were given to the Palestinian Authority to provide jobs.

A Gaza Holiday: Looting, Chaos And Bargains In Egypt (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 14, 2005

GAZA, Sept. 13 - Palestinians continued to celebrate a new sense of freedom on Tuesday, pouring across the temporarily open border with Egypt and through the abandoned Israeli settlements.

President Mahmoud Abbas, in a televised speech on Tuesday evening, urged Palestinians to "create a model and civilized Gaza," but also vowed to restore order, beginning with small militant groups aligned with his own Fatah movement. "We are not going to tolerate chaos after today," he pledged.

But on Tuesday there was chaos aplenty, with thousands of Palestinians rushing across the border to Egypt to shop, while thousands of others continued their active salvaging of saleable or usable materials from the 21 former Israeli settlements. In some places, Palestinians looted the greenhouses that were bought for their use by American philanthropists, taking nylon tarpaulins, irrigation hoses and electrical equipment.

Palestinian security forces deployed around the greenhouses said they were hopelessly outnumbered by the looters. "We need at least another 70 soldiers. This is just a joke," Taysir Haddad, one of 22 security guards assigned to Neve Dekalim, told The Associated Press. "We've tried to stop as many people as we can, but they're like locusts."

He said about 80 percent of the greenhouses were still intact, but looters walked off with lighting fixtures, cables and wires despite the police presence.

Ahmed Qurei, the Palestinian prime minister, toured Neve Dekalim and implored Palestinians to leave the greenhouses alone. "These greenhouses are for the Palestinian people," he said. "We don't want anyone to touch or harm anything that can be useful for our people."

For a second day, Egyptian border guards looked the other way as Palestinians crossed the fences into Egypt through the Philadelphi route, which had been patrolled by the Israeli Army until early Monday.

Egypt had promised to keep the border secure, but instead has allowed Palestinians a kind of holiday, to last until Thursday or Friday, to visit. Thousands of Palestinians crossed to visit friends in Cairo and El Arish, 24 miles from the border, to buy cheaper cigarettes, food, gasoline and medicines, while hundreds of Egyptians came to Gaza.

The Palestinians, who have been able to leave Gaza only with great difficulty in the past, visited seaside restaurants, looked for relatives and stocked up on household items. One man even bought two sheep, saying they were half the price of the sheep in Gaza. Taxi fares from Rafah to El Arish nearly doubled during the day, to about $70.

Some Israeli officials criticized the Egyptians and said the lax border controls boded badly for Israel's future security, given the ease of smuggling weapons and ammunition, and for compromise on issues like the Rafah crossing, which Israel is being pressed to leave in the hands of the Egyptians and Palestinians, with European monitoring. Mark Regev, the spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, said that Israel "has expressed concerns about the situation to the government of Egypt, and we've been assured the current situation is temporary."

Another Israeli official noted that the Rafah crossing will be shut for six months, a period that would allow Israel and the world to better gauge how Mr. Abbas is running Gaza. In the meantime, traffic in southern Gaza will be diverted to the crossing point at Kerem Shalom, where Egypt, Israel and Gaza converge.

Mr. Abbas spoke on Palestinian television on Tuesday both to celebrate the withdrawal and to describe millions of dollars of job creation and infrastructure projects, including the rebuilding of the central road artery through Gaza, numerous housing complexes, improvements to sewerage and a seaport.

He also promised quick moves to restore the rule of law, which most Palestinians complain is lacking, and aides hinted he would start with small militant groups associated with Fatah. "After today, we are not going to hesitate to put an end to all the negative signs and violations of law and order," Mr. Abbas said. "We have one law for everyone, and no one is above the law."

In the former settlement of Netzarim, however, militants from Islamic Jihad said the group would not give up its weapons. "We will respect the rule of law, but the weapons are not negotiable," Muhammad Sheik Khalil, head of the group's military wing, said at a celebration rally. Dozens of masked gunmen - many holding Kalashnikov rifles and grenade launchers - joined the rally.

The larger militant group, Hamas, had its own celebratory rally, larger and noisier, on Tuesday night in Gaza City, with its leaders hailing the Israeli withdrawal, which they credit to the resistance of Palestinians like themselves, not to negotiations. But there was no visible display of weapons.

Ziad Abu Amr, a Palestinian legislator from Gaza, put the scavenging at the greenhouses down to poverty and to a sense of freedom from a hated Israeli occupation whose symbols are the settlements here and in the West Bank.

"There is an element of hatred for the occupation and revenge," he said. "Few Palestinian homes have escaped some form of Israeli oppression."

The jubilation is necessary and important, he said. "But soon Palestinians will realize that this improvement may not make a major difference in their lives or in the prospect of an independent Palestinian state," Mr. Amr said. "Then the situation will look gloomier."

New Legal Standing Of Gaza Stirs Debate (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, September 14, 2005

TEL AVIV -- With the final Israeli soldiers gone from the sands of Gaza, a debate over the coastal strip's new legal standing is taking a shape that is likely to have political ramifications for the future of Israeli-Palestinian relations.

Although Gazans are celebrating a liberation of sorts, the territory isn't a sovereign state, and many Palestinians don't consider Israel's occupation over. Israel, for its part, wants international recognition of the end of its military rule and the beginning of full Palestinian "jurisdiction" over the Gaza Strip.

At stake is whether Israel will be able to fully absolve itself of responsibility for Gaza's anarchy and economic blight, as well as the degree of force that the Jewish state would be able to use in retaliation for cross-border attacks.

The argument over the Gaza pullout will come to the fore this coming week, when Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas attend the United Nations General Assembly's 60th anniversary in New York.

In a speech scheduled for tomorrow, Mr. Sharon is expected to announce that the termination of Israel's military rule in Gaza marks the transfer of responsibility to the Palestinians, Ha'aretz newspaper reported.

"From our point of view, with our pullout from Gaza, Gaza becomes Palestinian jurisdiction," said Foreign Ministry spokesman Ron Prosor. "We urge the Palestinian people to step up to the plate and start an urgent and vital process of nation building. It's all-important that we all see the development of good government."

Israel's government refused to describe the territories conquered in the 1967 Arab-Israeli conflict as occupied, saying there was never an internationally recognized sovereign power there. And Mr. Sharon wants to free Israel from its obligations in Gaza as an occupying power, analysts said.

But Israel will retain control of Gaza's airspace, its territorial waters and, for the near future, the border crossing to Egypt. Palestinians argue that those trappings of military occupation still qualify Israel as responsible for the situation inside Gaza.

"It's still occupied. You don't need to have settlements or troops for [Gaza] to be occupied," said Diana Bhuttu, an aide to Palestinian Civil Affairs Minister Mohammad Dahlan. "The legal test is whether you can still maintain control over the area."

The Palestinians also say Gaza's economic, cultural and political links to occupied West Bank mean that the strip remains dominated by Israel. Indeed, under the 1993 Oslo peace accords, the two territories are considered one political unit.

Israel's unilateral withdrawal gives Gazans the greatest degree of self-determination yet, but it is not clear whether the international community will recognize the occupation as over.

"This is a big question which should fall in the hands of international lawyers," said Ron Pundak, a director of the Peres Center for Peace who helped start negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians in the early 1990s. "Can one declare an end to occupation when you are controlling the contours?"

No-Frills Candidate Aims For Germany's Top Spot (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

OSNABRUECK, Germany -- The woman who wants to rule Germany stepped to a microphone on the packed main square of this industrial city and reminded the crowd of the nation's woes. The jobless rate is the highest since the end of World War II, she noted bleakly, economic growth is the weakest in Europe, the national mood gripped by doubt.

So what would Angela Merkel do about it? "Now, I don't expect to hear loud applause," she warned at the recent campaign event, before describing how she would raise the national sales tax -- already 16 percent for most items -- to pay for her party's job-creation program.

Moans and grumbles rose from the audience of about 8,000 people. But Merkel didn't back down. "You can decide," she said. "We can continue as we have been, with promises of blue skies. But promises already have been made and promises have been broken. That needs to change."

Unsmiling, unstylish and uncharismatic, Merkel, 51, is bidding to become Germany's first female chancellor, as well as the first to have grown up behind the Iron Curtain, in the former East Germany. Polls show that her party, the Christian Democratic Union, holds a lead, albeit a narrowing one, in a national election scheduled for Sunday and that she stands a very good chance of sitting at the chancellor's desk in Berlin.

The vote comes at a pivotal moment for Germany, the biggest country in Europe and the world's third-largest economy. Despite spending more than $1.5 trillion over the past 15 years to reunify the nation, Germany has failed to heal many divisions between east and west. It is also grappling with the competitive challenges of globalization, as German companies move jobs to lower-wage countries.

Although Merkel's party leads in the polls, for many Germans she remains a remote figure. The former physicist rarely talks about her personal life, her upbringing under communism or how she became involved in politics. She often appears dour and uncomfortable. On her latest campaign poster, she looks like she's clenching her teeth as she forces a grin.

"Typical German," said Kai Sausmikat, 41, a voter who came to hear Merkel at the Osnabrueck rally, pulling down the corners of his mouth into a clown-like frown.

Merkel's rivals, inside and outside her party, show little regard for her political skills. In July, when the Parliament voted to hold early elections, Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer told Merkel to her face that her campaign would collapse. "Mrs. Merkel, at this moment with your opinion polls, you appear like a magnificent-looking souffle in the oven," Fischer said. "We'll see what's really left after the voters prick into it. I can't wait."

DOJ_NMG_0005407

If the election were a personality contest, surveys suggest Merkel would lose by a wide margin to the telegenic incumbent, Gerhard Schroeder. But in Germany's political system, national leaders are chosen by party, and the Christian Democrats lead the polls.

Merkel has run a simple campaign that makes no attempt to capitalize on her sex. She has focused on a plan to generate jobs by cutting payroll taxes and making it easier for companies to hire or fire workers. She has also called for an overhaul of Germany's notoriously complicated tax code.

A victory for her party would likely mean closer relations with Washington. Merkel has strongly criticized Schroeder for alienating the United States, Germany's closest postwar ally, in disputes over Iraq, although she does not support sending troops to that country.Early Years Under Communism

Merkel was born in 1954 in Hamburg, a port city in West Germany, the first child of a Protestant pastor and an English teacher. When she was an infant, her father moved the family to the East German state of Brandenburg, crossing a border that had not yet hardened but was already marked by an exodus of Germans heading in the opposite direction.

Her father, Horst Kasner, sympathized with the utopian goals of the Communist government there. But his precise relationship with it is difficult to untangle.

As a preacher in a society that discouraged religion, Kasner was considered politically suspect. His wife, Herlind, was not allowed to teach school because of her husband's profession. But the family was granted privileges not afforded to most citizens, including two cars and permission to travel to the West.

When Angela entered elementary school in Templin, a town of about 11,000 people north of Berlin, her parents decided not to enroll her in the Young Pioneers, a Communist Party youth group. They changed their minds a year later after her teachers made clear she would suffer academically if she didn't join, according to interviews in her home town.

"Her parents, especially her mother, were very interested in making sure Angela wasn't stuck in the corner as a pastor's daughter," said Hans-Ulrich Beeskow, a middle-school math teacher who recalled Merkel as an especially gifted student. "It wasn't political engagement by any means. It was important to her mother to make sure no stones were thrown in her path."

Merkel excelled at math, Russian and English, and was rewarded with a coveted university slot in Leipzig. She studied physics and remained active in Communist youth groups, a prerequisite for university students.

In 1977, she married a fellow physics student, Ulrich Merkel. They divorced five years later.

In an interview with Evelyn Roll, a German journalist and biographer, Merkel said she was vigilant about suppressing any political opinions that might have attracted attention. "It was a real advantage from those times that you learned to keep quiet," she said. "That was one of the survival strategies."

In the late 1970s, she has said, she was approached by two men who asked her to serve as an informant for the East German intelligence agency, the Stasi. Merkel said she balked, arguing that she would be a poor spy because she was bad at keeping secrets.

She ended up in East Berlin, where she earned a doctorate in physics and worked as a researcher at the Academy of Science.

As a politician on the stump, Merkel has shied away from discussing life under communism, even when addressing East German audiences.

On Sunday, she visited her home town of Templin for the first time during the campaign. About 600 people, including her mother, heard her speak outside a beer garden. Rather than wax nostalgic, Merkel merely acknowledged that the region "is what you call home" and recited her standard speech.

Such detachment has alienated many eastern Germans, who had hoped she would stand up for a region some westerners view as backward. In Templin, for instance, there are no visible reminders that the hometown girl is running for chancellor, aside from a few stock campaign posters.

"If you walk through Templin and ask ordinary citizens, they don't want her to be chancellor," said Ulrich Schoeneich, the Templin mayor, a Social Democrat who is friends with Merkel's mother. "In part, she has forgotten where she came from."A Climb to Party Leadership

Merkel was late to the East German political revolution in 1989. She avoided early public protests against the Communists, focusing instead on her job. On the chaotic evening when the Berlin Wall was breached, she joined thousands of others in crossing to the other side, biographers have recounted, but returned home a few hours later because she had to get up early the next morning to go to work.

Gradually, she lost some of her caution and became involved in politics. Six weeks after the fall of the wall, she joined a new party, Democratic Awakening, and found a fresh calling as a press secretary.

"She had a chance to get involved and make a change, and she took advantage of the situation," said Rainer Eppelmann, a former leader of Democratic Awakening and now a member of Parliament.

DOJ_NMG_0005408

In 1990, she was named deputy spokeswoman for the first -- and last -- democratically elected government in East Germany. After unification that year, she joined the Christian Democrats, who promptly named her as a candidate for Parliament.

She won the spot and attracted the interest of Chancellor Helmut Kohl, who was looking for easterners to fill leadership jobs in his government. All of a sudden she found herself a member of Kohl's cabinet, with the title of minister for family and women.

At the time, Merkel was unmarried but living with a former academic adviser, Joachim Sauer. The couple married in 1998, but only after the archbishop of Cologne chided Merkel to formalize the relationship.

Merkel continued her climb into the upper ranks of the Christian Democrats through a combination of good timing and political savvy, political analysts say. In 1998, she took over as head of the party after Kohl, her mentor, became ensnared in a campaign finance scandal. Since then, she has eased out rivals and pressured competitors to stand aside so she could seek the chancellorship.

Merkel, who is childless, has built a wall around her private life and rarely appears with her husband in public. But that hasn't stopped opponents from taking personal shots. In an interview published last month, Schroeder's wife, Doris Schroeder-Koepf, highlighted Merkel's lack of children by calling her insensitive to the needs of working mothers.

The German mass media have also made sport of her personal appearance. After ignoring such critiques, she began a gradual makeover two years ago, visiting a celebrity hairstylist in Berlin who also counts Schroeder as a client.

The commentary has generated sympathy for Merkel, especially among women who see the attacks as sexist.

"She grew up in East Germany and is a natural scientist -- that means she was exposed to less pressure for so-called 'female' behavior than we western women were," said Alice Schwarzer, Germany's best-known feminist, in an e-mailed response to questions. "My advice: Stay true to herself. Stay authentic! Everything else would seem false."

Genocide, One Year On (WP)

The Washington Post, September 14, 2005

A year ago, then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell declared that the violence in the Darfur region of Sudan justified the term "genocide." That was the first time since the adoption of the U.N. Genocide Convention in 1948 that a government had accused a sitting counterpart of this worst of all humanitarian crimes, and Mr. Powell chose his words carefully. His language was based on a survey of Darfurian refugees commissioned by the State Department: Of 1,136 civilians interviewed, a third had heard racial epithets while being attacked, suggesting that the mass killings and evictions in Darfur constituted genocide. The survey also found that three in four refugees had seen government insignia on the uniforms of their attackers, leaving no doubt as to the guilt of Sudan's government.

Since that finding, the United States has led an international effort to end the genocide. The effort has not been as quick or decisive as the genocide finding warranted: The Bush administration's attempt to pressure Sudan's government with U.N. sanctions was feckless, and it made no effort to deploy a robust NATO peacekeeping force. But, little by little, American diplomacy has made headway. For now, the horror has abated.

The first success of Western diplomacy was to improve access to Darfur for humanitarian workers and supplies, ending the government's policy of systematically denying visas to aid officials and bottling up their equipment in customs. Next, Sudan's rulers were persuaded to accept the deployment of 7,700 African Union troops in Darfur, up from the handful who were there a year ago. Partly thanks to the presence of these troops, violence between government forces and rebels, and between government and civilians, has greatly diminished.

But the progress is incomplete and reversible. Fully 3.2 million people have been affected by the war, half of Darfur's population. Many of these subsist in crowded camps for displaced people, where they depend on Western charity. Although humanitarian access has improved since last year, it remains imperfect. In the Kalma camp, which is home to something like 160,000 displaced people, the government has refused to extend a Norwegian group's authority to coordinate the distribution of relief supplies and has imposed an economic blockade. Meanwhile low-level violence continues. Although the government has authorized the deployment of 7,700 A.U. troops, only 5,800 are in place so far -- a failure both of the African governments that had promised troops and of the Western governments that promised to support them logistically.

The progress over the past year demonstrates that the United States and its allies do have the power to save lives by the tens of thousands. It also suggests that, if the Bush administration had pushed harder and earlier, it could have saved many more people. This lesson must be remembered over the coming weeks and months. Outsiders need to persist in their efforts to broker peace negotiations between Sudan's government and Darfur's rebels; they must complete the deployment of the African Union force and continue to pressure the government for humanitarian access. The past year demonstrates that, if the United States and its allies pursue these goals with determination, they can get what they want. But if they lose interest in Darfur, violence may resume and humanitarian access may dry up. With so much of the population already displaced and weakened, Darfur's death rate could easily return to the horrific levels of a year ago.

Marching Away From Trouble (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2005

Something has gone terribly awry when a 5-year-old joins a riot started by a paramilitary army. Yet last weekend in Belfast, a child just that age was seized for throwing stones at the police and returned to his parents.

Violence erupted in Northern Ireland once again as authorities prevented the Orange Order, the largest Protestant organization in the province, from parading past a Catholic neighborhood. From Saturday to Tuesday morning, furious battles between young Protestant men and the police took place on the streets of Belfast. According to police reports, two paramilitary groups, the Ulster Defense Assn. and the Ulster Volunteer Force, have fired shots at the more than 1,000 police officers and 1,000 soldiers deployed in the area.

Nobody ever said it would be easy to make peace in Northern Ireland. But nearly a month ago, the democratic process in that troubled region got a boost when the Irish Republican Army ordered its troops to surrender their arms through a verifiable process. The British government began scaling back its military presence in Northern Ireland immediately after the IRA statement.

Although blame for the present violence rests mainly with the leadership of the Orange Order, the silence of at least two key Protestant political leaders who could have helped head off the clashes gives them a share of the responsibility. The Rev. Ian Paisley, head of the Democratic Unionist Party, and Reg Empey, the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party, should immediately denounce sectarian violence as unacceptable.

Every year, starting in April and finishing around September, hundreds of parades take place throughout Northern Ireland, mostly meant to celebrate centuries-old Protestant victories over Catholics. When these parades go past Catholic neighborhoods, they often amount to little more than open and pointless provocations.

To avoid the anger and resentment that have resulted in the past, a commission was granted legal authority in 1998 to set the rules and change the routes of the parades. This has produced some minor skirmishes in the intervening years but nothing like the recent riots.

Even acknowledging that most of these parades serve no good purpose, forbidding them seems to be unenforceable — such is the power of tradition, especially on a proud old island like Ireland. The only viable solution is to get political leaders to recognize equal rights for both communities, and to get Orange Order leaders to the table, negotiating directly with representatives of the communities through which it intends to march.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Sept. 11 Commission Rejects Atta Claim (AP-Y2)

By Devlin Barrett, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 15, 2005

Former members of the Sept. 11 commission on Wednesday dismissed assertions that a Pentagon intelligence unit identified lead hijacker Mohamed Atta as an member of al-Qaida long before the 2001 attacks.

The ex-commissioners also criticized the government for not putting in place changes recommended last year in homeland security and emergency response. They pointed most notably to the failure to improve communication systems, which they said might have saved lives after Hurricane Katrina.

Rep. Curt Weldon (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., had accused the commission of ignoring intelligence about Atta while it investigated the attacks. The commission's former chairman, Thomas Kean, said there was no evidence anyone in the government knew about Atta before Sept. 11, 2001.

Two military officers, Army Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer and Navy Capt. Scott Phillpott, claimed a classified military intelligence unit, known as "Able Danger," identified Atta before the attacks. Shaffer has said three other hijackers were identified, too.

Kean said the recollections of the intelligence officers cannot be verified by any document.

"Bluntly, it just didn't happen and that's the conclusion of all 10 of us," said a former commissioner, ex-Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash.

Pentagon officials said this month that they could find no documents to back up the claims.

According to Weldon, members of "Able Danger" identified Atta and three other hijackers in 1999 as potential members of a terrorist cell in New York City. Weldon said Pentagon lawyers rejected the unit's recommendation that the information be turned over to the FBI in 2000.

Weldon's spokesman, John Tomaszewski, said no commissioners have met with anyone from Able Danger "yet they choose to speak with some form of certainty without firsthand knowledge."

Separately, the former commissioners criticized Congress for not updating communications rules to help police, fire, and rescue personnel in a crisis such as Katrina.

"It is a scandal in our minds," Kean said.

The commissioners also faulted state, local, and federal authorities responding to Katrina for not having a clear chain of command, leading to some of the same confusion that plagued the Sept. 11 rescue effort.

Judge Says Somali Man's Statements Will Be Admissible (AP)

Associated Press

AP, September 15, 2005

COLUMBUS, Ohio - The government can use at trial statements made by a Somali man accused of plotting to bomb a shopping mall, a judge ruled.

Nuradin Abdi's attorneys had sought to bar statements he made to authorities in which he admitted to falsifying immigration documents and planning to blow up an undetermined Columbus-area mall.

But U.S. District Judge Algenon L. Marbley said Tuesday that the statements were admissible because Abdi made them in the presence of his lawyer.

Marbley said Abdi's arrest in November 2003 was illegal because government agents appeared to act only so they could interrogate him. Statements he made after his arrest would have been void had he not repeated them later when his lawyer was at his side, the judge ruled.

Abdi's attorney, Mahir T. Sherif, says the value of the information "is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice," against his client, whose trial is scheduled for Sept. 26.

Abdi, 33, has pleaded innocent to charges of conspiring to aid terrorists and lying to gain political asylum in the United States as a refugee.

Prosecutors accuse him of obtaining travel documents in 1999 by telling officials he planned to visit Germany and Saudi Arabia when he actually went to a military-style training camp for terrorists in Ethiopia.

Federal agents arrested Abdi on Nov. 28, 2003, after convicted al-Qaida operative Iyman Faris told them Abdi suggested the mall plot.

RP To Hand Over 3 Officials Linked To Spy Case (MANSUNST)

Manila Sun Star, September 15, 2005

MANILA -- The Philippine Government is willing to turn over three public officials tagged by the US Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) in connection with the espionage case filed against former police official Michael Ray Aquino in the US, Justice Secretary Raul Gonzalez Sr. said.

Gonzalez met with US legal attaché to the Philippines Jeff Cole, who furnished him confidential notes on the arrest of Aquino in Queens, New York and his friend, FBI analyst Leandro Aragoncillo, a Filipino-American, in New Jersey.

They were arrested for espionage and conspiracy in stealing 101 secret documents relating to the Philippines.

DOJ_NMG_0005416

In a press briefing, Gonzalez said among those who are allegedly involved in Aquino's espionage activities include a former official and two incumbent officials.

"These things will be revealed when they (US) open the evidence during the indictment proceedings on Sept. 21. The documents, including the CDs, are still sealed. These officials who are believed to be involved are coded," he said.

Once the names of the three Philippine officials are revealed and it is proven that they are Aquino's cohorts, they will be named as co-conspirators for violation of US laws.

"The Philippine Government will only be dragged into this once the warrants for their (three Philippine officials) arrest are issued by the US court. Then we will be asked for their extradition," he said.

The Philippine Government has extended legal assistance to Aquino, although the allegation of his involvement in espionage activities in the US was highly sensitive and serious against the Philippine Government.

"The Philippine consulate in New York has immediately hired a lawyer for Aquino. We always give lawyers to any Filipino accused of crimes in the US and other countries," Gonzalez said, noting that the Philippines is bound by the extradition treaty and the mutual legal assistance treaty with the US Government.

Under US rules, espionage is a non-bailable offense punishable by 10 years' imprisonment and a fine of not less than $250,000.

Earlier reports said the espionage activities of Aquino in the US are part of the current destabilization move against the Arroyo government.

Aquino was a close aide of Senator Panfilo Lacson, who served as Philippine National Police director under the Estrada administration before he ran for public office.

However, Lacson said Aquino cannot be charged with espionage because he is not a foreign agent.

Based on the information he gleaned from the Internet, Section 783 of the US Code states that a person can be charged of crime of espionage only if he is proven a foreign agent.

Lacson said the definition of a foreign agent under Section 951 of the same US code is an individual who agrees to operating within the US, subject to the direction and control of a foreign government.

One of the so-called classified information passed to him were the contents of the "Hello Garci" tapes, anomalies and corruption in the government and the recent impeachment proceedings in the House.

Lacson said he and "many others" received information passed by Aquino, but he downplayed the value of the reports, describing them as "shallow information."

"I am not sure which of the information that I and others received were considered classified, because to my recollection, the bits of information I got from him were largely news that everyone has read and heard in our local media," Lacson said in a statement.

He said the information may have been US Embassy reports to Washington on the current political situation in the Philippines.

Lacson said the FBI does not have the kind of information and this was gleaned from newspaper clippings that were compiled by the Philippine embassy here and sent to the US.

"But come to think of it, we have far more sensitive information which we can read at Philippine Center for Investigative Journalism (PCIJ) and Newsbreak Magazine than the classified information the US is pertaining to that Michael Ray Aquino has passed on," Lacson explained.

The senator said he has called his friends abroad to help Aquino pay the attorney's fees because legal services in the US are steep.

Meanwhile, NBI Director Reynaldo Wycoco said that if Lacson is intent on dragging his name in Aquino's case, he should probably go to any of the Philippine consulates in the US and explain himself.

He said Lacson could do this now or after he has been named in the case. (Sunnex)

DOJ To Turn Over RP Officials In Spy Case (PHILSTAR)

Philippine Star, September 15, 2005

Justice Secretary Raul Gonzalez is ready to turn over to US authorities a former and two incumbent government officials believed to be involved in the alleged espionage activities of cashiered police Senior Superintendent Michael Ray Aquino.

Speaking to reporters, Gonzalez said the three would be charged with acting as Aquino's cohorts in a conspiracy to violate US laws, once they have been identified.

"These things will be revealed when (the US) opens the evidence during the indictment proceedings on Sept. 21," he said. "The documents, including the CDs, are still sealed. They will be opened on September 21. These officials who are believed to be involved are coded."

The CDs are thought to contain copies of the evidence supposedly obtained by the suspects from computers at an office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

Gonzalez said that, based on highly confidential documents from Legal Attaché Jeff Cole, Aquino's cohorts include a former and two incumbent officials.

"The Philippine government will only be dragged into this once the warrants for their (the three Philippine officials') arrest are issued by the US Court," he said.

"Then we will be asked for their extradition. The former official number one is classified as High Level, number two is a current public official, while number three is a second High Level public official."

The Philippines is bound by an extradition treaty and the Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty (MLAT) with the US, he added.

National Bureau of Investigation Director Reynaldo Wycoco said yesterday the government would accede to any request from the United States to extradite three unnamed Filipino politicians reportedly involved in Aquino's activities.

"It is a treaty (extradition) we have with the US so we have to honor and abide by it although there is a process we have to go through," he said.

"I think that (extradition request) will follow if and when there would be an indictment, if and when a warrant would be issued by an American judge and if as a consequence there would be a request for the extradition" of the three unnamed officials.

Speaking to reporters at Malacañang, Wycoco said Sen. Panfilo Lacson should "go to any US territory or Philippine consulate in the US to clarify matters if he feels alluded to in the FBI complaint."

Aquino was an aide of Lacson while he was Philippine National Police chief under former President Joseph Estrada.

The NBI is not concerned about the political implications of Aquino's case as its main concern is "purely informational," he added.

On the other hand, lawyer Ricardo Diaz, NBI Interpol Division chief, said the FBI might reveal the names of the three men arrested on Sept. 22 or 23.

"The unsealing of the documents is scheduled on either September 22 or 23," he quoted an FBI official as saying. "By that time, the cat would already be out of the bag, meaning the names would be available by that time.

"Once the documents have been unsealed the names of the three officials based in the Philippines would already be made available to the public as well as the contents of the tampered documents."

Diaz said they have no idea what documents FBI intelligence analyst Leandro Aragoncillo allegedly printed or downloaded between May and Aug. 15, except that it consisted of 101 classified documents related to the Philippines.

"To determine if a document is top secret is part of their sovereignty," he said.

Gonzalez had already made an official request to Cole for copies of the documents, he added.

An FBI agent met yesterday with Wycoco and Diaz, but after the meeting, Wycoco begged off from being interviewed.

Meanwhile, Gonzalez said the government has extended legal assistance to Aquino.

"We are extending legal assistance to Michael Ray Aquino because he is a Filipino," he said.

"The Filipino consulate in New York has immediately hired a lawyer for Aquino. We always give lawyers to any Filipinos accused of crimes in the US and other countries."

Aquino's wife seeks help On the other hand, Lacson said yesterday Aquino's wife, Fatima, has asked him to extend legal assistance to her husband, since the family cannot afford to pay for the services of a top-caliber lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0005418

"She told me, 'Sir, you might have a friend who can help us,' because they have no money to pay a lawyer," he said in Filipino.

"I started seeking the help of some friends. But US lawyers really charge a lot, you have to pay for each telephone call to them. He is really in a difficult situation.

"So it's important that (he) gets a lawyer of his choice, not provided by the US government. He would be comfortable in explaining that, under US law, he is not guilty."

Lacson said Aquino's case might not fall under Section 783, Title 50 on War and National Defense, chapter 23 (Internal Security) and subchapter one (Control of Subversive Activities) of the US Code, with which he is being charged.

Meanwhile, Lacson said he would ask a lawyer the extent of the US government's jurisdiction over a Filipino who is in the Philippines.

Aquino is not considered a foreign agent, he added.

Material related to the controversial "Hello, Garci" tapes was reportedly among the information passed on to Lacson by Aquino, but the opposition senator said the material was not sensitive, since it had already appeared in Philippine newspapers and other media outfits.

"Help my brother" A sister of Aquino asked the government yesterday to help her brother be released from jail in the US, where he is facing charges of espionage.

"My brother is still a Filipino," Dr. Jasmin Aquino said in Filipino at a press conference in Pasig City yesterday afternoon.

"He did not do anything wrong, he was just a victim. He loves the country so he was forced to leave for his peace of mind."

She said she saw her brother in September last year when she went to the US.

Holding back tears, Jasmin said her brother, a former top police official when Lacson was PNP chief, was forced to do odd jobs in the US to make a living.

Her family has yet to talk to Lacson and other groups to help in their brother's legal problems, Jasmin said.

Filipino consul can't see Aquino In New York, Consul General Cecil Rebong told visiting Filipino journalists that it was not normal for US authorities to take so long in notifying a foreign government of the arrest of one of its citizens, as in the case of Aquino.

Rebong said she received from the US Attorney's office a "notification of arrest" informing the consulate that "We (US authorities) arrested and detained Michael Ray Aquino, who we understand to be a national of your country, on September 10, 2005."

"It's just a short notification," she said. "There are no other specifics, not even the place where Aquino is being held."

The document was signed by Assistant US Attorney Karl Buch, she added.

However, Rebong said she had learned from Felix Vinluan, Aquino's immigration lawyer, that the former police officer was detained in a New Jersey jail.

Aquino hired Vinluan in March when he was arrested by immigration agents for overstaying after his tourist visa lapsed, she added.

Rebong said Vinluan appeared in a New Jersey court Monday when Aquino and Aragoncillo were presented before a judge, but Vinluan did not represent Aquino. The two were provided with public defenders by the court, she added.

"We are satisfied with the information we got from Attorney Vinluan that Aquino's rights have been respected," she said.

She and her staff, along with the staff of the United Nations mission, are busy with the short visit in New York of President Arroyo, Rebong said.

It is standard procedure for diplomats to visit detained nationals to check not only on their rights, but on their condition as well.

Rebong is the Philippine diplomat who was recently at the center of a scandal after she reportedly rented an apartment for $10,000 a month at the expensive Trump Tower, just across the UN headquarters, courtesy of Filipino taxpayers.

On the other hand, Press Secretary Ignacio Bunye told reporters at the Philippine Mission in New York that Mrs. Arroyo would not be distracted by the case against Aquino.

"Let me just put it this way. The Michael Ray Aquino case is something between him and the US," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0005419

"It is alleged that he broke some of the laws of the US, and he will have to answer for that, and as a Filipino citizen, the Philippine government is committed to provide him with all the legal assistance that is necessary and appropriate under the circumstances."

Bunye said Aquino's case did not overshadow the arrival of Mrs. Arroyo who is attending the UN General Assembly to preside over the Security Council, which is being chaired by the Philippines this month. –Jose Rodel Clapano, Christina Mendez, Cecille Suerte Felipe, Evelyn Macairan, Paolo Romero, Jess Diaz and Pia Lee-Brago in New York

FBI To Reveal RP Officials In Aquino Link (ABSCBN)

ABS-CBN Interactive, September 15, 2005

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) will reveal next week the names of former and current Philippine government officials who allegedly received classified US government documents sent by Michael Ray Aquino, the National Bureau of Investigation (NBI) said Thursday.

Lawyer Ricardo Diaz, chief of the NBI-International Police division, told ANC that the FBI is set to identify the Philippine officials linked in the espionage charges against Aquino and intelligence analyst Leandro Aragoncillo after September 21.

Aquino faces a US district court on that date to determine if he will remain in detention and attend trial or be turned over to immigration authorities.

Diaz said two of the officials identified by the FBI are on active government service. He said the FBI will unseal the documents on the case on September 21 and 22.

Diaz said the names in the FBI files pertain to former and current government officials who received classified information stolen by Aragoncillo while working as an intelligence analyst at the US Army's Fort Monmouth facility in New Jersey.

Aragoncillo forwarded the information to Aquino, who passed them to contacts in the Philippines.

Diaz said the documents downloaded by Aragoncillo were about the current political situation in the Philippines, among other matters concerning the country. "I would venture to say that it was about the political situation."

He, however, said it could also be about concerns other than the political situation.

Asked if the documents could provide clues to the alleged wiretapped conversation involving President Arroyo and former Commission on Elections commissioner Virgilio Garcillano, Diaz said he had no idea.

"[US authorities] have all the right to secure information," Diaz said. "They classify information being a sovereign country. When they add their analysis [on these information] they (information) become classified."

No mention of Lacson

Diaz said the NBI has not identified Sen. Panfilo Lacson as one of the three officials who allegedly received information from Aquino.

"Who knows? [Lacson] might not be the one alluded to or identified [as one of the officials who received information]," Diaz said. The NBI has not even named Lacson in its statements to the media, he added.

Lacson on Wednesday admitted receiving information from Aquino.

Lacson said he and "many others" received information passed by Aquino. He, however, played down the value of the reports, describing them as "shallow information." The senator is a former national police chief under whom Aquino served.

Diaz said the government will cooperate with US officials to pin down the Philippine officials receiving classified information regardless of their political leanings.

"When they invoke the Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty and the Extradition Treaty, we have to comply," he said.

Pimentel got Aquino info too

Also on Thursday, opposition Sen. Aquilino Pimentel revealed that he exchanged electronic mails (e-mails) with Aquino two of weeks ago.

Aquino initiated the exchange of emails, Pimentel said.

In the second e-mail, Pimentel said Aquino asked him for the address of Garcillano in the US. Garcillano, according to the reports, has been sighted in New Jersey after fleeing to Singapore, then London, in July.

DOJ_NMG_0005420

According to Pimentel, he was unable to tell Aquino about Garcillano's complete address. The senator told Aquino that he knew only the address of the former poll official's relative in the state.

In their brief exchanges, Aquino supposedly decried the harrassment he went through as well as the difficulties experienced in obtaining officials documents from the Philippine government to legitimize his US residency.

Aquino fled the country secretly in 2001, months after former President Joseph Estrada was ousted from Malacañan.

Although implicated in the rubout of suspected Kuratong Baleleng bank robbery gang members and the murder of public relations executive Salvador "Bubby" Dacer and his driver Emmanuel Corbito, no warrant of arrest has been issued against Aquino.

On May 18, 1995, Lacson, Aquino and 32 other police officers were charged for the murder of 11 members of the Kuratong Baleleng gang in Commonwealth Avenue, Quezon City. Their case was thrown out by Quezon City Regional Trial Court Judge Maria Theresa Yadao in 2003.

In November 2000, at the height of street protests triggered by allegations that Estrada received "jueteng" payola, Aquino and police Superintendent Cesar Mancao were implicated by Superintendent Glenn Dumlao in the abduction and murder Dacer and Corbito.

PATRIOT ACT:

Ashcroft Defends Patriot Act (SBT)

By CAROL DRAEGER, Tribune Staff Writer

South Bend Tribune, September 14, 2005

BENTON HARBOR -- Former Attorney General John Ashcroft is well aware his name is nearly synonymous with the 2001 Patriot Act that gave the FBI and Justice Department broad powers.

As its chief enforcer and defender, Ashcroft has been a target of librarians and civil rights activists who say the Patriot Act brings Big Brother into the private lives of ordinary citizens by allowing investigators to detain terrorism suspects.

"I'm probably a poster boy for the ACLU (American Civil Liberties Union)," Ashcroft told members of the Economic Club of SW Michigan Tuesday at the Mendel Center for the Arts and Technology at Lake Michigan College.

"They've built their membership against me," he added.

But he told the audience of mostly like-minded Republicans why the act is necessary in a post-9/11 country.

The act's measures give federal investigators more tools to prevent future terrorist attacks, such as "bringing down the wall" of silence that prevented the CIA, FBI and local enforcement agencies from sharing information that could've stopped the planners of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Measures like "roving wiretaps," he said, sound alarmist, but they extend to terrorists what law officers have used to fight drug dealers for years.

"We needed the authority to extend that to terrorists," he said.

Another provision that angered librarians at the time about the federal government being allowed to inquire about reading materials of patrons was also highlighted by a bookstore owner in the audience.

She told Ashcroft she has no safeguards against her records being seized.

Ashcroft said during the first two years of the Patriot Act, no library records were seized to hunt for terrorists.

He added that the act provides for congressional oversight, during which every six months members review activities conducted under the act.

"I don't think there have been abuses of the Patriot Act," he said, adding that "libraries should not be a safe haven for terrorists."

He pointed out that before the act was approved, the federal government had reviewed library materials used by the Unabomber suspect while piecing together evidence against him.

The events of 9/11 changed the United States and it required a new set of tools to prevent future terrorist attacks, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0005421

Prior to the Patriot Act, Ashcroft said the FBI and the Justice Department was good at putting together pieces of a puzzle to determine what happened and why to prosecute criminals.

But when perpetrators blow themselves up in the commission of a terrorist strike, Ashcroft said there is no one to prosecute, so the government needs to focus on prevention measures to stop terrorists before the strike.

On Sept. 11, 2001, Ashcroft said he was heading to Milwaukee for a meeting with schoolchildren when he heard about the attacks at the World Trade Center. After his plane landed in Milwaukee, dozens of SWAT team members ushered him back on a plane bound for Washington to meet with the president and his advisers.

One of President Bush's strongest attributes, Ashcroft said, is his clarity of mission.

"I'll never forget what the president said as he leaned in my direction: 'Don't ever let this happen again,'" Ashcroft said.

Later in his speech, Ashcroft touched upon Bush's directness in fighting terrorism again, when he said, "The president could've said, "Do your best to not let this happen again,' but he didn't."

Ashcroft said the tools necessary to make Americans safe were written into the Patriot Act to preserve liberty and freedom.

"I believe America is safer today," he said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Waives Rules On Fence (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday exercised his legal authority to bypass regulatory obstacles that had long delayed completion of a 14-mile border "enforcement zone" near San Diego.

"Completing the border infrastructure system will strengthen our efforts to reduce illegal entry to the United States. Congress provided us the authority to ensure this project is completed, and I intend to use it," Mr. Chertoff said.

The order came under the Homeland Security Act of 2002 and the Real ID Act of 2005, both of which mandated construction of necessary infrastructure in the region to reduce illegal entry and improve border security -- but that has been delayed since 1996 by litigation and environmental challenges.

U.S. Border Patrol chief David V. Aguilar, during a press briefing, called the project "the next important step in border security," saying it would allow an enforcement zone in San Diego that would free up manpower and resources for other areas.

"This is not about building a fence but managing our borders more effectively. That's a good thing, not only for San Diego and California, but also Mexico," Mr. Aguilar said, noting that elevated levels of illegal immigration had increased crime on both sides of the border. "This is about border security, about the responsibility we have to protect our nation."

He said primary and secondary fences, parallel roadways to give Border Patrol agents immediate access to the boundary and speed response efforts, stadium lighting to deter border crossers, and sensors and surveillance cameras to monitor incursions would create "a certainty of arrest in that zone."

"This is not so much about apprehension, but about deterrence. It will give us accessibility and mobility on the border," he said.

Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican and author of the Real ID Act, said that although U.S. Customs and Border Patrol (CBP) deserved credit for improving security in the area, "completion of this congressionally mandated border fence continues to be stymied by litigation and obstructionism."

"This intolerable situation forced Congress earlier this year to pass the Real ID Act, which gave Secretary Chertoff the authority he announced today he will be exercising," he said.

Mr. Sensenbrenner, who is chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, said the project would improve the security of the American public, especially those in the San Diego area; allow CBP to use its resources in a more effective manner; and clean up the environmental destruction that has resulted from illegal border crossings.

Mr. Chertoff noted that construction within the middle nine miles of the project area has begun, and that an extension of the roadway system, barriers and lighting would expand the project to areas west and east of the current enforcement zone.

He said the initial construction efforts resulted in a decline in border crossings and reduced what he called the "negative environmental impacts" to the region caused by illegal migration, such as trails of garbage, destruction of vegetation and trampling of sensitive lands.

Mr. Chertoff said that by completing both phases of the project, damage to the surrounding environment will be sharply reduced.

"The Department of Homeland Security is not compromising its commitment to responsible environmental stewardship in the area," he said. "We will act in an environmentally responsible manner consistent with the security needs of the nation."

Top CIA Official To Quit Sooner Over Goss Dispute (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

A senior official in the CIA's espionage branch will leave earlier than announced because of a dispute with CIA Director Porter J. Goss on reforms within the agency's spying branch, Bush administration officials said yesterday.

Robert Richer, the associate deputy director of operations, the No. 2 official in the CIA's clandestine service, had planned to retire from the agency effective November, according to a recent announcement to agency employees by Mr. Goss.

However, Mr. Richer now will enter the agency's retirement transition program within two weeks, said officials, who declined to be named.

A CIA spokesman refused to comment.

Mr. Richer told associates earlier this week that he decided to enter the transition program earlier because of concerns about the CIA leadership.

He has said that he disagreed with and did not have confidence in Mr. Goss and his key aides.

The move speeds up the end of Mr. Richer's involvement with CIA operations matters.

His scheduled departure highlights an ongoing and largely secret political struggle inside the CIA over efforts by Mr. Goss to reform the agency in the aftermath of intelligence failures related to September 11 and Iraq's weapons programs.

A senior intelligence official said Mr. Richer was forced out because of "insubordination."

A second official said the departure was due to a personality clash between Mr. Richer and Mr. Goss related to reforms at the Directorate of Operations. Both officials declined to elaborate.

Some leaders within the directorate have been opposing efforts by Mr. Goss to improve CIA spying. One issue in the recent past was a dispute over the selection of station chiefs, which mainly is done by the deputy director of operations, as the chief of the agency clandestine service is known.

The espionage branch was considered the elite element of the agency and is made up of about 7,000 case officers trained for spying overseas. Almost all other CIA employees are involved in analysis or technical work.

Mr. Goss and four close aides have been working behind the scenes to try to improve the agency's spying operations and have encountered resistance from officials who oppose some of the changes.

In particular, Mr. Goss is pressing hard for agency spies to do better in Iraq.

"The biggest problem for CIA can be summed up in two words: No spies," said one official.

The agency, in the two years since a presidential commission called for reforming human spying efforts, still has not succeeded in penetrating the major targets of U.S. intelligence with human spies, the official said.

Those targets include the terrorist group al Qaeda and the governments of China, North Korea and Iran.

According to intelligence officials who support reforming the CIA, a network of current and former operations officials has been working to oppose the reform efforts of Mr. Goss and his aides, whom they regard as political appointees and not professional spies. Mr. Goss is a former CIA case officer.

Ricin Case 'Still Being Looked At' (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, September 15, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005423

"I'm a fleet owner of a tanker company. I have access to castor pulp. If my demand is dismissed, I'm capable of making ricin."

It has been nearly 18 months since this message was sent with a vile of ricin to the Department of Transportation (DoT). A similar letter was mailed to the White House, and traces of the deadly substance were found on a mail-opening machine in Majority Leader Bill Frist's (R-Tenn.) Dirksen office mailroom.

Despite the fact that no one has been implicated yet in these crimes, experts believe that the person responsible for the ricin attack will be found.

"If you look at the Unabomber case, it took 18 years to solve," said Clinton Van Zandt, president of Van Zandt Associates Inc., an international threat- and risk-assessment group, and a 25-year-veteran special agent with the FBI. "I think any case can be solved. … All it's going to do is take someone who knows the individual to come forward."

Van Zandt, who has not worked on the ricin investigation but whose specialties include criminal profiling, said the individual who sent the ricin letters would be easier to catch than the individuals who sent the anthrax through the mail in 2001.

He explained that the individual who mailed the anthrax-laced letter probably did so for quasi-altruistic purposes, perhaps to warn the public of the danger of biological agents. The ricin sender did not strike him as that kind of intellectual.

"I don't see this person as a rocket scientist," he said. "This makes the case more solvable."

Lee Browning, a researcher and president of Browning Seed Inc., a Texas-based seed company, said, "It can be traced back down through the isotopes. I assure you [the government] can trace it down. … They can even tell what country it came from."

Browning, who spoke to the FBI about the ricin attack in Washington, said he suspects that the FBI knows where the letters came from and who sent them because of extensive research on the DNA of castor beans, from which ricin is derived.

Ricin is a deadly poison that can be inhaled, injected or ingested. A dose the size of the head of a pin could kill an adult.

Debbie Wireman, a spokeswoman for the Washington bureau of the FBI, said there are currently no updates on the case but "it is still being looked at."

The FBI, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and the DoT are offering a $120,000 reward for information leading to the arrest of the individual who mailed the poisoned letters.

Initially, reports pointed to a member of the trucking industry based on the content of the letters, signed "Fallen Angel," that threatened to manufacture more of the deadly poison if certain trucking regulations weren't dropped. The DoT letter was found at a sorting center serving a South Carolina airport. The second letter, postmarked from Chattanooga, was bound for the White House. Neither letter has been linked to the small amount of ricin found in Frist's office Rick Todd, president of the South Carolina Trucking Association, said FBI inquiries have ceased and the government no longer seems interested.

"We did post a message for a good eights months with information who to call with information," Todd said, but he added that the message since had taken it down.

Since the attacks, funding has increased for projects that genetically engineer castor beans without ricin. The process "blocks the expression of the ricin gene to make [the plant] safe to grow and process," said Thomas McKeon, a research chemist for Agricultural Research.

McKeon added that many household items are derived from castor beans, including cosmetics and lithium grease, used to lubricate car engines.

King Tapped For Homeland (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, September 15, 2005

The House Republican Steering Committee selected Rep. Peter King (R) to be the next chairman of the Homeland Security Committee Wednesday evening, handing the gavel to a media-savvy New Yorker at a time when the panel's turf is under heavy scrutiny.

The Steering choice is still subject to ratification by the full Republican Conference, but it is highly doubtful that the larger GOP group wouldn't approve the choice.

DOJ_NMG_0005424

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) announced the choice after an hours-long Steering Committee gathering, during which GOP Reps. Don Young (Alaska), Curt Weldon (Pa.), John Linder (Ga.), Dan Lungren (Calif.) all made pitches for the gavel.

"After hours of deliberation and many good candidates … we came to a decision," Hastert said Wednesday night.

In accepting the post, King thanked the Steering Committee profusely and promised to do his best to defend the country from terrorism and deal with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in the same resolute way the country recovered after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"I want to pledge that as someone who came from New York … I will show that same commitment to rebuilding the Gulf states," King said.

Republican aides said that the choice of the New Yorker just days after the fourth anniversary of 9/11 would be important symbolically. The fact that King is a moderate with good relationships across the aisle is also considered helpful, given the nature of the post.

GOP leaders also believe the Homeland job is likely to be more high-profile than it has been in the past, and King has always aggressively courted the media.

The contest for the Homeland post has been under way since June, when then-Chairman Christopher Cox (R-Calif.) was named by President Bush to serve as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The race was relatively quiet through the summer, as Cox was not confirmed by the Senate to his new post until July. Soon after, Congress left for the August recess.

But in the last weeks before Steering met to make its choice, the race became more heated. King was the target of an opposition research campaign, as unidentified operatives on K Street and on the Hill circulated evidence designed to back up allegations of past disloyalty to the party and support for the Irish Republican Army.

After King, Weldon was the most energetic campaigner, though Republican leaders have expressed frustration in the past with the Pennsylvanian's tendency to freelance and to pick controversial fights with the intelligence community.

Young, meanwhile, was hurt by his already having chaired two consecutive full committees. Young was also a vehement opponent of the Homeland panel's creation in the first place.

Linder emphasized his experience and, more importantly, his long political service to the party as a fundraiser and past chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Lungren, meanwhile, was something of a late mover in the contest, drawing on his previous experience as California's attorney general.

Republican Of New York To Lead House Panel (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - Representative Peter J. King, a moderate Republican from New York known for his independent streak, was selected by House leaders to lead a committee seeking to determine how federal funds are distributed to help communities prepare for terrorist attacks and natural disasters, Congressional officials announced yesterday.

Mr. King's appointment as chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security provides New York a potentially more prominent voice in a critical area at a time when the state's heavily Democratic delegation in the House finds itself largely sidelined by conservatives from other parts of the country. His appointment is expected to be ratified by House Republicans.

For years, Mr. King, who represents parts of Nassau and Suffolk Counties, has called for an overhaul of the way the government distributes antiterrorism aid, saying more funds should flow to New York City and other localities considered at high risk of terrorist attack. But his calls have met with resistance from lawmakers from other regions who insist on money for their districts, regardless of potential threats or vulnerabilities, in a process that has been derided as pork-barrel politics.

Mr. King's ascension places him at the center of several major issues confronting Congress, including questions about what went wrong with the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina and whether the country was prepared for another catastrophic storm or terrorist attack.

Mr. King said in an interview last night that the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina was a reminder that the country "must do more" to brace itself for catastrophic events.

Of his appointment, he said, "It's a great opportunity - and an even greater challenge."

The appointment marks a political turnaround for Mr. King, whose attacks on the House's conservative leadership had made him something of an outcast within his party. He criticized everything from its efforts to impeach former President Bill Clinton to its policies toward the heavily Democratic Northeast.

But in recent years, he has seemed to make an effort to return to the fold by, among other things, supporting a House-sponsored energy bill that included a controversial plan to grant product liability immunity to producers of MTBE, a gasoline additive that has polluted groundwater around the country.

Mr. King also refused to join Democratic and Republican lawmakers who criticized the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, instead placing blame elsewhere.

He said recently that missteps by state and local authorities might have hampered the federal government's ability to mobilize. He also said the state and local governments' response should be investigated as closely as the federal response.

Mr. King succeeds Christopher Cox, a former congressman from California who was chosen by President Bush to be chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mr. King's chief rival for the job had been Representative Don Young, Alaska's sole congressman, who as chairman of the Transportation Committee has been criticized for directing pork-barrel projects to his state.

Mr. King spent weeks trying to shore up support among his colleagues through letters and private meetings. He also received crucial backing from Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, who may be the only New York Republican who has clout with the House leadership, partly because of his role as head of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

King Wins Homeland Gavel (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 15, 2005

House Republicans last night tapped Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) as the new chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee after an intense three-month campaign.

“After hours of deliberations and long discussions ... we selected Peter King,” Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) told reporters after the selection.

He also described the past few weeks in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina as “a huge emotional roller coaster” and said he was glad such a committed, passionate person had been chosen for the post.

King still must be confirmed by the full GOP conference. That vote is planned for today.

King thanked Hastert and said he is absolutely committed to the war on terrorism but will also show the same commitment to build up the Gulf area.

He replaces former Rep. Christopher Cox (R-Calif.), who took over as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission early last month.

King, a New Yorker who was deeply affected by the Sept. 11 attacks, made an emotional appeal for the gavel in his letter to the 30-member Republican Steering Committee, which selects committee chairmen. He said his life was completely altered by the tragic events.

King was chosen over several other candidates, including Reps. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), John Linder (R-Ga.), Dan Lungren (R-Calif.), Don Young (R-Alaska) and Mac Thornberry (R-Texas).

Lungren impressed many members of the Steering Committee by making a strong appeal for the gavel yesterday, according to GOP aides, but King prevailed during the secret-ballot vote.

King emerged as the front-runner late in August when GOP leaders coalesced around his candidacy and privately backed him, according to Republican aides. Hastert has five votes on the Steering Committee, Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) has two and everyone else on the committee has one.

DOJ_NMG_0005426

During his presentation to the Steering Committee, King said, Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas) asked him a tough question about immigration. King, whose parents are from Ireland, supported the free flow of immigrants to this country in the past, but more recently, he has backed measures aimed at curbing the smuggling of illegal migrants.

"I told Lamar Smith my position changed after 9-11," King said after giving his presentation.

For Weldon, the vice chairman of the committee, who waged an aggressive campaign based on his two decades of experience on homeland-security issues, the defeat is a stinging blow. The Steering Committee has passed him over for two other chairmanships in the past, including the homeland-security panel when it was first created. He also lost a bid in 2002 for the Armed Services Committee gavel and complained that DeLay had lied when he promised him the job.

But Weldon, who also serves as vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, may still have a chance to become that panel's chairman. In early August, he told The Hill that Hastert had told him privately that he would support him to become Armed Services chairman.

Many Republicans believed Weldon was never a serious contender because he had angered too many Republicans and was considered unpredictable. Weldon had rankled fellow Republicans by publishing a book in June that harshly criticizes the intelligence community and the CIA. He also has alleged that analysts working for the Pentagon program called "Able Danger" had identified some of the hijackers in 1999 and that Pentagon lawyers did not share the information with the FBI.

Even though Young was the most senior of the candidates vying for the chairmanship, he had several strikes against him in his bid for the Homeland Security post.

Young already has held the gavel of two powerful committees; he is the chairman of Transportation and Infrastructure and previously served in the top spot on the Resources panel. Young also vigorously opposed the creation of the Homeland Security panel in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, which may have become the biggest hurdle to his bid to chair it.

In many ways, King is not the traditional choice for the gavel.

Not long ago, the sometimes-jovial, sometimes-brash Irish Catholic was known as a wild card, bucking his own party on numerous occasions, most notably by voting against President Bill Clinton's impeachment and supporting Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) presidential bid in 2000.

In fact, King's rank-and-file Republican opponents circulated a compilation of quotes just days before the Steering Committee decision to point out some of the negative remarks King, a moderate, has made over the years about Southern members of the Republican Party.

King does not have a leadership political action committee and readily admits that he has not helped fill his party's or his GOP colleagues' coffers over the years. But he has pledged that once selected as chairman he will make fundraising a top priority and will be in a better position to do so.

King is also quick to point out that recently he has been one of the staunchest supporters of the Bush administration, taking pains earlier this year to hit the airwaves to defend embattled White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove.

When House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) found himself mired in a series of scandals late last year, King was one of the first to rush to his defense. He also considers himself a loyal supporter of Hastert.

"King is seen as generally a team player and a solid candidate," one GOP leadership aide said.

"When you look at his temperament in the past, you can say he was brash and difficult, but [we] have really seen him come into his own and it positions him nicely to be considered for the chair" a former leadership aide added.

Feds' Search Moves Trouble 9th Circuit (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

Law.com, September 15, 2005

Judge Betty Fletcher gave the federal government what it wanted Wednesday. But she didn't feel too good about it. And her colleague, Judge Raymond Fisher, wasn't really happy, either.

Fletcher, a senior judge on the 9th U.S. Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals, authored two opinions Wednesday, and sat on the panel that offered a third, per curiam opinion. They said that border agents searching for contraband may disembowel gas tanks, drill holes in truck beds and disassemble car doors without reasonable cause for suspicion.

DOJ_NMG_0005427

Fletcher made her feelings known in a concurrence to her own opinion in U.S.A. v. Chaudhry, 05 C.D.O.S. 8344, that, she wrote, is intended "to express my distaste for the government's game-playing."

The game-playing involved the government's goal of getting an appeals court to agree that border agents could take apart an automobile without apparent suspicion.

But in all three cases, there were clear reasons for suspicion that the government chose not to enter into evidence -- from drug-sniffing dogs to visibly nervous drivers.

"But the government wanted confirmation that no suspicion is required for extensive, intrusive searches at the border," Fletcher wrote. "This would have an ancillary benefit for the government -- it would not have to prove the reliability of its drug-sniffing dogs."

The question of whether the government may conduct such extensive searches without suspicion, she added, "is an entirely fictional construct. Suspicion existed in each case, and in my view, review of cases at the appellate level is a waste of judicial resources. The only possible purposes are the government's desire to push the envelope to its limits: to find out how much destruction it can do without any suspicion, and to avoid proving it uses reliable dogs."

In a separate -- but much shorter -- concurrence, Fisher agreed.

Northern District of California Federal Defender Barry Portman said Fletcher seemed constrained by the longstanding trend of U.S. Supreme decisions expanding the freedom of border guards to conduct random searches.

"We're looking to see, when the crowbar comes out to the cab, what is the allowable destruction of the vehicle," he said. Without room to rule against the government, he said, Fletcher did everything possible to criticize the litigation strategy.

"She's never been one to tiptoe around things she thinks are off," he said.

But, Portman added, the easy solution for a judge who felt forced to make a distasteful ruling would be to issue an unpublished opinion.

And Rory Little, a professor at Hastings College of the Law and a former federal prosecutor, said he was puzzled by the fact that Fletcher would author an opinion in a case that she called "essentially a request for an advisory opinion."

"It's a little bit of judges crying, in a sense, after they've inflicted their own wound," he said.

But, Little continued, he understands why judges might be annoyed by the government's strategy of eliminating certain facts from a case to get a favorable appeals court ruling. "I don't like the strategy either, personally, but if I was an appellate lawyer, I'd use it," he said. "It is a way, in a sense, for a party to overreach. You can win on your facts, but you want more."

The strategy is common in instances when a litigant is hopeful they can get a favorable ruling on a controversial issue.

"It's not game playing. It's a litigation technique that is often used by appellate lawyers when they want to develop law that is favorable to them," Little added.

But in the criminal justice system, Portman said, it's a technique whose benefits are limited to prosecutors.

"That's an advantage that the government has that defense counsel never does," he said. "Because the government represents positions, while defense lawyers represent a person."

Wiretap Mosques, Romney Suggests (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Governor Mitt Romney raised the prospect of wiretapping mosques and conducting surveillance of foreign students in Massachusetts, as he issued a broad call yesterday for the federal government to devote far more money and attention to domestic intelligence gathering.

In remarks that caused alarm among civil libertarians and advocates for immigrants rights, Romney said in a speech to the Heritage Foundation that the United States needs to radically rethink how it guards itself against terrorism.

"How many individuals are coming to our state and going to those institutions who have come from terrorist-sponsored states?" he said, referring to foreign students who attend universities in Massachusetts. "Do we know where they are? Are we tracking them?"

"How about people who are in settings -- mosques, for instance -- that may be teaching doctrines of hate and terror," Romney continued. "Are we monitoring that? Are we wiretapping? Are we following what's going on?"

As he ponders a potential run for president in 2008, Romney has positioned himself as a homeland security expert: He sits on a federal homeland security advisory council, is active on the issue with the National Governors Association, and repeatedly speaks about the lessons the country has learned from the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 and, more recently, from Hurricane Katrina.

Romney, who referred to himself yesterday as "red-state folk," has also struck more conservative postures on social issues that may alienate voters in Massachusetts but endear him to the Republican electorate nationwide; his tough talk on antiterrorism measures could also earn him support among conservatives.

His latest message is that the United States needs to shift its focus from response to prevention: Instead of spending billions on training and equipment to react to an attack, he argues, the country ought to work on stopping one.

"It is virtually impossible to have a homeland security system based upon the principles only of protecting key assets and response," he told an audience of about 100. "The key to a multilayered strategy begins with effective prevention, and, for me, prevention begins with intelligence and counterterror activity."

But that activity is deeply troubling to civil rights groups. Ali Noorani, executive director of the Massachusetts Immigrants and Refugee Advocacy Coalition, called the methods Romney suggested misguided and ineffective. Tracking people based on their ethnicity, he said, will only sow resentment among immigrant communities and prevent their cooperation with authorities.

"Blanket eavesdropping and blanket profiling only erodes the safety and security of our country," Noorani said. "People who really know what national security is and what intelligence is realize that we need to build trust between law enforcement and immigrant communities."

Elyes Yaich, president of the Islamic Society of Northeastern University, said that foreign students, especially those from Islamic countries, already face unfair scrutiny coming to the United States and that subjecting them to specialized monitoring would further invade their right to privacy.

"It's something that shouldn't happen," Yaich said. "If they're going to do surveillance, why not do it for synagogues and churches, too?"

Nancy Murray, director of education for the American Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts, said international students are already forced to submit personal data to a federal database designed to let the government closely track them. Keeping closer tabs would only cause a greater chilling effect on scholars coming here from other countries.

"Now they're beginning to think, 'Well, why don't we just go somewhere else?' " Murray said. "We are really going to fall behind. It's very shortsighted."

Asked to respond to that criticism, Romney spokeswoman Julie Teer said last night that the governor has a "realistic view" of what it takes to fight terrorism.

"The governor believes we can strike a balance between what is necessary to protect our homeland while respecting individual freedom and liberty," Teer said.

Romney said he believes that both state and federal governments have a role in intelligence-gathering. It is the FBI's job to do wiretapping and surveillance, he said, but Massachusetts has a responsibility to collect any useful information it can.

Central to that is a facility opened last year at the State Police headquarters in Framingham designed to be the clearinghouse for a variety of intelligence gathered in the state. At the facility, which state officials call "the fusion center," analysts armed with tips and information from residents, police, water-meter readers, and others, will pore through the data, look for patterns, and contact Washington about anything noteworthy.

Romney wants to see every state have such a system, which allows it to easily send intelligence to Washington and easily get intelligence back.

"It's the state's responsibility to figure out how to gather that information and fuse it together . . . to determine where the real threats exist," Romney said.

The ACLU has been critical of the fusion center. The group has asked whether collecting loads of data, much of which is sure to prove useless, is the most effective way to prevent a terrorist attack.

DOJ_NMG_0005429

"It just seems like we're getting more and more driven by the need to fight the war on terrorism in a very counterproductive way," Murray said.

Romney stressed in his address at the Heritage Foundation that the country's antiterrorism and military operations have to be "nimble, agile, and fast-moving." He said the distribution of antiterrorism money after 9/11 was haphazard and ineffective.

Cities and towns in Massachusetts and nationwide seized the opportunity to buy new fire trucks and unnecessary equipment, he said. "It was everybody grabbing money as fast as we could."

If the response to Hurricane Katrina was any indication, the extra funds did not appear to have helped, he said.

Romney was one of the first high-profile Republicans to criticize the federal government's response to the hurricane, calling it "an embarrassment." But in the two weeks since, he has reserved most of his criticism for state and local governments, in particular Louisiana's Democratic governor, Kathleen Blanco.

Yesterday, Romney did not criticize Blanco by name, though he did so implicitly a few times. At one point, he said that one clear failure in the response to Katrina was a lack of "fast-moving decision-making and clear authority." He said there would be no such leadership vacuum if a disaster hit Massachusetts.

"In my state, it's me," he said. "The governor's in charge. I got it."

Answering a question yesterday about the National Guard, Romney said he believes there is no need for a military draft, calling it "totally unnecessary."

The Heritage audience was highly receptive to Romney yesterday, giving him a rousing welcome and lengthy applause as he concluded his remarks. The foundation promotes study of issues important to conservatives.

'Crescent' Not Embraced (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

It is unbuilt, but already under fire. The proposed memorial to United Flight 93 has a chorus of critics, irked by a single design element that ultimately might be reconfigured.

The "Crescent of Embrace," a double arc of maple trees that will turn red in the fall, has drawn the ire of some, who say it will resemble the red crescent -- a symbol of Islam dear to the hearts of the September 11 hijackers on the flight that crashed into a Pennsylvania field.

The Rev. Ron McRae, pastor of the Bible Anabaptist Church near Pittsburgh and founder of the Street Preachers Fellowship, called the design "a memorial to terrorists." He vows to file a lawsuit and stage a public protest.

The families of the 40 passengers and crew disagree, but the Los Angeles-based architect said yesterday that he would work to satisfy critics.

"This is an unfortunate distraction from the mission of the memorial," said Hamilton Peterson, who lost his father and stepmother on the flight and is president of the District-based Families of Flight 93.

"We've vetted this design and thought it through. In reality, the red crescent is a symbol of a benevolent humanitarian mission founded in World War I. Now, wackos with idle time and energy are trying to divert our goal," Mr. Peterson said.

But designer Paul Murdoch said he is "somewhat optimistic" that the spirit of the design could be maintained.

"It's a disappointment there is a misinterpretation and a simplistic distortion of this, but if that is a public concern, than that is something we will look to resolve in a way that keeps the essential qualities," Mr. Murdoch, 48, told the Associated Press.

Mr. McRae's isolated comments garnered considerable coverage in the Pennsylvania press and resonated on Web sites such as Free Republic, Power Line and Constitutional Conservative.

Columnists weighed in this week. Michelle Malkin called the crescent design a "monumental surrender" and "boneheaded," while Mark Steyn observed that Flight 93 had been "re-hijacked," and in the thrall of "the cultural elite."

In a letter sent Tuesday to the National Park Service, Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, called on the agency to reject the design as "a flash point for controversy and criticism."

DOJ_NMG_0005430

"The crescent in the design does not imply or depict religious iconography. The crescent follows the actual ridge line of the crash site and is intended to honor the heroes of Flight 93 and comfort their families," said Joanna Hanley, superintendent of the memorial site, which will be managed by the National Park Service.

The design for the 2,000-acre memorial also includes a chapel and a wall dedicated to Flight 93.

Insurgent Bombings Kill More Than 170 In Baghdad (USAT)

By Rick Jervis And Mona Mahmoud

USA Today, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD — Insurgents launched a wave of attacks throughout the Iraqi capital Wednesday and today. More than 150 people were killed Wednesday in one of the deadliest days in Baghdad since major combat ended in May 2003.

At least 16 Iraqi policemen and five civilians were killed today when a suicide bomber drove his car into a convoy of police vehicles in Baghdad's southern Dora district, police Lt. Thair Mahmoud said. The wounded included 13 policemen.

About a dozen explosions ripped through Baghdad neighborhoods Wednesday, including an early-morning suicide car blast in a predominantly Shiite neighborhood that killed about 112, according to the Interior Ministry.

More than 540 people were wounded in the attacks Wednesday. Four suicide car bombs targeted American convoys, but the U.S. military did not report any deaths.

In a Web posting, al-Qaeda in Iraq linked the attacks to an offensive by Iraqi and U.S. forces in Tal Afar, near the Syrian border. The offensive began Saturday and evicted most insurgents from the city. The U.S. military estimated 200 militants were killed. No Americans were killed.

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, al-Qaeda's leader in Iraq, purportedly declared “all-out war” on Shiite Muslims, Iraqi troops and the country's government in an audio recording released on the Internet.

The U.S. military said there were four direct attacks on Americans on Wednesday and 10 soldiers were wounded. The office of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari denounced the attacks and called an emergency meeting of members of the Defense and Interior ministries and U.S. military officials to determine the government's response. The deadliest attack Wednesday came about 6:45 a.m. as day laborers gathered in Kazimiyah's Oruba Square, hoping to get picked up for work. A man in a car drove up and began shouting that he was looking for helpers, said Lt. Muhammed al-Nuami, an Interior Ministry official. When the workers crowded around, the driver detonated, al-Nuami said.

Shiites have often been the target of attacks by predominantly Sunni insurgents, but Sunnis have also been attacked. On Wednesday, 17 men were executed in a predominantly Sunni village north of Baghdad. The victims were rounded up by gunmen wearing Iraqi military uniforms, marched 50 yards out of town and shot, al-Nuami said.

Insurgent Attacks Target Scores Of Poor Shiites (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- At their uncle Hamid Ghatti Fares' behest, the Rashid brothers left the desperation and unemployment of Nasiriya down south to look for construction jobs in the Iraqi capital.

And under their uncle's care, the two bothers, Hossein, 33, and Tahseen, 27, were returned to their home in the south Wednesday, their mangled bodies laid side by side in simple wooden coffins strapped atop a Korean-made minibus.

"What can I say? How can I describe this feeling?" said Fares, a 57-year-old Baghdad cigarette vendor, whimpering as he boarded the vehicle and prepared to deliver his nephews' remains to their father -- his brother -- in Nasiriya. "It will be a long ride."

The brothers were killed when a massive car bomb exploded in a crowd of day laborers in the largely Shiite Muslim district of Kadhimiya on Wednesday, one of the deadliest days of insurgent attacks in the capital since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

By nightfall, at least 141 Iraqis had been killed and 228 injured in the bombings and ambushes in Baghdad, most of the victims members of Iraq's Shiite majority. Between 6:50 a.m. and 2:10 p.m. local time, 10 car bombs were set off in the capital.

Another 17 people were shot execution-style in a massacre in a Shiite enclave near Taji, north of the capital.

The barrage of explosions plunged the capital once again into fear and despair. Gunfire and sirens rang out as black smoke rose into the sky. Police and soldiers choked traffic with checkpoints. In eastern Baghdad, automatic weapons fire continued into the night.

The violence appeared to be retaliation for a recent joint U.S.-Iraqi offensive against rebels in the northern city of Tall Afar that Iraqi officials said killed at least 150 insurgents. The attacks also seemed designed to stoke tension between the country's Shiite majority and Sunni minority, which along with Sunni Arab fighters from abroad is spearheading the insurgency.

The group of Jordanian-born Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, an insurgent leader, claimed responsibility for the day's assaults in an Internet posting.

"Al-Qaida Organization in Iraq ... has declared war against Shiites in all of Iraq," the audio recording said. "As for the government, servants of the crusaders headed by (Prime Minister) Ibrahim Jafari, they have declared a war on Sunnis in Tall Afar. You have begun and started the attacks, and you won't see mercy from us."

A senior U.S. military official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the attacks were evidence of insurgents' weakness against Iraq's nascent security forces. "(The insurgents) failed to stand up to the assault up north, so they slink away and kill civilians in Baghdad," he said. "It is astonishing that they can try to claim some victory from pure murder."

John Arquila, a counter-insurgency specialist at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif., offered a similar assessment.

"The insurgent networks in Iraq have repeatedly demonstrated their ability to mount substantial operations on short notice, particularly when the targets are `soft' (i.e., innocent civilians). ... It takes the insurgents much longer to mount operations against coalition forces, when they choose to do anything more than plant bombs or run suicide attacks."

Five of Wednesday's car bombs targeted U.S. patrols, injuring at least two Americans. In one foiled attack, a man of Syrian origin rammed a car bomb into an American tank, but it failed to explode and he was captured, a U.S. military officer said. Three bombs targeted Iraqi security officials, killing three soldiers and police officers.

But ordinary Iraqi civilians, almost all Shiites, bore the brunt of the attacks. One car bomb in the mostly Shiite Shuala district targeted a group of people waiting for a bus. At least four were killed, according to the Interior Ministry.

In Taji, according to one witness, a group of at least 50 men in Iraqi army uniforms pulled 17 members of the mostly Shiite Tamimi tribe out of their homes, lined them up against a wall and executed them before firing off flares and escaping into the dense palm groves along the Tigris River.

"The people who were killed have nothing to do with the Americans, the government or security forces," Mohammad Baqer Tamimi, a Taji produce wholesaler, said in a telephone interview. "Some sold vegetables, some sold ice and some were taxi drivers."

The car bomb in Kadhimiya, though, was the day's deadliest incident, killing 112 people, the Interior Ministry said.

Some witnesses said the suicide bomber posed as a potential employer; dozens of poor, mostly Shiite young men crowded around the vehicle in hopes of landing a job.

Hours after the explosion, women walking by the scene covered their eyes and gasped, overwhelmed by the smell of burnt flesh. Slick pools of blood covered the pavement. Farm tractors hauled away piles of charred debris.

The lobby of nearby Kadhimiya hospital had been turned into an overflow emergency room. Stacks of saline bags and bandages lay atop the receptionist's counter. Flies swarmed the bloodied, half-conscious patients lying on hospital beds.

Many of the victims said they were unemployed bricklayers, painters and construction workers from Iraq's south. The young men told similar stories of paying $7 or so for a taxi ride up to Baghdad and staying in $1-a-night flophouses for the chance to earn up to $10 a day working on building projects in the capital.

"What is the reason for killing those innocent people? They work to eat. If they don't work they will not eat for the day," said Hashim Naji, a 23-year-old employee of a shoe factory, recovering from wounds he sustained in the Kadhimiya attack. "They are not officials. They don't represent a threat to anyone."

Insurgents Kill 160 In Baghdad (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0005432

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, September 15, 2005

In some of the deadliest terror attacks since the 2003 invasion, up to a dozen insurgent bombings and shootings saw around 160 people killed in Baghdad on Wednesday and wounded over 500 others.

The attacks came as Iraqi leaders claimed to have finalised a constitution, and as the Iraqi branch of al-Qaeda swore to avenge a recent US-Iraqi offensive on the north-eastern town of Tal Afar. The one-day death toll was possibly the highest in the capital since March 2003, and one of the attacks – a suicide car bomb in the predominantly Shia north Baghdad neighbourhood of Kadhemiya that killed over 112 people – was the second deadliest single blast.

According to the Iraqi interior ministry, a suicide bomber pulled up to a crowd of day labourers waiting for work by a public square, called them over to his pick-up with offers of employment, then detonated the vehicle with 220kg of explosive.

Witnesses said that no US or Iraqi military or police targets were in the vicinity, suggesting that the attacker had aimed to cause as much civilian carnage as possible.

The blast comes two weeks after a stampede at a Shia religious commemoration sparked by fears of a suicide bomber killed over 1,000 people in the same area.

Elsewhere in the city, a car bomber blew himself up near a queue of people lined up to fill gas canisters, killing 11, while other bombs targeted Iraqi and US patrols and the offices of a Shia party. In addition, unknown gunmen pulled 17 Shia men from a single tribe from their homes in the town of Taji north of Baghdad and killed them, in one of a series of apparent sectarian massacres that have become increasingly common in the last six months.

The attacks came as a statement appeared on a website used by the al-Qaeda in Iraq organisation of militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi vowing revenge for a recent US-Iraqi offensive. “We would like to congratulate the Muslim nation and inform it the battle to avenge the Sunnis of Tal Afar has begun,” it said, although it did not directly take credit for Wednesday’s bombs. An audio tape purportedly released by the organisation also declared all-out war on Shia.

US patrols also came under attack. A Humvee military vehicle was burnt out by a roadside bomb, but the US military said it suffered no casualties. Minutes later another bomb nearby wounded two Iraqi policemen in a convoy.

On Sunday, the US and Iraqi militaries had wrapped up a sweep through the town, of Tal Afar, a reported transit route for Islamist volunteers moving in from Syria, in which they claimed to have killed over 150 insurgents and detained at least 500 suspects.

The insurgents have timed similar waves of explosions for politically sensitive moments, and this surge in the bloodshed comes as Shia and Kurdish leaders try to win Sunni Arab support for Iraq’s permanent constitution. The run-up to the October 15 vote on the constitution has worsened tensions between Iraq’s main communities, Shia, Sunni Arabs and Kurds.

Attacks In Iraq Inflame Worries About Civil War (WSJ)

By Farnaz Fassihi

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Attacks resulting in one of Iraq's deadliest days in more than two years intensified concerns about escalating sectarian violence and its potential to evolve into open civil war.

Insurgents yesterday attacked crowds of Shiite Muslim civilians, Iraqi police and American convoys in 12 separate assaults around the capital, killing more than 150 people and wounding nearly 600. The attacks coincided with an announcement by Shiite Arabs and ethnic Kurds -- who make up the majority of the transitional government -- that the nation's draft constitution was finalized, without amendments to appease Sunni Muslim Arabs' demands.

Al Qaeda's arm in Iraq claimed responsibility for the attacks in a statement published on a Web site, calling them retaliation against a U.S.-Iraqi military operation under way in Tal Afar, a town near the border with Syria. And in a purported audiotape of the group's leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, he called for all-out war against Shiites, Iraqi troops and the country's government.

The string of attacks in Baghdad followed the apparent execution of 17 men -- believed to be Shiites -- by a group of men dressed in Iraqi military uniforms who staged an early-morning raid on a neighborhood in Taji, 10 miles north of Baghdad. The dead were handcuffed, blindfolded and shot in the head, Iraqi officials said.

The scale and scope of the attacks, with Sunni Arab militants targeting and killing groups of Shiites, shows the increasingly sectarian nature of the conflict, and is reviving doubts about whether the newly trained Iraqi forces can properly secure it.

Many analysts believe the buffer keeping Iraq's Sunni and Shiites from a full-fledge civil war has been the Shiite religious and political leaders' restraint from accusing the Sunnis outright and calling for Shiites to retaliate. But no one is sure how much longer the Shiite community will be willing to heed their advice. There have been numerous tit-for-tat killings of a sectarian nature among ordinary Iraqis, with almost daily reports of civilian corpses -- both Shiite and Sunni -- found murdered.

"It is very clear that they want to start a civil war between Sunni and Shiite," said Mohammad Bahr Ul-Ulom, a prominent Shiite cleric and politician, reached by phone in Baghdad last night. "They want the Shiites to say, 'Let's go after them,' but so far our leaders are calling for calm."

The worst attack yesterday occurred in the Shiite neighborhood of Kathemiya, where day laborers gathered at dawn looking for work. A truck approached the crowd and detonated once the driver had lured the men toward it. U.S. military convoys also came under fire yesterday in three separate car-bomb attacks around Baghdad, wounding two American soldiers. Iraqi police were attacked with gunfire and a car bomb, leaving several police officers dead.

The violence yesterday came after several months of relative calm in the capital, where according to the U.S. military car bombs and attacks against coalition forces had dropped significantly since May. But both Iraqi and American officials said they expect a spike in violence in the weeks preceding the constitutional referendum scheduled for Oct. 15.

For months now, Iraq's various sectarian and ethnic groups have been torn about the nature of their new constitution and the political path ahead for Iraq. The Kurds and Shiite Arabs pushed for a federal system whereby regional governments could function with semiautonomy from the central government. Sunni Arabs oppose federalism and rejected the constitution, complaining that the political process aimed at unifying Iraq had instead divided it even further.

Since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime in April 2003, Iraq's deteriorating security has fallen into a vicious cycle: relative calm followed by spikes of spectacular violence timed around political milestones, such as the hand over of sovereignty, elections, drafting of the constitution and now the referendum.

Multiple Attacks Kill Nearly 150 In Iraqi Capital (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth And Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Thursday, Sept. 15 - Insurgents staged at least a dozen suicide bombings that ripped through Baghdad in rapid succession on Wednesday, killing almost 150 people and wounding more than 500 in a coordinated assault that left much of the capital paralyzed.

Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia claimed responsibility for the assault, which inflicted the biggest death toll in Baghdad since the American-led invasion of Iraq toppled Saddam Hussein more than two years ago.

The violence appeared to be retaliation for the weeklong siege of the insurgent stronghold of Tal Afar and included a bombing in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad that used a new tactic: luring scores of day laborers to a minivan with promises of work, and then blowing it up. At least 112 died in that blast alone, the second highest death toll from any single terrorist bombing in Iraq since the invasion.

The attacks coincided with the opening of the United Nations General Assembly in New York, attended by top Iraqi leaders and President Bush, who pressed for a resolution calling on all nations to take action against the incitement of terrorism.

Wednesday's attacks demonstrated again how easily insurgents could still stage well-coordinated attacks, despite a series of highly publicized military offensives like the recent one in Tal Afar, a northern city that has been an insurgent base.

The explosions struck Shiite civilians, Iraqi security forces and American troops, the favored targets of Iraq's Sunni Arab insurgency. The worst attack singled out workers in a Shiite neighborhood, Kadhimiya, with an explosion that tore through a crowded intersection, leaving the facades of nearby shops shattered and puddles of blood on the streets.

"I saw a huge fireball in the air, and I felt the heat and flame on my face," said Kadhum Nasir Malih, 28, a laborer who lives in a hotel near the site of the blast. "I went outside the hotel, and I was amazed to see the number of bodies. Some were still, and some were groaning with agony, charred and covered with blood, with smoke rising from them."

On Thursday morning at 8. a.m., a suicide car bomb detonated next to a police convoy in southern Baghdad, killing 16 people and wounding another 21, an official at the Interior Ministry said. Most of the dead and the wounded were police officers and the rest were civilians, the official said. Also in the capital on Thursday morning, gunmen shot and killed three Shiite pilgrims as they traveled toward the holy city of Karbala.

Senior military officials interviewed Wednesday said intelligence indicated that the bombs and planning for the Baghdad attacks came from insurgents in the Euphrates River valley in western Iraq, where Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, has his base of operations.

"We believe these attacks were spawned in the west, then the bombs migrated from the Euphrates River valley," said a senior United States Central Command officer, who spoke anonymously because of the secret source of the intelligence. "The heart of Zarqawi's network is not in Baghdad, we're quite confident of that," the officer continued in a telephone interview. "In a corridor from Syria to Baghdad is where he's nested right now."

Hours after the first attack, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia issued a statement calling the strikes revenge for the American and Iraqi assault on Tal Afar. It said the bombings signified that "the battle to avenge the Sunni people of Tal Afar has started." The American military has said it killed more than 150 insurgents in Tal Afar over the past two weeks.

Bombings and other attacks soon followed the Kadhimiya blast, at a rate of several per hour. Police cars careered through the city struggling to restore order, and hospitals overflowed with the wounded.

Police officers transporting their own casualties to hospitals fired wildly and pointed rocket-propelled grenade launchers at drivers to force them out of the way. At Yarmouk Hospital, the floors were splashed with blood, and medics rushed through the halls carrying burned and bloodied victims. One man lay on the ground, his chest cavity held together by a few stitches. A girl was brought inside, her fingers blown off. A man lay in a bed, screaming after being told his leg was amputated.

"There were bodies everywhere, I was lucky to have survived," said Saadi Hussein Ali, a 55 year-old laborer whose arm was broken in the Kadhimiya bombing, as he lay exhausted on a hospital cot. "It was only workers - why would they want to kill us? We are poor."

At least 10 American soldiers were wounded in attacks that the military said struck at least three military convoys. No deaths were reported. In Taji, north of Baghdad, gunmen dressed in Iraqi uniforms abducted 17 men and shot them, the Interior Ministry said.

Later Wednesday, an audiotape released over the Internet that was said to be from Mr. Zarqawi, the Jordanian terrorist, declared a "full-scale war on Shiites around Iraq, without mercy" to avenge Tal Afar and what the speaker asserted was a "war against the Sunnis" undertaken by the Iraqi government and conducted under the guise of attacking terrorists. The authenticity of the tape could not be verified.

Speaking in the United States, Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari also said the attacks appeared to be revenge for the military sweep of Tal Afar. In recent days, several terrorist groups had vowed to avenge allies killed in Tal Afar, and one warning issued by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia had pledged specifically to attack Shiites. Kurdish and Shiite troops made up almost all of the Iraqi troops in Tal Afar. The National Assembly and Iraqi government, led by Mr. Jaafari, who had given approval for the Tal Afar offensive, are both dominated by Shiites.

Iraqi and American officials have also been anticipating a rise in violence in reaction to Iraq's new constitution, which has provoked angry opposition from many Sunni leaders and demonstrations in several cities since it was presented in the National Assembly last month. The attacks on Wednesday came as the acting speaker of the National Assembly announced that an amended version of the constitution was complete.

On Wednesday night, Mr. Jaafari's cabinet convened an emergency session to plan a response to the bombings. In a statement it said the attacks revealed the insurgents' "desperation and cowardice in the face of the setbacks they have suffered in Tal Afar and elsewhere at the hands of Iraq's security forces." Referring to the Tal Afar siege, the statement added that "the fact that the terrorists are claiming to be responding specifically to Operation Restoring Rights shows the serious blow that operation has dealt them."

Several of Iraq's leading political parties issued statements condemning the bombings and offering condolences to the victims. But there were indications that the continuing violence could soon be a potent issue in Iraq's next round of parliamentary elections in December. The Iraqi National Accord, led by Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister, released a statement condemning the bombings and "holding the government responsible for the deteriorating security situation."

With the offensive in Tal Afar and stepped up airstrikes and ground attacks in Anbar Province, senior American commanders say they are pursuing militants, including Mr. Zarqawi, who have been driven out of cities in central and north-central Iraq, including Baghdad.

"The insurgency is much more pushed to the west in Iraq this year than it was in the previous years," Gen. John P. Abizaid, the leader of the military's Central Command, said in an interview on Tuesday. "I actually regard that as a sign that the insurgency is having a hard time getting established elsewhere."

But on Wednesday, the senior Central Command officer said the new attacks showed that Mr. Zarqawi retained the ability to launch coordinated strikes in central Iraq. "Just when you think you have your foot on his throat, he can come back," said the officer. "He marshals his resources in order to have days like today to get himself in the news."

Insurgents Kill 160 In Baghdad (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Naseer Nouri

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 14 -- Insurgents struck the Iraqi capital Wednesday with at least a dozen attacks that targeted Shiite Muslim civilians, Iraqi security forces and American troops, killing more than 160 people in the deadliest day of violence in Baghdad since the U.S. invasion more than two years ago.

U.S. military officials said the day-long wave of suicide bombings, rocket attacks and shootings across the city bore the hallmarks of al Qaeda in Iraq, the radical Sunni Muslim insurgent organization led by Abu Musab Zarqawi, a Jordanian.

The group did not immediately assert direct responsibility for the attacks, but an Internet statement issued in its name welcomed the start of "revenge battles throughout the land of Mesopotamia."

The statement linked the attacks to a U.S. and Iraqi offensive underway against insurgents in the northwestern city of Tall Afar. A subsequent audio recording attributed to Zarqawi, which was posted on the Internet, accused the Shiite-led Iraqi government of having declared war on Sunnis in that city. As a result, al Qaeda in Iraq "has decided to launch a comprehensive war on the Shiites all over Iraq, wherever and whenever they are found. This is revenge. . . . Take care, because we are not going to have mercy on you," the recording said, according to a translation by the Washington-based SITE Institute, a group that monitors radical Web sites.

The attacks appeared calculated to undermine public faith in the ability of the fledgling government to protect its people, by showing that insurgents could strike in Baghdad despite the U.S. and Iraqi military efforts to stop them. Some of Wednesday's attacks were carried out in ways that maximized death tolls.

In northwest Baghdad, a driver in the heavily Shiite neighborhood of Kadhimiyah pulled up alongside a gathering point for day laborers and offered the men jobs, witnesses said. He waited until a crowd of workers had clustered around his four-door car, then detonated explosives packed inside, said Salim Hussein, 20, who witnessed the attack.

The blast killed at least 112 people and wounded hundreds of others.

As burned, blackened victims filled the district hospital, a Shiite cleric patrolled the scene of the bombing in an ambulance, calling over the vehicle's loudspeaker for donations of blood. Men looking for loved ones ran fingers down pages and pages of names of bombing victims posted outside the hospital.

"Why haven't they killed Saddam?" wailed a Shiite woman in black abaya as she walked away from the hospital. "Cut his head off."

Within an hour of that attack, a driver smashed his car into two other vehicles at an intersection, then blew up the vehicle when a crowd gathered, police said. At least 15 people died, police Lt. Mustafa Majid said.

"I saw people's bodies flying in the air and thrown for yards," minibus-taxi driver Amer Salman said.

More attacks were mounted throughout the day, signaled by rattling booms, black smoke and U.S. military helicopters shuttling across the sky. Traffic on main roads shut down as police closed key routes. Rumors spread that more car bombers were roaming the city and that men wearing suicide belts were infiltrating hospitals.

DOJ_NMG_0005436

The other attacks included two car bombings that killed a total of 26 people, one that targeted an Iraqi army convoy and killed three soldiers, and two that hit U.S. military convoys, U.S. and Iraqi officials said. A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Steve Boylan, said that he knew of three U.S. soldiers wounded in the day's attacks and that none had been reported killed.

Separately, attackers opened fire on a car carrying Iraqi police officers, killing one, and then detonated a car bomb when other officers responded, killing four more people, police said. A separate rocket attack killed two Iraqi civilians.

In Taji, a town just north of Baghdad, men wearing the uniforms of Iraqi security forces dragged 17 men out of their homes, then handcuffed, blindfolded and shot them, news agencies reported.

A U.S. military convoy came under intense attack in the late afternoon, first with a roadside bomb and then, half an hour later, with a car bomb, police said. A reporter watched as U.S. forces traded gunfire with hidden assailants at the scene.

One of the final bombings of the day hit outside the Green Zone, the concrete- and razor-wire barricaded base of U.S. officials and the Iraqi government. There was no immediate official word on casualties.

The estimated death toll of more than 160 made Wednesday the deadliest day of insurgent violence in Baghdad since the United States and its allies invaded Iraq in March 2003. The deadliest day of insurgent violence nationwide was March 2, 2004 , when at least 181 people were killed in mortar and bomb attacks on Shiite shrines in Karbala and Baghdad.

Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, who was visiting Dearborn, Mich., as part of a U.S. tour, condemned the attacks and declared that his government's "rational, political struggle" would prevail over "criminal acts," the Associated Press reported. "I share with the people their sorrow and grief. They are martyrs," Jafari said.

Survivors condemned the insurgents but blamed their government as well. "We voted for Jafari so he can help us get rid of terrorism. He cannot," Hussein Lami, a laborer, said at the site of the first bombing. "He must admit now that he cannot do it" and resign.

"Every day I am losing one of my friends or my relatives," Lami said.

Wednesday's carnage tested the ability of U.S. and Iraqi forces to maintain security shortly before two events that insurgents are widely expected to target: a Shiite pilgrimage this week that is expected to draw millions to the holy city of Karbala, and an Oct. 15 national referendum on Iraq's draft constitution. While voter registration among Sunnis has soared ahead of the vote, Zarqawi has declared that anyone who goes near a polling place is a legitimate target.

Growing political violence in much of the country also threatens what U.S. officials have said is their goal of bringing the insurgency to a level that is manageable by Iraqi forces ahead of any U.S. withdrawal.

At Least 160 Killed In Series Of Bombings (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD -- A spasm of bombs claimed by al Qaeda killed at least 160 persons yesterday, marking a declaration of "all-out war" against Iraq's Shi'ite Muslims by terror leader Abu Musab Zarqawi.

The onslaught of more than a dozen highly coordinated explosions terrorized Baghdad for more than nine hours and left 570 wounded on the capital's bloodiest day since the end of major combat.

The attacks coincided with the Internet posting of an audiotape in which a man identified as Zarqawi declared "all-out war" on Shi'ites, Iraqi troops and the government.

The first attack -- at 6:30 a.m. -- was the deadliest when a suicide car bomb tore through a crowd of day laborers in the predominantly Shi'ite Muslim neighborhood of Kazimiyah.

The bomber set off the explosive after calling the laborers to his small van and enticing them with promises of work, a witness said.

At least 112 persons were killed and more than 200 were wounded, Iraqi Health Ministry officials said.

The attacks came as U.S. and Iraqi forces pressed their offensive against insurgents in the northern city of Tal Afar and along the Euphrates River valley, striking hard at what officials have said were militants sneaking across the border from Syria.

Al Qaeda in Iraq said in a separate Web posting that it launched the attacks, some less than 10 minutes apart, in response to the Tal Afar offensive, which began Saturday and evicted most insurgents from the city.

DOJ_NMG_0005437

"To the nation of Islam, we give you the good news that the battles of revenge for the Sunni people of Tal Afar began yesterday," said the statement. It was not clear why the statement referred to "yesterday."

The audiotape was posted later yesterday. The speaker, introduced as Zarqawi, a Jordanian, said his militant forces would attack any Iraqi they think has cooperated with the Tal Afar offensive.

"If proven that any of [Iraq's] national guards, police or army are agents of the crusaders, they will be killed and his house will demolished or burned -- after evacuating all women and children -- as a punishment," the speaker said.

As the hours ticked by, at least 12 car or roadside bombs shattered what had been a few days of relative calm in Baghdad. Two mortar attacks were reported, and a multitude of gunbattles broke out between U.S. and Iraqi forces and insurgents.

Also yesterday, terrorists killed 17 men -- including Iraqi drivers and construction workers for the U.S. military -- in a Sunni village north of Baghdad before dawn. That raised the death toll in and around the capital yesterday to 169. A senior Health Ministry official said 570 persons were wounded in all.

At least six attacks targeted U.S. forces, Iraqi authorities said. The U.S. military said there were four direct attacks on Americans, with 10 soldiers wounded. No U.S. deaths were reported.

Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, in the United States for the annual U.N. General Assembly meeting, expressed "his personal sorrow for the victims of the attacks," his office said.

In Dearborn, Mich., a Detroit suburb with a large Iraqi population, Mr. al-Jaafari vowed to fight back.

"Those criminals will not run away from our justice system. Our cities, our villages will not welcome them," he said.

Yesterday's blasts coincided with Iraqi lawmakers' announcing the country's draft constitution was in its final form and would be sent to the United Nations for printing and distribution ahead of an Oct. 15 referendum.

Sunni Arabs, who form the core of the insurgency, have vowed to defeat the charter.

The carnage was thought to have produced the second-worst one-day death toll since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

On March 2, 2004, coordinated blasts from suicide bombers, mortars and planted explosives hit Shi'ite shrines in Karbala and Baghdad, killing at least 181 and wounding 573.

Yesterday's bombing was the second tragedy in the Kazimiyah district in two weeks. On Aug. 31, about 950 people were killed during a bridge stampede as tens of thousands of Shi'ite pilgrims headed to a nearby shrine.

Iraqi Insurgents Are A Moving Target (CSM)

By Jill Carroll And Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD AND CAIRO - In the north and west of Iraq Wednesday, troops were wrapping up operations designed to restore government control to insurgent dominated towns, in an effort to deny foreign and local insurgents the "rat-lines" to move men and equipment into Baghdad and other cities to carry out major attacks.

Meanwhile in Baghdad, at least a dozen explosions thundered across the city, with the deadliest a suicide attack that killed at least 114 laborers waiting for jobs in a Shiite neighborhood. In total, at least 152 were killed - the single largest one-day death toll attributed to insurgent attacks in Baghdad.

The contrast between what are being described as largely successful operations against insurgent hotbeds in Tal Afar, Qaim, and Haditha - towns with historic trading links to Syria that the US military says are way-stations for foreign fighters - and ongoing violence across the country, demonstrates the fluidity of Iraq's insurgency against thinly spread US and Iraqi forces.

In particular, the assault on the ethnic-Turkmen town of Tal Afar - where 8,500 US and Iraqi troops, largely drawn from the ethnic Kurdish peshmerga militia, took over the city this week - was aimed at limiting the mobility of Sunni insurgents. "It is a pathway from Syria that pretty historically was a trading route and smuggling route into Iraq," said US military spokesman Lt. Col. Steve Boylan.

An estimated 200 militants were killed and hundreds captured. But as forces moved on the city, the US military said many insurgents simply fled, using a network of tunnels they'd created in advance of the assault. That pattern has become increasingly common since the April assault on Fallujah, where hundreds of insurgents died in the most sustained combat of the war.

Instead of standing up to superior US firepower - particularly air support that drops 500-pound bombs on insurgent positions - insurgents now generally avoid major engagements. Instead of holding their ground, insurgents are counting on US forces to eventually withdraw and on the Iraqi forces left behind not being able to prevent their return.

So far, that approach has worked. This was at least the third major assault on Tal Afar in the past 18 months. As in previous engagements in western Iraqi towns along the Euphrates like Hit, Haditha, and Qaim, the insurgents reasserted themselves when US forces were shifted elsewhere.

Colonel Boylan says that while much of the US effort is focused on shutting off infiltration into Iraq, completely sealing Iraq off isn't likely. "To say it's shutdown is difficult. It's almost impossible to physically shut it down."

That's because of the topography of the desert and expanses of arid plains in along the 270-mile border with Syria, Boylan noted.

"The border is absolutely something you can't seal. I wandered back and forth across those borders in the region for a long, long time where there's supposed to be border guards and desert police, but you just don't see them," says Col. Pat Lang (ret.), a former head of Middle East intelligence analysis for the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency.

Colonel Lang says that when the US masses troops, as in Tal Afar, it's always going to win, but that it doesn't have enough troops to deny insurgents sanctuary elsewhere, essentially shifting the problem around.

"The insurgents are increasingly creating redoubt areas, the kinds of places we can't go without stripping people from elsewhere and entering in large numbers," says Lang. "Therefore the insurgents own it 95 percent of the time. The object of the drill for the guerrillas is not to fight [US forces] head-to-head, but to wait until they have an advantage."

That's what happened in much of the Western portion of the Sunni-dominated Anbar province this year. In a major operation there last March, US Marines swept through Hit and other cities, and encountered little resistance as insurgents melted away. At the time, Marine commanders fretted about what would happen when they rotated out at the end of the month, and were replaced by other Marine units with about 1,000 fewer troops.

Officers and enlisted men at the time said they worried that their replacements would be in greater danger because of their smaller size. Roads wouldn't be patrolled as often to keep them clear of concealed bombs. At least 40 US troops have been killed in Western Anbar since the start of August.

And in Tal Afar, a city of 200,000 people, there are other concerns. The city's mostly Turkomen population views the Kurds as their ancestral enemies, so ethnic tension could be ratcheted up after using mostly Kurdish militias to attack the city.

Walid Sharika, a Turkman member of the national assembly and on a government committee focusing in Tal Afar, says that while he's glad the assault took place, ethnic divisions there have been widened.

"This should have happened four or five months ago because Tal Afar is one of the most important terrorism bases in all the world. I believe for a lot of problems in Iraq the source is Tal Afar," he says.

Even so, "more than half the city is destroyed and there are a lot of refugees living in a camp and we lost children and elderly," says Sharika.

Tal Afar Turning Point? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Only weeks ago -- until Katrina stole the headlines -- Washington was deep in the grip of yet another of its "quagmire" panics about Iraq. We don't want to make the opposite mistake of over-optimism. But the recent Iraqi victory in the battle of Tal Afar could be a turning point in the war against the terrorists who slaughtered more than 150 innocents (mostly poor Shiite laborers) in multiple bombings yesterday.

In recent days Iraqi forces -- yes, Iraqi forces -- have led the largest urban assault there since the liberation of Fallujah last November. Meanwhile, Iraq and the United States are finally ratcheting up the pressure on Syria, with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad saying "all options" -- including military force -- "are on the table" when it comes to stopping terrorist infiltration from that country. Without Syria's help, the insurgency would be seriously weakened.

There are good reasons to believe the current operation in Tal Afar -- a largely Turkoman city near the Syrian border -- will be a model of things to come. Previous attempts to clean the terrorists out of Tal Afar and other cities in northern and western Iraq have too often seen the insurgents melt away only to return when the U.S. spearhead withdrew. This time Iraqis are leading the fight and, most important, many will stay so the people of Tal Afar can begin to believe they can live free of terrorist intimidation.

As of last night, a force of about 5,000 Iraqis and 3,800 Americans had killed at least 157 terrorists, detained 440 suspects, and discovered 34 weapons caches, all while suffering minimal casualties. "The terrorists are losing their morale. They couldn't resist as they did in Fallujah," Iraqi President Jalal Talabani told us yesterday in an interview in New York, where he is attending the United Nations General Assembly.

The Tal Afar operation calls into question the contention of war critics like Senator Joe Biden that there are only a handful of Iraqi troops capable of meaningful operations. In fact, U.S. commanders classify about 40 battalions -- roughly 750 soldiers in each -- as "fully independent" or able to fight "in the lead."

A U.S. officer with detailed knowledge offered us this assessment: "The Tal Afar operation has been a sweeping success for the Iraqi Security Forces in many ways. There is an Iraqi Army Brigade headquarters with four infantry battalions, a Special Police Commando Brigade headquarters with two battalions, and an Army Transportation battalion in the fight up there. The Police Commandos and one of the Army battalions were flown there by the Iraqi Air Force's own C-130 fleet executing their first combat support missions." Eight Iraqi soldiers and one American have died in the offensive.

Similar Iraqi-led clean-and-garrison operations might well be performed in other problematic cities like Ramadi. This is a classic form of anti-insurgency warfare that has the potential to narrow the range of operations for the terrorists. President Talabani told us that about 50,000-60,000 Iraqi troops can be considered "well trained," and the number is growing. They will eventually replace Americans, though we hope not before more Tal Afar operations can be undertaken.

Whether those Iraqi troops are competently led and deployed will depend on a political process that includes a constitutional referendum and another parliamentary election before the year is out. But the victory in Tal Afar is the best sign of anti-insurgent progress since the Marine sweep through Fallujah.

A Family, Torn Apart, Pulls Together (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 14 -- The hunt for one of the missing young men of the Rahim family ended at a refrigerator truck in a hospital back lot.

"He's gone! He's gone!" an aunt of 19-year-old Saif Kadhum Rahim cried, striking herself in the face with her open palms at the sight of her nephew. His bare, charred legs protruded from under a white shroud in the back of the truck.

"My brother! My brother!" said one of Saif's eight younger siblings, tilting his head back and grasping his hair. With barely a pause, the men of the family moved in around the stunned boy and transferred Saif's body from steel truck to wooden coffin, then loaded the coffin into a van that would take Saif on what would be his next-to-last ride.

Bedlam was bubbling up in Iraq's capital all day Wednesday, bursting through the thin surface of what passes for routine. Families rushed to find loved ones and ambulances sped to aid survivors, even as new bombings sent more waves of frantic searchers into the chaos. Towers of black smoke rose into the sky as police turned away cars from hospitals, fearing secondary attacks that might target medical centers treating the bombing victims.

Members of Shiite cleric Moqtada Sadr's militia and Iraqi police officers sped back and forth in pickup trucks on the city's highways and through the poor neighborhoods of the Shiite majority. They waved pistols and AK-47 assault rifles at nothing. "Explosions! Explosions!" a Shiite militiaman shouted, pounding the metal roof of a car to get it to turn back from the site of one blast.

In their van, the men of the Rahim family drove across the city, rushing to take the body of Saif home, to search for his 17-year-old cousin Haider, who was lost and presumed dead, and to tend to a 24-year-old cousin who lay wounded in a hospital.

All three were victims of a suicide bombing in Baghdad's Kadhimiyah district, the first of at least 10 bombings and other attacks during the day. They were with several other relatives -- some sitting in Saif's minibus taxi, some stepping away for tea at a sidewalk booth -- when a suicide attacker blew up a four-door Volkswagen packed with explosives.

At least 112 people were killed, most of them the Shiite neighborhood's day laborers, who were gathered at a traffic circle to wait for work. Survivors said the bomber lured the men closer with offers of jobs before detonating his payload. Hussein Ali, another cousin in the extensive Rahim family, said the workers, nearly impoverished, were targeted simply "because they were Shiite."

Al Qaeda in Iraq, the insurgent group led by Jordanian-born Abu Musab Zarqawi, issued a statement praising the attacks. The group, dominated by foreign Sunni Muslim extremists like Zarqawi, draws much of its support from Iraqi Sunnis resentful of the new political dominance of the country's Shiite majority.

The Sunni insurgents bear "hatred against us," Ali said. "This is a war against the Shiites."

A year ago this month, insurgents shot and killed Saif's 50-year-old father on a street in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad, his family said. One of Saif's uncles died the same way four months ago, they said.

From his father, Saif inherited the minibus taxi and responsibility for his mother, six sisters and two younger brothers, the family said. The family on Wednesday passed around a photo of Saif standing by the black minibus, twisting a bare foot out of his sandal, an uncertain breadwinner.

Saif earned about $7 a day driving laborers to and from work sites. On Wednesday, one of his cousins, alerted by a phone call from the family that there had been a bombing at the traffic circle where Saif worked, sped to the scene. He said he found Saif dead, still inside his minibus. He carried the body to the hospital, where it was stored in the refrigerator truck.

After Saif's body had been retrieved and driven home, the men of the family gathered silently, fingering worry beads under framed photos of family members killed in the insurgency. Posters depicting the revered founder of Shiite Islam, cradling children or waving a sword, hung under broken chandeliers on thinly painted concrete walls.

The men waited for others to finish searching the morgues for the body of Haider, the missing cousin, so that the family could drive him and Saif together to the Shiite holy city of Najaf for burial. In accordance with Islamic tradition, Saif would be buried the same day he was killed, his body headed to burial less than six hours after he last walked out his front door.

"In another country, if everything turned upside down, everyone would talk about" Saif's death, Ali, 27, said as he waited. "Here, so many died, and no one cares."

One of Saif's uncles, Falih Kehait, called over an 8-year-old boy and kissed him lightly. The boy had hopped off the minibus just before it exploded.

In another room, away from the men, Saif's six sisters wailed. Kneeling and supported by other women, the sisters tore at their hair, cried with open mouths and pulled down their black clothing to slap their flesh until it burned red. Little girls, one in a Mickey Mouse abaya and others in pajamas, watched wide-eyed against the walls of the back room.

Asked who would take care of Rahim's eight brothers and sisters now, Ali said, "God will keep them."

In a doorway, a neighbor, Fatima Yassim, spoke softly: "What you are seeing now is so little compared to the tragedy that has happened."

"But what shall we do?" she asked, her hands on the shoulders of a girl with a bow in her brown hair. "Shall we prevent our daughters from going to school? We are afraid even to send our sons to work."

The insurgents "want our people to kill each other," she concluded. "But we are Muslims. We are one religion. We love [the Sunnis] so much."

In the front room, the men wavered between returning Saif's body to the morgue so they could resume the hunt for Haider and taking Saif alone to Najaf for burial. Kehait, the uncle, finally decided he and three others would make the journey to Najaf and trust militiamen and the police to protect the Shiite families who would be streaming toward the holy city.

"Only us four," he ordered. "If we are attacked, only we will be killed."

A girl of 6 or 7 years, a relative of Saif's, watched silently as the men wrapped his coffin in a rose velour blanket and tied it to the roof of a car. Her chin trembled uncontrollably.

No women, a man of the family ordered. Even as he spoke, new wailing signaled Saif's mother emerging from the privacy of mourning in her home. Held up by other women, the twice-bereaved woman collapsed, throwing the dirt of the street in her face.

Men lashing down the coffin stopped, buried their faces in their hands and wept, shoulders shaking.

DOJ_NMG_0005441

No women, an uncle insisted again, turning back the sisters as the minibus started up. The women poured from the house. The uncle relented slightly, and Saif's mother pushed herself inside for the ride to Najaf.

CBS Asks Why U.S. Imprisons Its Iraqi Hire (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

For 25-year-old CBS cameraman Abdul Amir Younes Hussein, being shot and wounded by American forces in Iraq was just the beginning.

On April 5, Mr. Hussein, a freelancer employed by the network in the northern city of Mosul, went to the scene of a car bombing to film the aftermath. He was standing near an armed insurgent when U.S. forces opened fire, killing the militant and wounding him lightly. The military released a statement that expressed regret about the incident and said it was under investigation.

Three days later, the military released a second statement saying that Mr. Hussein had been "detained for alleged insurgent activity" and there was probable cause to believe he posed "an imperative threat to coalition forces."

That statement has sparked a bitter legal and political dispute with Viacom Inc.'s CBS, which has lobbied senior military and civilian officials to try to win the cameraman's release. Mr. Hussein, who has been unable to see his family or his lawyer since being detained, faces a hearing today in Baghdad that will determine whether he will be released.

CBS News, which insists that its cameraman is innocent, says it has spent tens of thousands of dollars gathering evidence in Iraq that could be presented at review board hearings for Mr. Hussein and hiring a Washington law firm to press his case with the Pentagon, Congress and the State Department. But so far, those efforts have proved fruitless, and the network is publicly discussing aspects of the case for the first time.

"The cameraman has now been detained for more than five months, and no one concerned has been informed of the evidence against him," the network said in a statement yesterday. "We continue to request that information and hope it will be provided and his status be decided, one way or another, in a fair and timely manner."

The military defends its handling of the case and says Mr. Hussein remains under suspicion. The journalist has been detained "based on information that he was affiliated with anti-Iraqi and anti-coalition forces and engaged in anti-coalition activity," Lt. Col. Guy Rudisill, a military spokesman, said in a statement. He said the activity included "recruiting and inciting Iraqi nationals to violence against coalition forces and participating in attacks against coalition forces."

Mr. Hussein's story illustrates the difficulty of reporting in Iraq. The Committee to Protect Journalists, a nonprofit organization, describes the country "as the most dangerous place in the world to work as a journalist," noting that 23 journalists were killed there last year and an additional 15 have died so far this year. Because the dangers to Westerners are so great, foreign media outlets frequently rely on Iraqis hired locally to supplement their staff reporting. The Iraqis travel around the country far more than the Westerners and are routinely targeted by insurgents or involved in accidental shootings by Americans. On June 30, for instance, Knight Ridder reporter Yasser Salihee was killed on his day off by a U.S. Army sniper.

Western media organizations increasingly complain that their Iraqi hires are routinely detained by the U.S. military without charges. In addition to Mr. Hussein, at least four Iraqi journalists -- including two cameramen for the Reuters news agency -- remain in American custody. In an interview yesterday with Reuters, Iraqi Justice Minister Abdul Hussein Shandal criticized such detentions and said journalists should be able to film attacks and interview insurgents without fear of being arrested.

CBS describes Mr. Hussein as a timid young man who was so afraid of coming into contact with insurgents that he was warned at least once that he would be fired unless he went into the field more often. The network says it found Mr. Hussein through its local correspondent in Tikrit, an employee who had been on its payroll for two years. It says Mr. Hussein was a graduate of Mosul University where he belonged to a student group that organized a reception for Mosul's new governor that was funded with American money and attended by several U.S. military officers. Mr. Hussein, who is unmarried, lived with his family in a predominantly Kurdish neighborhood where they are some of the only Arabs.

The military's reversal of its initial description of Mr. Hussein's shooting was the first of several occasions it changed course in its handling of the journalist, according to both the military and CBS News. After its public statement describing Mr. Hussein as a security threat, the military told CBS News that it would allow network employees to meet with him and recover the camera and videotape seized from him after the shooting, the network says. CBS immediately dispatched London-based producer Randall Joyce, who arrived at an American base in Mosul on April 15.

During their meetings with the CBS News producer, however, military officials refused to say where Mr. Hussein was being held or who was interrogating him, the network says. They told Mr. Joyce that he couldn't meet with Mr. Hussein on security grounds, and couldn't recover the camera or duplicate the videotape because they were evidence, the network says. When he asked for an update on Mr. Hussein's health, the military declined, citing a domestic U.S. law barring the government from releasing health information on American citizens, according to the network.

Afterward, the military moved Mr. Hussein to Abu Ghraib prison but said it would allow CBS to submit evidence to a military panel that would decide during a July hearing whether to keep Mr. Hussein in custody or release him, according to CBS News. The network gathered evidence -- including affidavits from a relative that works as an Iraqi police officer and from other Iraqi journalists in Mosul -- asserting that Mr. Hussein was at his university at the time of the attack, didn't arrive at the scene of the April 5 bombing until almost 30 minutes after the explosion, and had no known ties to the insurgents. It sent its findings to the military, but the hearing was canceled and the military told the network that it was instead submitting Mr. Hussein's case to the Iraqi legal system for prosecution.

In his statement, Lt. Col. Rudisill said the hearing wasn't held because the panel's attorney "found there was sufficient admissible evidence to successfully prosecute Mr. Hussein for unlawful possession of explosives and aiding and abetting armed attacks against coalition forces."

The Iraqis declined to prosecute, but instead of releasing Mr. Hussein the military took him back into its own custody, where he has remained.

In a letter to CBS News reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, Pentagon General Counsel William J. Haynes said the Iraqis' decision not to prosecute didn't necessarily mean Mr. Hussein would be freed. He noted that the military panel used both classified and unclassified information, while the Iraqi legal system based its decision solely on the unclassified information that could be presented in open court. "Such a determination [by the Iraqis] does not preclude the possibility that sufficient evidence exists ... to conclude that Mr. Hussein should continue to be detained for imperative reasons of security," he wrote.

According to a Coalition Provisional Authority decree still legally binding in Iraq, captives like Mr. Hussein must have their detentions formally reviewed by the Combined Review and Release Board within six months. Since Mr. Hussein was arrested in early April, the review by the panel -- which includes three American military officers and a total of six representatives of the Iraqi ministries of Justice, Interior and Human Rights -- must be held by early October.

In Mr. Hussein's case, the questions about innocence or involvement in insurgent activity are supposed to be answered today during the scheduled meeting of the panel, which will take place behind closed doors in Baghdad without the presence of Mr. Hussein, his Iraqi attorney, or representatives of CBS News. Depending on the panel's determination, he will either be released or consigned to potentially indefinite captivity. CBS News says it plans to pay Mr. Hussein's salary to his family as long as he remains in custody.

Detention Of Iraqi Employees Angers Western News Media (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 14 - On April 5, Abdul Ameer Younis Hussein, an Iraqi cameraman for CBS News, was struck in the thigh by an American sniper's bullet while filming the aftermath of a suicide bombing in Mosul. As he recovered in a military hospital, the Americans arrested him. They later said the film in his camera suggested he was working for insurgents.

More than five months later, Mr. Hussein is still in an American military prison. The Iraqi criminal authorities have reviewed his case and declined to prosecute him. Colleagues who were with him that day have produced affidavits supporting his innocence. The American military has not released any evidence against him, despite repeated requests for information by CBS producers, lawyers and even the network's president, Andrew Heyward.

Mr. Hussein's case exemplifies a quandary faced by Western news organizations here. Their own reporters are mostly confined to fortified compounds and military bases. As a result, they are forced to rely on Iraqis, who work in increasingly dangerous settings, where the line between observer and participant is not always clear.

Western bureau chiefs concede that they cannot be certain the people they hire do not have links with insurgents, though they do their best to weed out such people.

One thing is clear: dozens of Iraqis who carry out assignments for the news organizations have been detained while on the job, and sometimes released weeks or months later with no explanation. American forces have mistakenly killed a dozen others, including a soundman working for Reuters who was shot dead by a sniper on Aug. 28.

Some of those cases raise a broader question: how close can Iraqi reporters get to insurgents without being considered the enemy? American commanders often suggest that reporters who are tipped off about an attack are automatically implicated, but Iraqis often take a different view.

"Maybe some are working with insurgents, but many others just get a call from someone saying, 'There will be clashes,' " said Ibrahim Saraji, the director of the Iraqi Journalists' Rights Defense Organization, formed last year after the fatal shooting of two Arab journalists in Iraq. "It doesn't mean they are an insurgent."

Pentagon lawyers have told CBS that Mr. Hussein is being held on classified evidence, according to letters sent to the network that were provided to The New York Times. The military has released statements saying that Mr. Hussein tested positive for explosive residue, and citing accusations that he "had knowledge of future terrorist attacks." It is not clear who made the accusations, or whether the residue may have resulted from his proximity to the scene.

Mr. Hussein's friends and relatives - who have not been able to visit him in prison - say the military has not interviewed them or searched his home, standard procedure with people suspected of having ties to insurgents. CBS executives say the network has investigated the incident and has no reason to believe that its cameraman was working with insurgents.

Clearly, it is often difficult for American soldiers to tell a reporter from a combatant in Iraq's chaos, with no uniforms or clear battle lines. The fact that insurgents routinely film and distribute scenes of their attacks makes it even harder. The military cannot afford to give journalists special treatment under those circumstances, said Lt. Col. Steven A. Boylan, a military spokesman in Baghdad.

But Western bureau chiefs say the military often seems to arrest their Iraqi employees merely for getting too close to the action - in effect, for doing their jobs too well. When journalists are killed, the bureau chiefs say, the military often does little more than a cursory investigation.

"They seem to have moved to the view that everyone in a conflict area with a camera is a potential terrorist," said Alastair Macdonald, the Reuters bureau chief in Baghdad. "The burden of proof is on them to prove that they're not."

A number of Reuters Iraqi employees have been detained by the American military, including three who said after being released that they were abused by American interrogators while being detained in Falluja last year. Ali al-Mashadani, a Reuters cameraman, was detained in Ramadi on Aug. 8 and remains in American custody. Mr. Macdonald said he had seen no evidence against Mr. Mashadani or clear accusations, and had no reason to believe he had any insurgent connections.

Iraqi employees with many other companies, including CNN, Associated Press Television News and Agence France-Presse have been detained for long periods in the past year. But some companies declined to comment about the detentions, saying they feared that doing so might harm their relations with the military.

Iraqi reporters often point out that they routinely receive death threats from insurgents, who have killed more reporters than the United States military by far. But they also say the military's suspicion is making it almost impossible for them to work in some areas.

"The American military has intelligence sources, but they don't seem to understand that we have sources too," said Maher Hassan al-Thanoon, 36, who has carried out assignments for Reuters in Mosul for 18 months. "They may just be people who live in insurgent neighborhoods. It doesn't mean they support what the insurgents are doing."

Western bureau chiefs also say that after being detained by American forces, their Iraqi employees often disappear into a void, where nothing can be learned about the case against them and their legal status is unclear. Mr. Hussein, for instance, was initially scheduled for a hearing with the Combined Review and Release Board, a nine-member panel formed to review detention cases. It is made up of three American military officials and six Iraqi government officials from the Justice, Human Rights and Interior Ministries.

But before the board could hold a hearing his case was transferred to the authority of the Iraqi central criminal court. He remained in American custody, though. The Iraqi criminal authorities reviewed the case, though they had not been provided with the classified part of it, and declined to prosecute it.

Jurisdiction over Mr. Hussein was then transferred back to the combined board, which is scheduled to hear his case on Thursday.

His status seemed uncertain in other ways, too. When CBS officials first asked about his health after he was shot and detained, military officials declined to answer, citing American laws on medical privacy.

On Wednesday, Iraq's justice minister, Abdul Hussein Shandal, criticized the detentions of Iraqi journalists in an interview with Reuters, saying he wanted to change a United Nations resolution that gives American troops immunity from Iraqi law. He said journalists were not free to report on all sides of the conflict.

He also dismissed American claims that his ministry had an equal say in detentions, suggesting that the American military controlled the Combined Review and Release Board.

Military officials in Iraq contend that some Iraqi cameramen and photographers show up at attacks so promptly that they must have had advance notice. Colonel Boylan said he knew of two Iraqi journalists in detention whose film footage indicated that they had filmed several attacks on one day, from the start.

Mr. Macdonald and other Western bureau chiefs say they have seen no evidence of such cases. They also say the frequent repetition of that accusation is irresponsible because it makes soldiers more likely to be aggressive with Iraqi journalists at attack scenes.

Afghan Ballots Carry Mullahs, Jihadis, Women (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

TORKHAM, AFGHANISTAN - A mullah, a feminist, a jihadi, and a communist: It sounds like the start of an Afghan joke, but instead, it is the makings of Afghanistan's first-ever elected parliament.

These are some of the 5,700 candidates running for seats in parliament and provincial assemblies around Afghanistan. Their diversity is both an endorsement of democracy, and a challenge to its very existence.

When Afghans line up to vote on Sunday, choosing 249 men and women from these thousands, they will be selecting from candidates who hold conflicting views over concepts as fundamental as the very definition of democracy itself.

"This is a project of decades and generations, not months and years," says Kit Spence, a senior analyst at the National Democratic Institute in Washington. "The good thing is that people are buying in to the concept in a strong way."

Kabul and most towns are papered over with campaign posters, a sign that the Afghans are taking this election seriously. It is the presence of so many faces - of men and women - that serves as a striking reminder of how much has changed since the days of the Taliban, when depictions of the human face were forbidden.

Yet this campaign has also seen spates of violence, reminders that Afghanistan is still emerging from 23 years of occupation and civil war. Six candidates and four election workers have been killed thus far, and scores continue to receive death threats. In Uruzgan Province, Taliban fighters killed seven people for carrying voting cards, according to Gov. Jan Mohammad Khan.

Safiya Sadiqi, an energetic liberal candidate from the conservative province of Nangrahar, was attacked with Kalashnikovs, grenades, and rockets last week. None of her campaign workers were hurt, but some villagers were injured. She now travels less openly and with government gunmen.

Yet her moderate Islamic, antiwarlord message remains as strident as before.

"Those people who rob you, who kill your children, if they give you food, will you give him your vote?" she says to a small group in the town of Torkham, mocking a nearby rally of a warlord where some 5,000 people have gathered with the promise of free food. "If you elect him ... the winner will be the one who killed your rights."

DOJ_NMG_0005445

Perhaps her bravest words, and the ones that stick in the craw of many ethnic Pashtuns here, are when Mrs. Sadiqi - an official from the Ministry of Rural Development - talks of the cruelty of many Afghan traditions toward women.

She describes seeing a pregnant woman being driven to the hospital. According to tradition, the male relatives sat in front, and the pregnant woman was forced to sit, obviously under great pain, in the trunk. "I asked the men, how can they do this? This is not right. Show me where in the Koran it says you should do this."

The crowd of around 300 men clap politely. Sadiqi's case may seem hopeless, but she is probably one of the strongest female candidates in her province, and is seen as a likely winner of one of the four seats here that are reserved for women.

But if she wins, so will many others with completely different visions.

Some, like former Taliban deputy interior minister Mullah Khaksar, want to bring back sharia, where major decisions are made according to Islamic scripture, as interpreted by religious scholars.

Some, like Kabir Ranjbar - a former advisor to pro-Soviet President Najibullah - want to bring a more equitable distribution of resources to the poor, borrowing pages from the former Soviet Union.

Some say that Afghanistan must be ruled by technocrats, while others, like mujahideen leaders Younus Qanooni and Abdulrab Rasul Sayaaf, say it must be ruled by those who fought the jihad, no matter their educational achievement.

Many, perhaps the majority, pose as opponents of President Hamid Karzai, and some demand the removal of US troops as a sign that Afghanistan can now run itself.

With such ideological diversity, parliament is likely to be much better at staking out positions than in getting anything done.

"Today, power is still held by warlords," says Mr. Ranjbar, the head of the Union of Lawyers of Afghanistan, and a parliamentary candidate from Kabul. "In the new parliament, most of the time will be spent getting your own people into the cabinet, and this fighting will take Afghanistan backward."

Meanwhile, high up in the Paghman valley above Kabul, a very different man with a very different vision for Afghanistan is speaking in a mosque full of some 3,000 men. Surrounded by gunmen, Abdulrab Rasul Sayaaf strokes his long white beard and speaks of a glorious future for Afghanistan, led by "men of good Islamic character" who have fought nearly 23 years to get rid of men like Ranjbar.

"Those who fought for the freedom of this country are worthy to take part in its government," says Sayaaf, after a long discourse on Islamic government. "If the mujahideen are not able to act in a political way, those people who looted Afghanistan before ... will play the same roles."

Almost everyone agrees that the first few months, if not years, of Afghanistan's experiment with democracy will be messy. The fact that so many political factions remain armed makes it possible for political disputes to turn deadly.

Sadiqi has survived one such attack, but says she will press on. "I trust in my vision," she says. "The day before yesterday, they attacked us, but we are here today."

Election Gives Group That Battled Taliban Chance At A Comeback (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BAZARAK, Afghanistan -- The green-domed mausoleum housing the tomb of Afghanistan's legendary guerrilla leader Ahmed Shah Massoud sits atop a windblown cliff with a breathtaking view of the lush Panjshir Valley. This was Massoud's northern redoubt over two decades of fighting against a succession of enemies, beginning with invading troops from the Soviet Union and ending with the extremist Taliban militia.

But the vista seemed lost on the hundreds of grim-faced men who trudged up the peak on a recent morning to pay their respects on the fourth anniversary of Massoud's assassination by two al Qaeda suicide bombers posing as journalists -- a strike that came just two days before the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States.

"If Massoud were still alive, we would not be living like this," proclaimed an enormous black banner carried by the crowd, as a handful of parliamentary candidates looked on solemnly.

"We feel so sad and alone," said Nader Khan, 22, wiping away tears. Khan is a former mujaheddin, or holy warrior, in Massoud's militia who is now unemployed. "Massoud loved the mujaheddin. Today, nobody cares for us."

DOJ_NMG_0005446

As leading members of a coalition of northern ethnic militias that joined forces with the United States to topple the Taliban rulers after the Sept. 11 attacks, Massoud's Panjshiri successors were a dominant force in Afghanistan's first post-Taliban government. But over the last year and a half, the ethnic Tajiks of the Panjshir Valley have watched with dismay as President Hamid Karzai, a member of Afghanistan's majority Pashtun ethnic group, has replaced some of their most prominent leaders with Pashtuns and welcomed former Taliban officials back into the country as part of a reconciliation program.

Now, many Panjshiris see Afghanistan's parliamentary elections, to be held Sunday, as their chance at a comeback.

As in the rest of Afghanistan, campaign posters with pictures of the contenders have been affixed to every conceivable surface of the Panjshir Valley -- shop doors, tree branches, even the rusting Soviet tanks that still litter the area. But here, where Massoud's image has become synonymous with the past Tajik glory, many of the advertisements also feature portraits of "the Lion of the Panjshir," as Massoud is widely known. His pictures are as large as, if not larger, than those of the candidates themselves. One candidate, Saleh Registani, is handing out an entire brochure of moody photographs of himself with Massoud during the years of the Soviet war.

Speaking in the tidy, modest living room of his house about a mile from Massoud's tomb, Registani, 42, complained that "right now the role of non-Pashtuns is too weak. We want the government to be a broad-based government for all Afghans." Most of the policies he proposes involve amending the constitution to transfer authority from the presidency to the provinces, a move that would considerably enhance the power of Afghanistan's ethnic minorities.

Registani may get his way. Yonus Qanooni, a polished former deputy to Massoud and the runner-up in presidential elections last October, is leading a coalition of 14 parties fielding approximately 500 candidates from provinces across the country for Sunday's vote -- the first legislative elections in Afghanistan since the 1960s. Many candidates who are not officially part of the bloc say they also support Qanooni.

Their bid presents a double-edged challenge for Karzai, who has enjoyed relative freedom to maneuver since he won the presidency with 55 percent of the vote: If Qanooni and his allies win a majority of seats, the president will likely face a highly combative parliament. If Qanooni's bloc fails to make a strong showing, Karzai may have to contend with the wrath of a sizable swath of voters convinced that the election was stolen.

Although international observers signed off on the results of last year's presidential election, Qanooni and many of his supporters still maintain that he was the true victor.

"I only accepted the results for the sake of national stability," Qanooni said in a recent interview.

Foreign election officials have privately expressed concern that Qanooni's recent complaints about the vote-counting procedures planned for the legislative elections are an attempt to lay the groundwork for claiming fraud again if he is unhappy with the results.

Interviews with registered voters from several villages in Panjshir suggest that Qanooni would find a receptive audience for his concerns.

"This is their last chance," Del Agha, 30, a wiry, sandy-haired veteran of Massoud's militia, warned darkly. "If they steal our votes again, it will be time for us mujaheddin to do something."

He spoke from his guard hut at a munitions depot next to a rushing river at the foot of a narrow valley. Around him were stacks upon stacks of forest green ammunition boxes, alongside several dozen shipping containers packed with small arms.

The arms and ammunition should have been sent to the capital, Kabul, months ago under a U.N.-run program to demobilize armed groups in Afghanistan. However, while the militia's leaders have handed over about 150 heavy weapon pieces to the government -- including tanks and Scud missiles -- they have so far proved reluctant to relinquish their ammunition stocks, according to U.N. officials.

Agha said he understood his superiors' reluctance to comply. A fighter since the age of 17, Agha said he remained haunted by memories of war: the back-breaking weight of the rockets he used to carry across freezing mountain passes, the eyes of a wounded enemy fighter his comrades urged him to shoot at point-blank range, the terror he felt as his truck plummeted down a steep ravine one night, and the pain of multiple surgeries in India to repair his spine.

The thought of handing control of the weapons amassed during those years to the central government fills him with bitterness.

DOJ_NMG_0005447

"Most of those officials were off having fun in European capitals while my brothers were dying," he said.

The Panjshiris' resentment is compounded by their impression that they have received less foreign aid than southern and eastern provinces that were former strongholds of the Taliban.

Western observers acknowledge that there is some truth to these complaints. For instance, while the United States spent $190 million to build a road connecting Kabul to the southern city of Kandahar in 2004, work on a $26 million U.S.-funded project to pave the narrow main road through the Panjshir Valley did not start until last month. Officials said the delay was caused by a plan, since scrapped, to use the project to train Afghan officials and companies in road-building.

Also, because former fighters in the Panjshir were slow to disarm, they did not receive the financial compensation and job training called for in the program as quickly as counterparts in other provinces.

But analysts also say that the Panjshiris' sense of grievance is overstated.

Last month, for example, the U.S. military agreed to contribute an additional $4 million to the Panjshir road project. And this year, the government declared the valley a province, granting it separate representation in the new parliament even though its population and land area are far smaller than those of many existing provinces.

Also, while Karzai has sidelined top Panjshiri leaders such as the former defense minister and vice president, Mohammed Fahim, and the former head of national intelligence, Muhammad Arif Sarwari, many other Panjshiris remain in prominent positions -- including Foreign Minister Abdullah, army chief Bismillah Khan and the new head of intelligence, Amralluah Saleh.

"In fact, I think you'll find that the top positions are way oversubscribed by Panjshiris given their percentage in the population," said a foreign diplomat who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Still, the diplomat said, whatever the outcome of the elections, the government will have a strong interest in placating Panjshir's residents for some time to come. "In a place where there are tens of thousands of tons of weapons, it's not a good idea to have people alienated from the government," he said.

New Generation Of Afghan Voters Is Finding Its Voice (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 11 - Late in the afternoon here the streets are full of young men, pouring out of private classes that teach English and computer skills or that offer the chance to catch up on years of missed schooling during two decades of war. With books under their arms, the young men jump on their bicycles or head home on foot across the dusty roads and parks.

"We don't want anything special; the only thing we want is the atmosphere and facilities to be educated," Abdul Rahim, 18, said after emerging from an English class. Another student, Abdul Hadi, 28, said, "We do hope that finally we will have a capable Parliament and they can make facilities for studying."

The young people of Afghanistan stand out in this already industrious nation as particularly motivated and politically aware and are seen by some here as an important constituency in the coming parliamentary elections, on Sunday.

Half of the population is estimated to be under 30, said Amena Afzali, who heads the new Ministry of Youth and Sports.

"They have initiative and a readiness to learn - that is obvious," she said. "We want the desires of young people to be listened to."

An estimated 70 to 80 candidates under age 30 are running for the Wolesi Jirga, the lower house of Parliament, where the minimum age is 25; about 150 are under 35. That is relatively few of the 5,800 candidates, yet it is raising hopes that a new generation of leaders will start to emerge in this war-ravaged country.

"I don't like the long beards," said Khaleda, 27, a teacher and mother of four who uses only one name, alluding to religious conservatives. "We want young people, enlightened people, and a new generation."

Candidates are picking up the message. "A lot of our members are the new generation," said Jamil Karzai, 30, a second cousin of President Hamid Karzai and leader of the National Youth Solidarity Party of Afghanistan. His party is fielding 25 candidates in parliamentary and provincial council elections, but he says he would be happy to win four seats in the lower house.

"This Parliament will be mixed up like a vegetable soup," he said. "We will have tribal leaders, warlords, drug lords, but also democratic new faces and policies."

"What I have heard from the people - and I have visited a lot of provinces in the past six months and daily meet about 100 people - they want new faces. They say: 'What has been tried is tried. We tried these guys and they failed.' "

At a rally of young supporters, Muhammad Yunus Qanooni, 46, who finished second in the presidential race and is now hoping to win a large bloc in Parliament, called on his audience to vote for people who could speak for them. "If you choose those representatives who support the new generation, you will not suffer from poor education," he said.

Like most of their elders, younger adults want security, good educational systems and a good health system, in that order, Mr. Karzai said. Despite his relationship to the president, he criticized the government, saying it had in some cases appointed corrupt and incompetent governors and police chiefs and allowed the parliamentary candidacies of many figures whom human rights organizations accused of abuses.

Issues like letting young people decide their own futures, and even select a spouse, will have to wait, he said. "First you have to prepare people to listen to you about this, then later introduce it. It needs years."

A dozen young people interviewed in Kabul overwhelmingly said their priority was improving education, in particular school and university facilities and teaching standards, followed by creating jobs. They also cited the same concerns as their parents: government corruption, security and the pace of reconstruction.

"There are people who cannot feed themselves; there are no factories, no jobs," said Qais, 17, an assistant in one of Kabul's new perfumer shops, who said he planned to vote even though the minimum voting age is 18.

About half of those interviewed said they would vote as their fathers advised, while the others said they would make their own decisions.

"I will decide as I want," said one student, Hedayat, 19, who missed five years of schooling but wants to study law. "Maybe my father does not have the complete information about young people. I will vote for someone who can understand."

"It is because of the views of our fathers' generation that this country is like this. They did not want peace. They were fighting each other. There are a lot of things that we want, that they don't even know about."

He added: "The young generation wants to be equal with the youth of other countries. We have people who are engineers in Afghanistan but they don't even know how to use computers. We want to be the same as other countries."

Female Candidate Sees Election As 'A New Beginning' (WT)

By Carmen Gentile

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Jamilah Mujahid, who hopes to win one of 68 seats set aside for women in Afghanistan's parliament, view's Sunday's election as a turning point for her war-ravaged nation.

Among Mrs. Mujahid's priorities if elected would be education for women, especially those who are behind the learning curve because they grew up under the Taliban regime, which prohibited girls from going to school.

"The Taliban and others are still against women in positions of power because they know that once we get power, we will pursue equal rights for all women," said Mrs. Mujahid, who is favored to win a seat in Wardak province.

Some female candidates have reported being harassed and intimidated on the campaign circuit, particularly in rural Afghanistan, where restrictions on women are deep-seated and enforced by Taliban supporters and tribal warlords.

A longtime radio and TV personality here, Mrs. Mujahid called Sunday's scheduled parliamentary and provincial elections "a new beginning for Afghanistan."

Afghanistan has set aside more than one-quarter of its 249 parliamentary seats exclusively for women.

According to electoral law governing the vote, the top female vote-getters in each of Afghanistan's provinces will be awarded seats in the Wolesi Jirga, or House of People.

"Even though the law guarantees women a position in the parliament, they are still going to receive support at the pollsþ" said Najiba Sediqi, a program director at a radio station airing shows geared toward Afghan women.

Although the Taliban regime is no longer in power, it remains a viable force in Afghanistan, continuing to clash with coalition and Afghan forces.

DOJ_NMG_0005449

So far this year more than 1,000 have been killed in these battles, the most for any year since U.S. forces arrived after the September 11, 2001, attacks.

Women's rights activist Hassina Sherjan agrees with Mrs. Mujahid saying the key to leveling the playing field among men and women is education.

"Many of [the female candidates] seem motivated to create a better society for womenþ at least I hope they are," said Mrs. Sherjan, whose Kabul-based Aid Afghanistan organization has spent the past 10 years trying to provide supplemental education for women and girls.

"We're trying to avoid the segregation of women" from the workplace and in other sectors of society, said Mrs. Sherjan, who sees the presence of women in parliament as a step in that direction.

De Afghani Khazi Ghag Radio, which means "the voice of Afghan women," broadcasts 12 shows six days a week dealing with issues such as abusive spouses, and airs call-in shows and songs featuring Afghan and regional female vocalists -- even the Britney Spears tunes.

"The bottom line is we are trying to promote women's self-esteem after years of oppressionþ" Mrs. Sherjan said.

Women Embrace New Freedom In Bamiyan (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, September 15, 2005

BAMIYAN, Afghanistan — The five men traveled three hours across rugged Afghan terrain to take their troubles to the provincial governor. Their problem: A local warlord was blocking a crucial irrigation project; no bribe, no water.

After listening patiently to their story, the governor agreed to send police to the remote district to deal with the local commander and his armed thugs. “I will solve the problem,” the governor said. “We'll have to do it by force.”

The extortionist warlord is all too typical in Afghanistan. The decisive governor, who declined to name the offender to avoid further trouble, is anything but. Habiba Sarabi is the first woman to run a province in Afghan history.

Perhaps more than anywhere else in Afghanistan, women in Bamiyan province are leaping into the political space created by the U.S.-led overthrow of the Islamic fundamentalist Taliban militia four years ago. They are more likely to run for office and to vote than other Afghan women.

Sixteen women will be on ballots in Bamiyan province Sunday, when voters choose candidates for the provincial council and the lower house of the Afghan National Assembly, known as the Wolesi Jirga. Elsewhere, some provinces couldn't field enough female candidates to fill the seats reserved for them.

In Bamiyan, 48% of registered voters are women, who are a majority in some districts. Nationwide, women are less than 42% of voters.

The enthusiasm with which Bamiyan women embrace politics reflects the relatively moderate brand of Islam that predominates in the remote province, best known for the 1,500-year-old giant Buddha statues the Taliban destroyed in March 2001. Bamiyan men are more likely to tolerate female candidates and voters than the men in Afghanistan's fundamentalist-dominated southern and eastern provinces.

Sarabi was appointed six months ago by Afghan President Hamid Karzai. She has emerged as a role model for Bamiyan's aspiring female politicians.

“She gave great hope to women. They know they can run a province,” says Marzia Mohammadi, a female Wolesi Jirga candidate and former kindergarten principal.

Khadija Bahari, 26, is out campaigning in a Toyota van that has a red heart labeled “Love” dangling from the mirror.

“This country has operated at a very low level,” says Bahari, who is the former head of a human rights group. She aims to start fixing things if the voters give her the go-ahead Sunday.

Under Afghan law, women are guaranteed 68 of the 249 Wolesi Jirga seats being contested nationwide and 124 of the 420 seats on the country's 34 provincial councils. In Bamiyan, one of four Wolesi Jirga seats and three of nine provincial council seats must go to women. Bahari reckons she's one of seven women running for the one legislative seat reserved for a woman.

DOJ_NMG_0005450

In some places, the appearance of women on the ballot is causing a stir. In the western city of Herat and the northern province Badakhshan, three young female candidates are attracting ardent admirers, according to the Daily Outlook Afghanistan, an English-language newspaper. Smitten storekeeper Mohammad Karim plastered posters of candidate Qaida Afif, 28, on the wall of his shop in Herat. "We are determined to vote for the most beautiful," he told the newspaper.

Other Afghan men are less than thrilled to see women running for public office. In many places, tribal and religious customs restrict women to the home and require them to wear head-to-toe coverings called burqas when they go out.

After Bahari gave a campaign speech at a Bamiyan mosque, the mullah denounced her as un-Islamic. "The fundamentalists don't like me," she says.

Mohammadi says she was confronted in a remote Bamiyan village: "A man argued with me that women should stay at home. He was telling me women must not go to parliament because there are so many men there. … It was difficult to make him understand."

Things are worse for female candidates and election workers elsewhere in Afghanistan. According to a report last month by the New York-based activist group Human Rights Watch, a total of five provincial seats reserved for women in the Taliban strongholds of Zabul, Uruzgan and Nangarhar will remain empty, probably because women are too frightened to run. Elsewhere, women who want to run for office face intimidation, the report said. "Violence against women, forced marriage and early marriage are endemic problems," it said.

The group cited statistics from UNICEF that show that one in six Afghan women die in childbirth and 87% of those deaths are preventable. The illiteracy rate for Afghan women over 15 is 86%. In Afghanistan's seven conservative southern provinces, less than 10% of girls go to school.

The appearance of female candidates is raising hope that issues such as women's health and education finally might get on the national agenda. "No one cares about women's health in Afghanistan," says nurse Zainab Rezai, 40. "The husband must allow (his pregnant) wife to go to the hospital every month. They are now treated like a prisoner in their homes."

Sarabi cites another simple advantage of putting women in high office: It gives ordinary women a place to go to air grievances and make suggestions. For many Afghan women, the idea of visiting a male politician in his office is unthinkable.

Sarabi's office sits in a one-story yellow building overlooking the bluffs that once held the Bamiyan Buddhas. Bamiyan is a poor, isolated place. The 130-mile drive to Kabul over unpaved roads is a bone-jarring 81/2-hour journey. The people here are predominantly Hazaras, a long-oppressed ethnic minority group. They are probable descendants of Genghis Khan's Mongol armies, which swept through in the 12th century. The Persian-speaking Hazaras are moderate Shiite Muslims in this majority Sunni country.

The Pashto-speaking Sunni Taliban hated them. When the Taliban overran the province in the late 1990s, they slaughtered hundreds of Hazaras. Nurse Rezai remembers how she had to slide into bed and pretend to be a patient whenever Taliban members came to inspect the hospital where she worked. With women banned from work and girls from school, "I thought women in Afghanistan had lost everything," she says.

Now she is delighted to have so many female candidates to choose from. "They will work for women's rights," she says. And she is overjoyed to have Sarabi running the province. "She is the pride of all Afghans, not just women," Rezai says.

A decade ago, Sarabi was a pharmacist living comfortably in Kabul. Her political days as a Kabul University student leader organizing demonstrations against the Soviet occupation in the early 1980s seemed far behind her. She was a mother of three when the Taliban took over Afghanistan. Sarabi fled with her children to Peshawar, Pakistan. Her husband stayed behind to care for his aging father and their property.

In Peshawar, Sarabi found a job training teachers to work in squalid Afghan refugee camps. Eventually, she founded an aid group that ran clandestine girls schools inside Taliban-occupied Afghanistan. Four or five times, she sneaked into the country.

When the Taliban fell in late 2001, she came home. President Karzai named her minister for women's affairs in 2002. He sent her to Bamiyan as governor six months ago. She is Hazara, though she is from Ghazni province, southeast of here.

Sarabi's job is overwhelming. Bamiyan needs so much — roads, schools, clinics, clean water — and has no money to pay for it. She is reduced to begging for cash from the central government and from aid agencies whose "bureaucracy is worse than our bureaucracy." She also must contend with "dozens" of provincial warlords such as the one holding up the irrigation project.

She says another warlord is blocking a health clinic a day's drive from Bamiyan town. When the election is over, Sarabi plans to dispatch the police to deal with him. Still, she describes her management style as motherly: listening patiently, seeking consensus, cracking heads only when she has to. It's made her popular. "We don't want a boss," says driver Mohammed Hassan, 29. "We want someone to serve the people. She is doing a good job."

"About the only complaint I've heard about her," election officer Gezim Kiseri says, "is that she's put on a little weight since she took office."

Afghans Helped Bin Laden Flee Country, Official Says (LAT/REU)

By From Reuters

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan — Osama bin Laden was given safe passage to Pakistan in 2001 by Afghan commanders paid by Al Qaeda and sympathetic to the terrorist network's cause, a senior Afghan official said Wednesday.

Lutfullah Mashal, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry, said commanders had helped the Al Qaeda leader escape from the Tora Bora mountains near the Pakistani border as U.S. warplanes and Afghan forces attacked his hide-out in late 2001.

"The help was provided because of monetary aid availed by Al Qaeda and also partly because of ideological issues," Mashal said.

"Osama, along with other Al Qaeda people, managed to go to Parachinar at the time, and then Pakistani forces battled the Al Qaeda runaways, killing around 70 of them," he said, referring to an area in Pakistan's Kurram tribal region.

He said commanders loyal to Maulvi Yunus Khalis had helped Bin Laden escape. The whereabouts of Khalis, a top mujahedin leader in the war against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, are unknown.

Mashal told private Pakistani television channel Geo on Tuesday that U.S. forces had made a mistake in entrusting the capture of Bin Laden to Afghan commanders.

Mashal said that he was present in the Tora Bora mountains during the December 2001 operation and that although U.S. forces were not there in uniform, Green Berets were present in plainclothes.

While 800 to 900 Arabs fled Tora Bora for Pakistan's Khyber tribal region, he said, senior Al Qaeda leaders trekked to Parachinar with the help of some Sulemankheil tribal elders.

Mashal said Bin Laden later recrossed the border to Khowst, where the leader of the Taliban there gave him refuge. He then returned to Pakistan, this time heading for Miranshah, the main town in another tribal area, North Waziristan.

U.S. officials have said Bin Laden, who has evaded a U.S.-led manhunt since the Sept. 11, attacks, is probably still hiding in the rugged mountains between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Merrill Lynch Changes How It Forecasts Earnings Stock Options To Be Included (USAT/REU)

By Jonathan Stempel, Reuters

USA Today, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK — Merrill Lynch on Wednesday said it will require all U.S. equity research analysts to include options and other stock-based compensation in their earnings forecasts for U.S. companies.

The changes by the largest U.S. full-service brokerage, which covers more than 1,000 U.S. companies in 50 industries, are intended to reflect a controversial new accounting rule. That rule requires public companies in fiscal years beginning after June 15 to treat stock options as routine business expenses, such as salaries.

"Merrill is anticipating there may be very large changes in earnings per share for many companies," says April Klein, an associate professor in accounting at New York University's Stern School of Business. "Not only do I expect other Wall Street brokerages to follow, but I expect them at least for a while to be restating some companies' old financial results."

Many technology companies, including Cisco Systems, opposed the new rule, fearing it might increase operating costs and reduce profits.

DOJ_NMG_0005452

But the Financial Accounting Standards Board and Securities and Exchange Commission backed the change, and companies such as Wal-Mart began implementing it before the deadline. Meanwhile, some companies, including Microsoft, have stopped granting stock options.

Merrill will require its analysts to incorporate options and other stock-based compensation into their earnings forecasts for quarters ending after Sept. 30.

"This is a move in the right direction," says Charles Mulford, an accounting professor at the Georgia Institute of Technology in Atlanta.

About 90% of the 250 largest U.S. companies now offer stock options, down from 99% in 2003, says compensation consultant Frederic W. Cook & Co.

"It is important to show compensation included in income statements so that investors can make apples-to-apples comparisons of companies' earnings," says Steve Tighe, Merrill's head of Americas equity research.

Marsh Ex-Executives Are Expected To Be Indicted On Fraud Charges (WSJ)

By Ian Mcdonald

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

As many as eight former Marsh Inc. executives are expected to be indicted on criminal-fraud charges Thursday, according to two people close to the situation.

As reported last month in The Wall Street Journal, a grand jury impaneled in Manhattan has been weighing criminal charges against the former executives. The probe is an outgrowth of a fraud investigation last year by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that resulted in a $850 million settlement by Marsh & McLennan Cos. of bid-rigging charges early this year. Marsh Inc. is the New York company's insurance-brokerage unit.

In settling, Marsh apologized to clients for the "shameful" conduct of some employees who "unlawfully deceived their customers."

Mr. Spitzer is expected to unseal indictments charging the former Marsh employees with scheming to defraud, according to the two people, barring any last-minute guilty-pleas hammered out with prosecutors. A spokesman for Mr. Spitzer declined to comment.

In the civil suit settled by Marsh, state authorities alleged that some Marsh brokers cheated institutional clients by rigging bids for large insurance contracts and steering business to insurers who paid Marsh large commission payments. All told, more than 15 insurance managers and executives have pleaded guilty to criminal charges stemming from the probe, including other former Marsh brokers and former employees of large insurers American International Group Inc.; Zurich American Insurance Co., a unit of Zurich Financial Services AG; and ACE Ltd.

Mr. Spitzer built his case against former Marsh executives by gathering evidence from some of those who pleaded guilty and pledged to cooperate in the investigation.

In recent weeks, Mr. Spitzer's office instructed attorneys for the eight individuals that their clients should be available to surrender to authorities in New York with 24 hours notice from Sept. 7 to Sept. 21. A spokesman for the company declined to comment.

The individuals will likely surrender themselves at Manhattan police precincts early Thursday and then be arraigned. Prosecutors threatened organized-crime charges in recent weeks, but it isn't clear whether any of the former Marsh executives will face those charges.

At least two of the former Marsh executives facing potential criminal charges aren't negotiating with authorities, according to three people close to the matter. William Gilman, a former top Marsh insurance broker profiled in a Page One story5 in The Wall Street Journal last year, has long been a focus of Mr. Spitzer's probe. Mr. Spitzer's suit against Marsh alleged the bid-rigging scheme was "strictly enforced by Marsh through William Gilman." Mr. Gilman's attorney didn't return a call for comment.

The second is former Marsh executive Joseph Peiser. "I have not seen the charges, but Joe Peiser was a loyal Marsh employee who did not do anything wrong," said his attorney, Jerry Bernstein of Blank Rome LLP.

Ex-NYSE Regulator Testifies To SEC Call On Email Policies (WSJ/DJN)

By Siobhan Hughes, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

The Securities and Exchange Commission asked the New York Stock Exchange in 2001 to drop enforcement cases against a dozen Wall Street firms whose email retention and storage policies were deficient, according to a former NYSE regulator.

Annette Nazareth, then-director of the SEC's market regulation and now an SEC commissioner, called the NYSE in the spring of 2001 and asked that the exchange's regulatory arm stop reporting email-retention violations to the NYSE's enforcement division and withdraw referrals that had already been made, according to testimony by Salvatore Pallante, former NYSE executive vice president for member-firm regulation.

At the time, the SEC was in discussions with Wall Street over changes to its email rules, which the industry had criticized as being too broad. Because of those discussions, Ms. Nazareth believed it would be "unreasonable" to bring enforcement actions, according to Mr. Pallante's testimony.

Mr. Pallante testified on behalf of Raymond James Financial Services Inc., which is fighting civil fraud charges filed by the SEC last year. The SEC sued Raymond James for failing to supervise a broker who allegedly bilked investors out of millions of dollars and also accused the firm of failing to fully preserve email records. The testimony was available through the SEC's public records office.

SEC Chief Administrative Law Judge Brenda Murray is set to make a decision in the matter by today. Raymond James is using Mr. Pallante's testimony to bolster its case, arguing that the SEC had planned to change its own rules.

Lori Richards, director of the SEC's office of compliance, inspections and examinations, told Mr. Pallante that she agreed with Ms. Nazareth's approach, Mr. Pallante said. As a result, he said, the NYSE dropped cases it had developed against about 12 member firms. In an interview, Ed Kwalwasser, the NYSE's vice president of regulation in 2001, confirmed Mr. Pallante's account.

Mr. Pallante didn't return a phone call, and NYSE spokesman Brendan Intindola declined to comment. A call to Ms. Richards's office was referred to the SEC press office. Both Ms. Nazareth and SEC spokesman John Heine declined to comment.

The SEC hasn't contested Mr. Pallante's account. In a brief responding to his testimony, the SEC said the commission didn't engage in misconduct, adding SEC staff opinions aren't the same as the views of the five-member commission. The SEC also argued that its rule is clear.

The SEC requires brokerage firms to keep email messages for three years, with the two most recent years' worth in an easily accessible place. Wall Street has long complained about the regulation, saying it is too broad, strains the limits of storage technology, and could apply even to personal emails, such as messages between brokers or analysts making dinner plans.

The email requirement was first spelled out in a February 1997 SEC release. By 2000, the SEC was in closed-door discussions with Wall Street firms about narrowing the regulation. The discussions were still going on by 2001 when Ms. Nazareth made her phone call, according to Mr. Pallante's testimony.

Some securities lawyers defended Ms. Nazareth's approach, saying the SEC was trying to respond to complaints about the 1997 mandate at a time when it seemed Wall Street was negotiating in good faith.

On the other hand, investor advocates question why the SEC would have considered accommodating the wishes of the brokerage industry in the first place.

"Who in their right mind decides we're going to lighten up on record-retention policies for the new, emerging, primary way people communicate in the market?" said Barbara Roper, director of investor protection for the Consumer Federation of America. "What genius came up with that idea?"

Credit Derivatives And Their Risks Are On The Table (WSJ)

By Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

The New York Federal Reserve Bank is gathering the big Wall Street players today. The topic: rising concerns about risk in what is known as the credit-derivatives markets.

The talks come amid frustration about the failure of the structure of the market to keep pace with the explosive growth in the trading of these complex securities.

"People have the best intentions, but there are resource issues," says Donna Parisi, head of the derivatives practice at the law firm of Shearman & Sterling. Credit derivatives, which allow investors to take positions on the risk of default of both companies and countries, have been one of the most rapidly growing financial products on Wall Street.

Infrastructure issues that have bedeviled the market involve processing and settling trades, or what some experts such as Thomas Russo, vice chairman of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., refer to as the "plumbing of the market." Such descriptions sound boring and technical. But the credit-derivatives arena has become increasingly important in terms of managing investment risk, which means regulators are eager to ensure that these complex and often opaque markets operate smoothly.

Thus far, their proddings have largely gone unheeded, leading to the unusual summit at the New York Fed.

The love-hate relationship between Wall Street firms and their hedge-fund clients has grown more acrimonious when it comes to credit derivatives. Hedge funds claim that Wall Street firms are reluctant to move to more efficient electronic trading and processing systems, because such a move would crimp the Street's margins. The dealers in turn say that hedge funds have been reluctant to invest sufficient funds in their back offices, and that it is the hedge funds, not Wall Street firms, that are the problem.

In any case, the result is stacks of paper at both hedge funds and at Wall Street firms. And the paper load is growing, as the labor-intensive review of documents and agreements confirming trades falls increasingly behind the growing volume of new trades.

"The burden gets bigger and bigger," says Robert Pickel, head of the International Swaps & Derivatives Association. ISDA provides master agreements for trades in the credit-derivatives market, but there is often a lot of debate about basic definitions of the trades, especially on what constitutes a default. The agreements "are only a partially completed canvas," adds Mr. Pickel.

The spotty record of confirmations can become a risk-management issue in times of turbulence. Such conditions occurred in May, when the gap between safer Treasurys and less-safe corporate bonds widened sharply. The trading turmoil that month has prompted several reviews of the market, with regulators trying to get a stronger handle on how best to ensure smoothness in the credit-derivatives market.

Valuations are another issue of contention. Since credit derivatives can be illiquid, hedge funds can garner a wide range of estimates on what a given position might be worth. Indeed, two different areas within a single investment bank have been known to give widely differing quotes on a given credit derivative, hedge-fund managers say. Who gets to say what a position is worth in times of volatility is an even more troubling issue, especially since it is such a critical element in assessing hedge-fund performance and the risk exposure of firms dealing with the hedge fund.

The Fed is also tackling the related, highly arcane issue of assignment. Hedge funds sometimes move out of trades -- "assign" them -- without telling the bank that sold them the credit-derivative contract. This practice makes it harder for other market participants to know whether their positions are properly hedged.

While the purpose of the meeting is simply "to discuss how best to address a range of important issues," according to the letter sent to 14 industry participants and a variety of international regulators, there is always the implicit threat of regulatory action.

"When things get relegated to the support areas, they sometimes often do not get the attention they deserve," says Mr. Russo, who was part of a private-sector group led by former New York Fed Chief Gerald Corrigan that looked at such risk issues. "Meetings such as those sponsored by the New York Fed are sometimes necessary to shine a light on a problem, mobilize people and bring about positive action."

Greenspan Issues Another Warning On Fannie, Freddie (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Dawn Kopecki

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, in his strongest warning yet, said in a recent letter that Wall Street investment firms eventually could be incapable of hedging all the financial risk posed by mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, if Congress doesn't impose meaningful limits on them.

DOJ_NMG_0005455

"As Fannie and Freddie increase in size relative to the counterparties for their hedging transactions, the ability of these [companies] to quickly correct the inevitable misjudgments inherent in their complex hedging strategies becomes more difficult," Mr. Greenspan wrote in the letter1, dated Sept. 2, to Sen. Robert Bennett (R., Utah), and reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

Mr. Greenspan's letter concludes: "In the case of [Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac], excessive caution in reducing their portfolios could prove to be destabilizing to our financial system as a whole and in the end could seriously diminish the availability of home mortgage funds."

Legislation to impose a range of new controls over the congressionally chartered companies, known as government-sponsored enterprises, or GSEs, has been stalled in the House, in part over Mr. Greenspan's concerns that it doesn't go far enough in curbing the growth of the companies' mortgage portfolios.

Many conservatives, who see Fannie and Freddie as a form of government intrusion, also worry that another provision of the bill would strengthen the companies' already substantial political clout on Capitol Hill, by substantially raising the amount of money they dedicate to affordable-housing programs around the country.

The two companies borrow money to buy home mortgages. They either hold the mortgages in their own portfolios or sell them to other investors. Because they can borrow almost as cheaply as the federal government itself, critics worry that there are no effective curbs on their potential growth, and particularly the growth of their portfolios. That is a potential concern because their portfolios of mortgages make the companies extremely vulnerable to interest-rate swings.

The companies try to hedge that risk through complicated strategies involving derivative investments such as interest-rate swaps. But Mr. Greenspan and some others worry that as the companies and their portfolios grow, they could overwhelm the ability of Wall Street banks to act as the counterparties. Already, market participants have reported occasional shocks when sudden zigzags in interest rates have brought the companies -- along with other mortgage-market players -- into the swaps market suddenly.

Freddie Mac said Mr. Greenspan's comments were consistent with prior statements he has made. The company also sought to play down concerns about systemic risk posed by its portfolio investments. "Our portfolio is very conservatively managed and tightly regulated," said Freddie spokesman David Palombi, pointing to the elaborate tests that federal officials run to measure its safety. He also suggested that the markets themselves would prevent untoward growth of the companies, and warned that "arbitrarily limiting our retained portfolio would decrease over time the availability of the long-term, fixed-rate, prepayable mortgage."

Fannie declined to comment. Both companies have warned investors that the legislation could materially hurt their profits and affect their ability to promote affordable housing.

While holdings of mortgages and related securities by Fannie and Freddie have soared during the past 15 years, so far this year their combined holdings have declined. At the end of July, the combined total came to about $1.449 trillion, down 7% from the end of 2004. That is partly because Fannie has been shrinking its holdings to meet stiffer capital requirements imposed by the company's regulator in the wake of an accounting scandal.

But critics worry that if the current wave of scrutiny passes without strong new legislative curbs, the companies will be free to start growing again. That concern led Mr. Greenspan to warn earlier this year that passing the House bill would be worse than doing nothing.

Yesterday, the chief proponents of the House legislation sought to improve chances for their bill by amending it to steer more of the companies' profits into affordable housing in the stricken Gulf Coast region. One of the leaders of the effort is Rep. Richard Baker, a Louisiana Republican who represents the Baton Rouge area.

Another proponent, House Financial Services Chairman Michael Oxley (R., Ohio), said the bill is expected to come to a floor vote next week. Still, it isn't clear that the changes will be enough to overcome objections to the House measure among conservative critics.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Gets Tough On Pedophile Offenders (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2005

Sex offenders who abuse children would be subject to stringent monitoring requirements and face new mandatory penalties under legislation the House passed Wednesday, 371-52. The bill would create a national website on pedophile sex offenders and stipulate that sex felons face up to 20-year sentences for not complying with registration requirements.

"We track library books better than we do sexual predators," said Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla. Rep. Bobby Scott, D-Va., criticized the bill because released offenders who face harassment or job discrimination "may just go underground and not bother to register again." The House approved an amendment to expand federal hate-crime laws to include some crimes involving sexual orientation, gender and disability. The vote was 223-199. The House had failed to pass similar legislation in the past. Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, the nation's largest gay rights group, said it was an "incredibly historic vote" that could give momentum to similar action in the Senate.

Ex-panel members reject Atta allegation

Former members of the 9/11 Commission dismissed assertions that a Pentagon intelligence unit identified lead hijacker Mohamed Atta as a member of al-Qaeda long before the 2001 attacks. Army Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer and Navy Capt. Scott Phillpott have said a classified military intelligence unit known as "Able Danger" identified Atta before the attacks. Shaffer has said three other hijackers were also identified.

The commission's former chairman, Thomas Kean, said the recollections of the intelligence officers couldn't be verified by any document. Slade Gorton, a former commissioner, said, "It just didn't happen, and that's the conclusion of all 10 of us."

Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., has accused the commission of ignoring the intelligence about Atta. Weldon spokesman John Tomaszewski said no commissioner has met with anyone from Able Danger, "yet they choose to speak with some form of certainty without firsthand knowledge."

Uranium waste to be moved from river

The Energy Department cleared the way for nearly 12 million tons of radioactive waste in Utah to be moved from the banks of the Colorado River, which provides drinking water for more than 25 million people across the West. The 94-foot-tall pile of uranium tailings — radioactive material left over from uranium mining — will be moved by rail from Moab, Utah, to Crescent Junction, more than 30 miles from the river.

Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman signed the decision, which was announced earlier this year. Federal studies in the 1990s found that an underground plume of pollutants — 1 mile wide and 40 feet deep — reaches from the site to the river.

House Favors Expanding Hate Crime Law To Protect Gays (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Sex offenders who prey on children would be subject to stringent monitoring requirements and face new mandatory penalties under a bill, passed by the House, that was expanded to include protections for gay men and lesbians under federal hate crime law.

The House voted 371 to 52 yesterday in favor of the Children's Safety Act, which, among its many provisions, creates a national Web site for child sex offenders and stipulates that sex felons face up to 20 years in prison for failing to comply with registration requirements.

Unexpectedly, the House voted 223 to 199 in favor of an amendment by Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) that expands current hate crime law to include some crimes involving sexual orientation, gender and disability. Under current law, the federal government assists local and state authorities prosecuting limited types of crimes based on the victim's race, religion or ethnic background.

The House has been the chief obstacle in numerous previous attempts to expand hate crimes law, and Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, the nation's largest gay rights group, said it was an "incredibly historic vote" that could give momentum to similar action in the Senate.

The sex offender bill, which also requires felony offenders to register for life and authorizes the death penalty for sex crimes resulting in the killing of a child, responds to what House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), said was a "national crisis" in child sex offenses. He said that of about 550,000 convicted sex offenders in the nation, the whereabouts of 100,000 are unknown.

Sensenbrenner said the legislation would get favorable treatment in the Senate. The White House expressed support, saying that even though sex crimes against children have declined significantly in recent years, more needs to be done. It noted that the legislation codified the online National Sex Offender Public Registry that the Justice Department launched earlier this year.

House GOP Derails Democratic Inquiries (NSDY/AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- House Republicans derailed Democratic attempts on Wednesday to force the Bush administration to surrender documents on prewar intelligence and the disclosure of the identity of a CIA operative.

Democrats have introduced several "resolutions of inquiry" to compel President Bush and members of his Cabinet to release all information relating to communications with British officials before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq and the Valerie Plame case.

The White House has taken heat since the disclosure this year of the "Downing Street memos," British documents that suggest the Bush administration had made up its mind by 2002 to invade Iraq. Administration officials also have been interviewed by a special prosecutor in his quest to determine who leaked Plame's covert identity to reporters.

Largely along party lines, the House International Relations Committee unfavorably reported two of the resolutions on Iraq and one resolution on the Plame matter. Earlier, the House Judiciary Committee "unfavorably" reported a similar Plame resolution.

Under House rules, the committees had to act on the resolutions within 14 legislative days of the resolutions' introduction. If not, sponsors could have forced the measures before the full House for a vote.

But the votes Wednesday against the measures all but prevented them from ever being taken up by the House.

Other Democratic-sponsored resolutions on both matters are in different committees. Those resolutions will be considered in the next few weeks; the outcome is expected to be the same.

Republican leaders want to avoid the spectacle of either issue being debated on the House floor amid some fear that the measures could succeed if enough Republicans side with minority Democrats.

House Republicans Block Bid For CIA Leak Data (REU)

Reuters, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Two U.S. congressional committees on Wednesday rejected Democrat-backed resolutions that would have compelled the Bush administration to turn over records relating to the outing of CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee and International Relations Committee, who opposed the resolution, said Congress should await the outcome of a federal investigation by special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald.

Democrats countered that Republicans were trying to protect President George W. Bush and his top political adviser, Karl Rove. "We know that this is a political decision because there is potential embarrassment to the administration," said Massachusetts Democratic Rep. William Delahunt.

The resolutions, rejected in committee votes along party lines, sought to force the departments of Justice and State to turn over all documents related to Plame.

Lawyers close to the Plame investigation say there are signs that the 20-month-long inquiry could be wrapped up within weeks. The outcome could have major political implications for Bush, whose approval ratings are already the lowest of his presidency.

Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, said the leak was meant to discredit him for criticizing Bush's Iraq policy in 2003 after a CIA-funded trip to investigate whether Niger helped supply nuclear materials to Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0005458

A reporter for Time magazine said the first person to tell him about Plame was Rove. Rove's attorney says Rove did nothing wrong and has been repeatedly assured he is not a target of Fitzgerald's investigation.

Democrats have urged Bush to fire Rove or revoke his access to classified information. It is against the law in some cases to knowingly reveal the identity of an undercover CIA officer.

Editorial: Fence Off Internet Porn (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2005

The Internet has transformed the pornography business. In little more than a decade, online "adult entertainment" has become a booming multibillion dollar industry, enabled by the World Wide Web's easy, impersonal accessibility.

Avoiding or blocking the X-rated onslaught can be nearly impossible. Internet content moves with no respect for borders and at such slippery speed that tracking it is like trying to grab hold of mercury. Innocuous-looking e-mail titled, say, "Here's the offer you requested" can link to pornography generated in the Ukraine. Much of what's out there makes the "adult content" of the past look quaint.

For those who want porn, that may be fine. But for others, it can be deeply offensive. And for children, it can be damaging.

A blanket ban is not a useful option because foreign sites are beyond the reach of U.S. law, which is why one fresh approach deserves encouragement.

It's a proposal for a virtual red-light district in the form of a new Internet domain. Instead of .com or one of the other familiar Web address suffixes, porn would have .xxx. People would know what they're getting. Parents could more easily filter it out.

The idea is no cure-all. For one, it would be voluntary. Critics point out, correctly, that pornographers could still keep their .com addresses, and many probably would. Nor would it stop those deceptive e-mails. But that's not the point.

Its value is as an experiment, particularly for protecting children. Why not?

Parents need all the help they can get in protecting their kids' experience online. They have a variety of constantly improving filters and other tools. Internet service providers, vying for customers, have made it a priority to give parents levels of screening and ways to report offensive e-mail. An .xxx address is one more kind of filter.

Nobody can predict for sure just how it would affect the industry, but there's some cause to believe the impact would be helpful. Purveyors signing up for .xxx would be required to pledge responsible business practices, including no pushing to minors. Financial institutions, now leery of them, might provide an incentive for better behavior.

The adult entertainment industry has already been sensitive to pressure to protect children. It has taken steps — under pressure from Congress, which wants to tax adult entertainment sites — to voluntarily avoid pushing content to children.

But the .xxx idea is running into opposition. Some critics say it would encourage online porn. Hello? Do they have computers?

Other opponents fear that the new domain would legitimize porn. Their protests — including more than 6,000 letters, many part of a campaign by the conservative Family Research Council — forced a delay in implementing .xxx. The regulatory board, the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers, is to meet today on the issue.

The board shouldn't bow to the pressure. Internet porn is big business driven by big demand. It can't be eradicated. But trying to improve the protections for parents is a good idea — including a .xxx domain experiment.

Op-ed: .xxx Would Legitimize Porn (USAT)

By Patrick Trueman

USA Today, September 15, 2005

It was Churchill who observed, "There is nothing so exhilarating as to be shot at, without result!" And this must be the sentiment of pornographers. For years there has been near unanimous condemnation of the notion that they should be rewarded with even more space on the Internet. Yet, the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN), the Internet's governing agency, is moving ahead on this seductive idea.

Most who advocate for a .xxx domain for porn sites say children would be the chief beneficiaries because filtering pornography would become a simple matter — just block .xxx sites. That assumes that pornographers would give up their .com sites, the cash cow of the porn industry, and move to .xxx.

Pornographers may be sleazy, but that hasn't affected their sound business sense. They have been making millions on the .com domain since long before Michael Dell sold his first computer over the Internet, and they would keep all their current .com locations.

Nor would they be evicted. Indeed, any law attempting to force all pornographers to relocate to .xxx would likely be challenged in court. Although it is a myth that all pornography is protected by the First Amendment, the U.S. Supreme Court has said that it is "presumptively protected" unless and until it is ruled obscenity or child porn in a court.

ICANN does not pretend that the .xxx domain would clean up the .com domain, and the agency has no enforcement powers to make this happen. Pornographers would simply expand to .xxx, thus perhaps doubling the number of porn sites and doubling their menace to society. Thus the argument that .xxx would benefit children is without any basis in fact.

Furthermore, creating a designated domain for pornography would simply have the effect of legitimizing much material that is likely illegal. Selling hard-core pornography on the Internet is a violation of federal obscenity law no matter where it is located. A relatively small number of U.S. pornographers own the vast majority of Web sites selling illegal material. That is why the Family Research Council supports the efforts of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to establish an obscenity prosecution task force to prosecute violators of the obscenity law — rather than making them masters of a new domain.

Patrick Trueman is senior legal counsel at the conservative Family Research Council.

Texas Executes Woman Who Killed Three Family Members (NYT)

By Steve Barnes

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Frances Newton, convicted of murdering her husband and their two children in 1987, was executed last night in Huntsville, Tex.

The Supreme Court declined to review Ms. Newton's case earlier, and Gov. Rick Perry declined to intervene.

The Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles unanimously refused on Monday to recommend that Mr. Perry, a Republican, commute her sentence to life in prison.

Ms. Newton, 40, was the third woman put to death in Texas since capital punishment resumed in 1982.

Commissioner Seeks FBI Probe (CINE)

By Janice Morse, Enquirer staff writer

The Cincinnati Enquirer, September 15, 2005

HAMILTON - Butler County Commissioner Chuck Furmon on Wednesday asked the FBI in Cincinnati to investigate a multimillion-dollar equipment lease that included the county's name without the commissioners' approval.

FBI spokesman Michael Brooks confirmed that Furmon contacted the office. "We'll look into the information that he provided and see if an investigation should be opened," Brooks said, declining further comment.

Dynus Technologies, a company formerly known as CBS Technologies, is a party to the disputed contract involving the lease of at least $5.3 million in telecommunications equipment used to transmit data via fiber-optic lines.

The lease was signed before Dynus and Butler County commissioners finalized a contract in which Dynus is supposed to sign up customers for the county's fiber-optic loop. Furmon is urging his fellow commissioners to terminate that contract in the wake of the lease-agreement controversy. He says commissioners found out about the county's name being included on the lease only "by happenstance," after an invoice for a $99,000 lease payment showed up unexpectedly at the County Auditor's Office on Aug. 31.

"We do not understand Commissioner Furmon's motivations in calling for an FBI investigation," said Dynus spokesman Tom Rowe. "Based upon what we've looked into thus far, we haven't seen anything that would appear to warrant that type of action or an FBI investigation."

Rowe said Dynus executives have talked with other county officials to try to clear up the concerns numerous times during the past two weeks, but Furmon has excluded himself from the meetings.

Furmon said he no longer trusts the company after he learned that a Dynus executive had used the county's name in the equipment lease without the knowledge of the commissioners.

DOJ_NMG_0005460

But Rowe says: "At the time that all these agreements and the documents were executed, everyone thought they had authority to execute those agreements."

Rowe said Dynus intends to continue working with the other county officials.

"This is a muddy situation with a lot of issues," Rowe said. "As a company, we are feverishly working to resolve all of those to everyone's satisfaction, including Butler County, because frankly I don't think anyone benefits with the situation escalating beyond what it already has."

Furmon says he's looking out for county taxpayers' interests.

" It's like someone using your credit card without permission. It seems to be pretty clear-cut to me. This company has taken out a loan for millions of dollars and we didn't authorize it," he said.

Furmon said he did feel somewhat reassured that the County Prosecutor's Office issued a written opinion stating that County Auditor Kay Rogers lacked legal authority to designate anyone as an "agent" of the county and that a lease signed by Jim Smith, a Dynus executive, could not be enforceable, although Rogers had signed some documents that appeared to grant Smith certain privileges.

Mass. GOP Official Resigns After Charges (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BOSTON, Mass. -- The vice chairman of the state Republican Party resigned after a federal sting led to money-laundering charges accusing him of offering to "cleanse" drug proceeds for a legal client.

Lawrence Novak, an attorney, was arrested at his home Tuesday after investigators said he allegedly offered to launder drug profits for Scott Holyoke. Novak resigned his party position on Tuesday after his release on bond.

Holyoke is awaiting trial on federal drug trafficking charges and agreed to be a cooperating witness against Novak for the FBI.

Novak allegedly offered to have Holyoke sign false affidavits in an attempt to gain a reduced sentence for Holyoke. Holyoke told Novak that he had more than $100,000 in cash in a safe deposit box, repeatedly telling Novak that the money was drug proceeds, according to an affidavit filed by Lauren Youngquist, an Internal Revenue Service agent.

Novak allegedly told Holyoke that he would take about $60,000 of the money as a legal fee and offered to "clean" or "cleanse" the remainder of the cash, the affidavit said. According to the arrest affidavit, after Novak made the offer to launder Holyoke's drug proceeds, the IRS and FBI introduced an undercover IRS special agent who posed as Holyoke's aunt.

Novak, 54, was taken into custody after allegedly depositing money in a Brockton bank, federal authorities said.

"I think that it's an unfortunate incident. It's something that's happened in his private life, and the party has responded appropriately," O'Brien said Wednesday.

The party's chairman, Darrell Crate, said in a statement the charges are strictly related to Novak's private business dealings and "have absolutely no connection to the Republican Party."

Novak also served at the party's treasurer in the late 1990s. Neither he nor his attorney would comment on the charges.

Novak is due back in court on Oct. 3. He faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine if convicted.

State Republican Party's Embattled Vice Chairman Resigns (BOS)

By Raphael Lewis, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 15, 2005

The Massachusetts Republican Party has accepted the resignation of its vice chairman, Lawrence P. Novak, after his arrest Tuesday in a money-laundering case, in which he is accused of trying to obtain his fee from a jailed client through illicit drug profits.

Party chairman Darrell W. Crate issued a statement yesterday saying Novak had offered to step down late Tuesday, hours after his arrest. Crate sought to distance himself and the Republican Party from the former vice chairman, who was elected by the party's rank-and-file committee over the objections of Crate and Governor Mitt Romney."I have never endorsed Mr. Novak's service in the party," Crate said in the statement. "The charges against him are strictly related to his private business dealings and have absolutely no connection to the Republican Party. The Massachusetts Republican Party abides by the highest ethical standards, and we will continue to maintain those standards as we continue our work to elect Republicans in Massachusetts."

The state GOP and Romney will probably return Novak's donations from recent years, Republican Party executive director Tim O'Brien said. Novak donated $750 last year to the state Republican Party's federal campaign account and $125 to Romney during his 2002 campaign for governor.

Romney press secretary Julie Teer released a statement on the governor's behalf: "Mr. Novak's resignation was the appropriate action for him to take for the good of the Massachusetts Republican Party. Governor Romney believes his continued service would have been a distraction to the state committee's work, which is always carried out with the highest ethical standards."

Novak, a 54-year-old lawyer running for Brockton City Council on an anticrime platform, was secretly recorded arranging to hide $107,000 for his client, an alleged drug dealer, according to an affidavit. The client, Scott Holyoke, repeatedly inform ed Novak that the money was obtained through the illegal sales of methamphetamines, federal authorities allege.

Bay State Democratic Party chairman Philip W. Johnston said the Republican Party's state committee should have known that electing Novak as vice chairman would create the potential for public relations trouble.

Lawmakers Say Tough Ethics Proposal In Works (TENN)

By TRENT SEIBERT, Staff Writer

The Tennessean, September 15, 2005

Ethics legislation began to take shape yesterday as a panel of legislators unveiled proposals to prevent some of the problems revealed by the FBI's Operation Tennessee Waltz sting.

But to some, the movement toward tougher laws for lawmakers is creeping along.

At yesterday's meeting of the 12-member panel — its third — the discussion revolved not around ethics, but largely around how lawmakers can efficiently use the state's electronic filing system for disclosures of their campaign contributions.

"I guess I'm frustrated, I'll tell you that," said Sen. Ron Ramsey, R-Blountville, a member of the committee and the Senate's majority leader. "I just hope at the next committee meeting we come out with some proposed legislation."

It was only in the last few minutes of the hours-long meeting that its leaders said they had plans for tougher ethics legislation. They put off discussion of those proposals until Oct. 10.

Some of those ideas include:

• Limiting cash contributions to campaigns.

• Requiring those who make campaign donations to list their employers.

• Requiring lobbyists to disclose how much they spend to wine and dine lawmakers.

• Auditing lobbyists and campaign funds.

• Providing subpoena power to the Registry of Election Finance.

• Creating a state ethics commission to investigate complaints against lawmakers.

The roles of campaign donations and lobbyists in the political process in Tennessee have been under much public scrutiny this year after the arrests of five sitting and former lawmakers in the Tennessee Waltz bribery sting.

House Majority Leader Kim McMillan, D-Clarksville, and also a member of the committee, said she hoped to see a bill crafted in early October, sponsored by members of both parties.

"This is not a partisan issue. This is an institutional issue," McMillan said.

McMillan also said she hopes to soon have a final report from Gov. Phil Bredesen's citizen ethics panel, which is drafting its own ideas on how to tighten ethics laws.

McMillan said she hopes to have a final agreement on legislation soon after that.

Sen. Roy Herron, D-Dresden, who pushed for the creation of this joint committee, said he was not concerned that the process to create new ethics laws was a slow one. Because the laws probably would not go into effect until next year, he said, as long as something is in place by then, everything should work out.

"Doing this right is what's most important," Herron said.

FBI Raids Denver Lawyer's Office (RMN)

By John Accola, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, September 15, 2005

Federal agents raided the downtown offices of a Denver law firm Tuesday, seizing computers and records for evidence in an undisclosed FBI probe.

Witnesses said as many as 20 agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation searched the 11th-floor offices of Futro & Associates PC at 1401 17th St.

Advertisement

The small law firm is headed by Denver attorney Peter Futro, who until last May was chairman of U.S. MedSys Corp., a one-time Denver company that is now the subject of a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation.

Through a privately held company he controls, Futro, 62, had an 83 percent stake in U.S. MedSys as recently as a year ago, when the over-the-counter stock went on a trading high, reaching nearly $7 a share before falling back to its more typical 40 cents to 80 cents range.

At its high point, the company had a short-lived market capitalization of $170 million. U.S. MedSys is described as a network marketing and distributing organization that provides technology and support services to the health care industry, according to Yahoo! Finance.

The stock spike has never been fully explained but appears to be related to investor speculation that MedSys, despite zero revenues, had a distribution lock on a state-of-the-art ultrasound imaging machine.

Futro, who specializes in corporate governance and securities law, wouldn't comment Wednesday on either of his roles at MedSys Corp. or Futro & Associates.

"It's a confidential client-related matter," he said of the FBI search that lasted most of Tuesday.

The law firm's swank offices at the Alamo Plaza building are listed as the former headquarters of MedSys, which relocated to New Jersey following the resignations of Futro, Chief Executive Thomas King and two other board directors, George Anagnost and Kenton Sieckman.

Also during May, it was reported that Futro's privately held Rangeley Corp. sold its majority MedSys stake to Montague Investments Inc., although Futro and the law firm retained nearly 800,000 shares.

MedSys' filings with the SEC didn't say why they resigned. It was several months earlier, in February, that the company disclosed it was the subject of a formal SEC investigation of unknown scope.

On Wednesday, Jacob Futro - a former MedSys executive and Peter Futro's son - spoke briefly with a Rocky Mountain News reporter before a security guard was summoned to escort the reporter out.

"There's a lot going on," said the junior Futro. "I wish we could talk about it."

Teamster President Claims Company Illegally Taped Talks (BRA)

By PENNY BROWN ROBERTS, Advocate staff writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 15, 2005

In new court documents filed in federal court last month, Teamsters Local 5 President Byron Keith Partin contends the FBI convinced Formosa Human Resources Manager Tim LeBlanc to record as many as eight conversations in 2001.

Partin's lawyer -- Lewis Unglesby -- argues in two separate motions that secretly recording labor contract negotiations is a violation of the National Labor Relations Act. The motions seek to have the tapes thrown out and the case dismissed.

"To allow these tapes will overturn years of carefully considered National Labor Relations Board law, and will make any labor negotiation subject to FBI oversight overnight at the secret request of either party," Unglesby writes. "While it is very doubtful the FBI knew of -- nor considered -- this law as it wired up Tim LeBlanc, Formosa surely knew."

Partin, 43, of Ethel was charged in a bill of information in November with blackmail -- a misdemeanor that carries a maximum sentence of one year and a fine of $100,000.

Federal authorities say Partin threatened to report the company for illegally discharging ethylene dicloride into the Mississippi River if it didn't pay the wages of eight union members for hours of work they missed during the negotiations.

At the time, Formosa and its workers were engaged in talks on a new three-year labor contract for 230 hourly employees.

Union workers went on strike for five days in June 2001 in a dispute about wages, overtime policies and benefits.

Unglesby also argues that Partin's attempts to get committee members paid during contract negotiations was "perfectly legal."

Partin never reported the alleged discharge, the lawyer notes, and Formosa never paid the committee members.

Unglesby also argues that Formosa used the tapes and subsequent investigation to decertify the union. Teamsters represented Formosa workers for nearly four decades, but employees voted to decertify the union in April 2004.

In their reply to Unglesby's motion to dismiss the case, prosecutors argue that Partin's threats to report the company in exchange for payment to negotiators were "unlawful."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Chad Ennis writes that Partin threatened to "reveal 'the whole story' about Formosa's release of ethylene dichloride into the Mississippi River" if the company didn't pay the eight negotiators.

"This," Ennis writes, "is a clear act of coercion under the standard definition."

Neither LeBlanc nor Plant Manager Kelly Serio returned calls to their offices Wednesday.

Fort Lauderdale Residents Face Federal Real Estate Fraud Charges (FLSUNSEN)

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 15, 2005

Federal authorities arrested two Fort Lauderdale residents Tuesday on more than a dozen charges involving real estate and bankruptcy fraud, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

Edward Garnett, 62, and Shirley Akey, 69, lied on loan applications about income, assets, and tax information, a U.S. Attorney's Office news release says.

According to the release, the two racked up $1.4 million in loans, which Akey laundered through different bank accounts. Garnett also hid money and assets from a bankruptcy proceeding.

Both were arrested on one count of conspiracy, three counts of loan application fraud, two counts of mail fraud, three counts of wire fraud and three counts of money laundering. Garnett was charged with an additional count of loan application fraud, two additional counts of mail fraud and three counts of bankruptcy fraud.

Penalties for the charges could total more than 100 years in prison and $6 million in fines.

Charges Stun Family, Friends (DEN)

Detroit News, September 15, 2005

ANN ARBOR -- On Monday, three 17-year-old Pioneer High School students were worrying about keeping up their grades and where to go to college next fall.

Today, they're spending their third day in the county jail, facing a lengthy prison sentence if convicted in the Aug. 22 robbery of an Ann Arbor bank.

On Wednesday, the mothers of two of the students put their arms around each other as they watched grainy black and white closed-circuit video of their sons' brief arraignment on three felony charges. All three are charged as adults.

One is the son of an auto executive and went to Minnesota this summer to visit a music school and who plays lacrosse.

Another runs the 100-yard dash and works part time at a local restaurant, while the third does volunteer work -- including handing out apples at University of Michigan football games.

About 50 classmates packed the jail waiting room, some of them crying while they watched the proceedings.

Prosecutors contend that in the waning days of a quiet Ann Arbor summer, two of the students, Charles Spencer Heath and Brian Keith Jackson, robbed the Bank One branch on West Stadium and made off with about $19,000 -- after they had demanded $50,000 and access to the vault while brandishing a toy gun.

They apparently spent some of the money on clothes and music equipment and the alleged motive, lawyers say, was simply to get money. None of the three has any prior criminal record, and none has been in any serious disciplinary trouble at school.

The third student, Brian Christopher White, the son of a former teacher and a Big Three auto executive, told police he allowed his friends to use his car, but didn't know they planned to rob the bank, according to a written statement he gave police. He is charged with conspiracy and bank robbery -- even though police say he didn't enter the bank Aug. 22.

White's lawyer, Daniel Geherin, offered a letter of character from Ann Arbor school board President Karen D. Cross.

"I think it's safe to say people's jaws dropped when they heard about the charges," Geherin said. "No one expected this. I think the alleged motive is pretty straightforward: to get money."

But the magistrate was not impressed.

Citing the three as a threat to the community and the seriousness of the charges, she set bond at $100,000 cash for each of them. Their parents might be required to put up their homes as collateral.

The three students will have a chance to get a reduced bond Wednesday, when they face a preliminary examination in Ann Arbor District Court. All three likely will remain in the Washtenaw County Jail until then.

Jackson's lawyer, Michael J. Vincent, said his client was scared.

"He's petrified. He's as scared as any 17-year-old sitting in the Washtenaw County Jail would be."

Heath's lawyer, Joseph Simon, noted his client had been doing much better in school this year and was getting "all A's currently."

Heath has lived in Ann Arbor for all but two years, when his parents went to the Dominican Republic to do missionary work for their church, Simon said.

Heath did a number of volunteer activities at the Free Methodist Church in Ypsilanti. One activity of his youth group is to pass out apples at U-M football games.

Simon added that if the allegations are true: "What a shame. What a waste for these kids."

Parents of the three declined to comment.

Two of the students were arrested in class Monday without incident, while the third was arrested later.

Police arrested but later released a fourth Ann Arbor man. He has not been charged in connection with the robbery.

The three said little during their court appearances. When Jackson approached the microphone in the jail, he was asked to state his name.

"Hi, I'm Brian Jackson," he said.

None of the three showed any reaction when they received the stiff bond. A bail bondsman took notes and quietly talked to each of the three families about what might be necessary to get their children out of jail.

Some students wearing Pioneer High T-shirts or hats shook their heads when the magistrate refused to set a lower bond.

"People can't believe it. I can't believe they did it. If they did do it, well they're going to have to face the music," said Owen Fly, 16, a junior at Pioneer High School, the state's largest high school with 3,000 students.

All three teenagers are considered adults under Michigan law and face up to life in prison if convicted on the armed robbery, bank robbery and conspiracy charges. Under Michigan's sentencing guidelines, a conviction on a first offense is generally not a probationary offense and calls for prison time, typically at least four or five years, lawyers for the three said.

The three also could get their driver's licenses suspended after allegedly using a car to commit a felony.

The armed robbery charge carries a mandatory minimum two-year sentence.

The FBI also investigated the case, but it's unlikely the U.S. Attorney's Office will seek to charge the three federally. That would require getting permission of the Justice Department in Washington -- a cumbersome process -- because they are younger than 18.

Jefferson Begins To Fight Charges (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, September 15, 2005

Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), under investigation by the FBI, went on the defensive Wednesday in the wake of a damaging ABC News report that the Congressman allegedly used National Guard resources to gather personal belongings from his New Orleans home amid the Hurricane Katrina rescue operation.

Jefferson is apparently gearing up for a tough legal fight. He recently retained defense attorney Robert Trout of the Washington, D.C., law firm Trout Cacheris, in addition to his New Orleans-based attorney, Michael Fawer. Trout is a former federal prosecutor. Jefferson also recently set up a legal defense fund.

Jefferson, according to sources, spoke to his colleagues at the Congressional Black Caucus meeting Wednesday. During the session, the Louisiana Democrat defended his tour of his damaged district on Sept. 2 and insisted that the ABC story that aired Tuesday night distorted the facts and misrepresented his actions.

In an interview, Melanie Rouffell, a Jefferson spokeswoman, reiterated her boss's belief that the story was unfair, noting that National Guard officials refused to let the Congressman tour the devastated area without the presence of armed guards.

She said that Jefferson was only doing his job by trying to assess the damage in his district and that he was concerned about his neighbors, whom he knew had not evacuated their homes.

"There is no story," Rouffell said. "There's no misuse of anything. If he had been able to tour the city on his own, he would have done so. And he would have preferred to."

But even as some of Jefferson's colleagues defended their friend, some Democrats wonder about the broader implications that the FBI investigation could have for their party. The Congressman had his homes in New Orleans and Washington, D.C., searched last month as part of an ongoing FBI investigation.

Authorities are investigating whether Jefferson illegally pocketed hundreds of thousands of dollars from a start-up technology firm during an FBI-authorized sting, according to published reports.

"People appreciate the seriousness of the allegations," said one CBC member, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "I don't think anyone has drawn any conclusions or is attempting to prejudge the matter."

Others, however, made it clear that they were prepared to stick by Jefferson.

"I'm going to be fully supportive of him all the way through to the ultimate disposition and beyond," said Rep. Mel Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the CBC.

Watt praised his colleague's character and called him "an outstanding legislator and a wonderful friend."

But the CBC chairman acknowledged that in the end, the disposition of the Caucus is not politically important.

"Mr. Jefferson doesn't need my support," he said. "He is an elected representative answerable to his constituents. He's not answerable to the Congressional Black Caucus."

According to the ABC News report, Jefferson emerged from his house after about an hour with three suitcases, a laptop and a box about the size of a refrigerator.

Rouffell said that information was inaccurate and that Jefferson took two suitcases, his daughter's laptop and a box that contained another suitcase, which was to be shipped to his daughter.

"The story gives the impression that he asked the National Guard to go with him to retrieve his personal items," she said. "That was not the purpose of it."

The ABC News report and the ongoing investigation of Jefferson may have broader implications for Democrats, as they seek to capitalize on ethical improprieties by Congressional Republicans.

Democrats have sought to highlight the ethical troubles of Republicans such as House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (Texas) and House Administration Chairman Bob Ney (Ohio) as proof of a broader culture of corruption within the GOP-run Congress.

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said he "doesn't know much about" the August searches of Jefferson's home, office and vehicle, aside from the fact that an investigation is ongoing.

But the Maryland Democrat said that "if somebody has acted unethically or committed criminal offenses, we need to hold them accountable."

"Let's see what the facts are," Hoyer said later. "But if the facts are such that there is an ethical violation or there is a criminal violation, then I think it is appropriate for the ethics committee and for perhaps the Congress to act, period, whether it is a Democrat or a Republican."

Hoyer added that the Jefferson case "raises the public's concern about the ethics and legality with which the Congress is operating, and we ought to look into that."

The National Republican Congressional Committee circulated the ABC News story to reporters Wednesday morning under the headline "In Case You Missed It."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

New Justice Unit To Probe Old Bias Cases (AP-Y2)

By Sam Hananel, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 15, 2005

A new Justice Department office would investigate and prosecute "cold case" murders from the civil rights era, under a measure approved by the Senate on Wednesday.

The Unsolved Crimes Section would target pre-1970 homicides motivated by racial hatred that remain unsolved, often because of lax state and federal prosecution at the time they occurred.

The bill was inspired by efforts to reopen the case of Emmett Till, a 14-year old black boy who was murdered in 1955 after being accused of whistling at a white woman in Mississippi, said Sen. Jim Talent (news, bio, voting record), R-Mo., who sponsored the legislation with Sen. Christopher Dodd (news, bio, voting record), D-Conn.

"We want the murderers and their accomplices who are still living to know there's an entire section of the Department of Justice that is going after them," Talent said in a statement. "We need to unearth the truth and do justice because there cannot be healing without the truth."

The Senate voted by unanimous consent to add the measure to the massive Commerce, Justice and Science appropriations bill, expected to pass the Senate this week.

A House-passed version of the bill does not include the civil rights measure, but lawmakers will try to include it in legislation that emerges from a conference committee.

Talent and Dodd introduced the bill in June, shortly after a Mississippi court sentenced 80-year-old former Klansman Edgar Ray Killen to 60 years in jail for the slayings of three civil rights workers in 1964.

Killen was the latest in a string of elderly suspects tried and convicted for decades-old crimes committed at a time when justice was out of reach for many American blacks.

The new office has been compared to Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, which focuses on finding and deporting former Nazis living in the United States.

The bill authorizes up to $5 million a year for the unit to investigate and try cases, working together with state and local law enforcement officials. If a crime other than murder is discovered, it would be referred to the criminal section of the Justice Department's civil rights division.

Federal Judge Rules Against Pledge (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, September 15, 2005

A federal judge in Sacramento ruled Wednesday that teacher-led recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools violates the Constitution's protection of religious freedom because the pledge refers to "one Nation under God."

The ruling, by U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton, revives a legal challenge to the 51-year-old version of the Pledge. The U.S. Supreme Court rejected that challenge last year. The case may be headed that way again. Derek Gaubatz, lawyer for students who want to keep the Pledge, says the decision will be appealed to the Supreme Court "if necessary … as quickly as possible."

DOJ_NMG_0005467

In June 2004, five of the Supreme Court's nine justices found that Sacramento atheist Michael Newdow did not have custody of his school-age daughter and thus could not challenge school district policy that allowed teachers to lead students in a voluntary recitation of the Pledge.

The decision enabled the high court to dodge a battle over whether the phrase "under God" carries a religious meaning that is unacceptable under the Constitution's First Amendment, which forbids government endorsement of religion. The court also avoided deciding whether reciting the Pledge in schools is a coerced religious practice.

Newdow refiled the case in January and added as plaintiffs two sets of anonymous atheist parents who also have children in Sacramento-area schools. On Wednesday, Karlton ruled that the new plaintiffs were qualified to sue although Newdow isn't.

Because the Supreme Court had rejected Newdow's challenge on procedural grounds and not on its merits, Karlton wrote, he was required to reinstate an earlier federal appeals court ruling in the case that had struck down the recitation of the pledge.

In 2003, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals found teacher-led recitation of the Pledge to be "coercive" because it "places students in the untenable position of choosing between participating in an exercise with religious content or protesting."

That ruling, Karlton wrote, is "binding precedent" on him as a "judge of a subordinate court."

Newdow, a physician and a lawyer, said he was "very pleased" by Karlton's ruling. "The Pledge is wrong, and the (school district) government is wrong here," Newdow said.

Gaubatz said Karlton's ruling showed that he was afraid to address the heart of the matter. "Basically, he punted and let the 9th Circuit do his dirty work," said Gaubatz, litigation director for the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, a research and legal advocacy group in Washington, D.C.

The phrase "under God" was added to the Pledge of Allegiance by Congress in 1954 after a campaign by the Knights of Columbus, a Catholic men's group. The Supreme Court has never ruled on the constitutionality of reciting the pledge in public schools and has a mixed record in other cases involving the public invocation of the deity. For instance, it has struck down prayer at school graduations but has upheld chaplain-led prayers offered at the opening of Congress.

Pledge Of Allegiance In Public Schools Ruled Unconstitutional (LAT)

By Maura Dolan

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal judge in Sacramento ruled today that requiring schoolchildren to recite the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance is unconstitutional, reviving a legal battle by an atheist who lost his first round in the U.S. Supreme Court.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence K. Karlton said he was bound by a U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals decision in the earlier lawsuit that the reference to God violated the constitution's requirement of separation of church and state.

Michael A. Newdow, the atheist who brought that case, eventually lost when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that he did not have legal standing to sue on behalf of his grade-school daughter because he did not have primary custody of her.

Karlton, however, said Newdow's current lawsuit may go forward because parents with full custody of their children are involved in the lawsuit. Today's ruling is expected to be appealed. He said he would issue a restraining order blocking the recitation of the pledge in four Sacramento-area school districts named in the lawsuit.

A spokesman for the Elk Grove, Calif., Unified School District, one of the school districts sued, said the judge had not yet issued an order prohibiting the recitation of the pledge in the classroom.

Asked about a possible appeal, Jim Elliott, director of communications, said, "We continue to support the Pledge of Allegiance as a patriotic exercise."

Newdow could not be reached for comment.

Any order enforcing Karlton's decision would not extend beyond the Elk Grove Unified, Rio Linda and Elverta Joint Elementary school districts in Sacramento County, where the plaintiffs' children attend.

Today's ruling comes as Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr. is in his third day of his confirmation hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee. He would succeed the late William H. Rehnquist as chief justice.

DOJ_NMG_0005468

The Becket Fund, a religious rights group that is a party to the case, said it would immediately appeal the case to the San Francisco-based U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. If the court does not change its precedent, the group would go to the Supreme Court.

"It's a way to get this issue to the Supreme Court for a final decision to be made," said fund attorney Jared Leland.

The decisions by Karlton and the 9th Circuit conflict with an August opinion by the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. That court upheld a Virginia law requiring public schools to lead daily Pledge of Allegiance recitation, which is similar to the requirement in California.

Karlton, appointed to the Sacramento bench in 1979 by President Jimmy Carter, wrote that the case concerned "the ongoing struggle as to the role of religion in the civil life of this nation," and added that his opinion "will satisfy no one involved in that debate."

Judge Rules Pledge Of Allegiance In Calif. Schools Unconstitutional (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 14 -- A federal judge ruled Wednesday that the law requiring the recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools is unconstitutional and said he was ready to issue an injunction to three California school districts to halt the daily reciting of the pledge.

Terming the case "a cause celebre in the ongoing struggle as to the role of religion in the civil life of this nation," U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton ruled that the pledge's reference to "one nation under God" violates children's right to be "free from a coercive requirement to affirm God."

Michael A. Newdow, the atheist resident of Sacramento whose previous case against the pledge's words "under God" was rejected last year by the Supreme Court on procedural grounds, said he will ask the judge to issue a restraining order halting the pledge at the Elk Grove Unified, Rio Linda and Elverta Joint Elementary school districts in Sacramento County. A lawyer for the districts told the Associated Press he was not prepared to comment on the case.

Newdow, speaking from his cell phone in El Paso, Tex., said he was pleased by the verdict but expects a tough legal fight ahead. "It'll be emotional when it's ruled that all Americans should be treated equally," he said. "This is a start towards that, but we still have a ways to go." He said he wants the Pledge of Allegiance restored to its original text, approved by Congress in 1942, with no mention of God.

Jared Leland, a lawyer for the Washington-based Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, which fought the case, said he had expected the verdict but that his group, which represented students and parents of students in the case, will appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit. In the case, Leland also represented the Knights of Columbus, which started using the revised pledge in 1951 as the Cold War heated up. The Knights lobbied Congress and the Eisenhower administration to officially change the pledge in 1954.

"The pendulum is swinging in the wrong direction in our country," Leland said. "Mike Newdow is on a train whose destination is designed to hide and undermine the role of religion in public life. We want to restore religion to the public square."

In his ruling, which he acknowledged will "satisfy no one involved" in the debate about the role of religion in public life, Karlton said he was bound by precedent from the appeals court, which in 2002 ruled in favor of Newdow that the pledge is unconstitutional when recited in public schools.

Last year, the Supreme Court dismissed the case, saying that Newdow lacked standing because he did not have custody of his elementary school daughter, on whose behalf he sued.

Newdow then filed a similar suit on behalf of three unnamed parents and their children. Karlton, ruling in Sacramento, said those families have the right to sue and, arguing that he was bowing to the 9th Circuit court's initial ruling on the pledge, ruled in their favor.

Wednesday's ruling increases the chance that the case could return to the Supreme Court because the 9th Circuit's ruling on Newdow's suit clashes with an opinion, issued in August, by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit in Richmond. That court upheld a Virginia law requiring public schools to lead daily Pledge of Allegiance recitation, saying the pledge is a patriotic exercise, not a religious affirmation similar to a prayer.

Judge Rules Reciting Pledge In Schools Is Unconstitutional (NYT)

By Dean E. Murphy

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 14 - A federal judge in Sacramento ruled Wednesday that reciting the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools was an unconstitutional endorsement of religion, once again igniting a firestorm over the appropriateness of the pledge's reference to "under God."

The judge, Lawrence K. Karlton of Federal District Court, said that the decision would "satisfy no one involved" in the debate over "the role of religion in the civil life of this nation," but that he was bound by a ruling in 2002 by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco.

In that ruling, the Ninth Circuit concluded the recitation of the pledge, even if noncompulsory, "impermissibly coerces a religious act" and "places students in the untenable position of choosing between participating in an exercise with religious content or protesting."

The ruling Wednesday was denounced by conservative religious groups that urged its appeal. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, issued a similar plea.

Judge Karlton's decision came in a lawsuit brought by Michael Newdow, an atheist whose daughter attends a public school in Elk Grove, a suburb of Sacramento, and two families with children in two other school districts in the Sacramento area.

Mr. Newdow lost a similar case last year when the United States Supreme Court ruled that he had no legal standing to bring the lawsuit because he did not have custody of his daughter. The justices left open the question of the pledge's constitutionality, prompting Mr. Newdow to try again with the additional plaintiffs.

Judge Karlton said that Mr. Newdow still lacked standing, but ruled that the two families, who were not identified in the lawsuit, were entitled to sue. Mr. Newdow said that he was disappointed but not surprised by the determination on his standing, but that the decision on the pledge's constitutionality would apply to all students in the three school districts.

"It will still affect my child as much as anyone else's," he said in a telephone interview from El Paso, where he was working at a hospital.

A spokesman for the Elk Grove Unified School District said teachers were notified Wednesday that they should continue leading students in the pledge because the judge's ruling did not include an injunction stopping the practice. Judge Karlton indicated that he would issue an injunction if one was requested, but Mr. Newdow said that he had not decided whether to seek one.

"I will probably do that, but I have clients now I have to talk to first," said Mr. Newdow, who is the lawyer in the case in addition to being a doctor. "Unfortunately, I haven't had a chance to read this thing yet."

At a news conference attended by officials from the three districts, Steven M. Ladd, the Elk Grove superintendent, said that no decision on an appeal had been made but that he would not be surprised if the schools challenged the ruling "so as to resolve this matter once and for all."

The Elk Grove district defended itself against the previous lawsuit by Mr. Newdow. "Our board has long supported the Pledge of Allegiance as an appropriate patriotic exercise for willing students," Mr. Ladd said. "We are disappointed that our district, as well as two other school districts listed in this complaint, need to continue to devote time, energy, and resources to defend this case. These are resources we could otherwise use on our mission of teaching and learning."

A lawyer for the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, a religious rights group that has joined the school districts in defending the case, said there was no doubt the ruling would be appealed.

The group's lawyer, Jared N. Leland, said he would not be surprised if the issue ended up before the Supreme Court, particularly since the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit last month upheld a law in Virginia that requires the recitation of the pledge in public schools. That court found that the pledge was "a patriotic activity" not a religious one.

DOJ_NMG_0005470

In the Supreme Court's ruling dismissing Mr. Newdow's previous lawsuit, the three dissenting justices indicated they would have upheld the constitutionality of "under God" had the case gone forward. The phrase was added to the pledge in 1954.

Federal Judge: Pledge Of Allegiance In Public Schools Is Unconstitutional (LAW/AP)

By David Kravets, The Associated Press

Law.com, September 15, 2005

A federal judge declared the reciting of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools unconstitutional Wednesday in a case brought by the same atheist whose previous battle against the words "under God" was rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court on procedural grounds.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton ruled that the pledge's reference to one nation "under God" violates schoolchildren's right to be "free from a coercive requirement to affirm God."

Karlton said he was bound by precedent of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which in 2002 ruled in favor of Sacramento atheist Michael Newdow that the pledge is unconstitutional when recited in public schools.

The Supreme Court dismissed the case last year, saying Newdow lacked standing because he did not have custody of his elementary school daughter he sued on behalf of.

Newdow, an attorney and a medical doctor, filed an identical case on behalf of three unnamed parents and their children. Karlton said those families have the right to sue.

Karlton, ruling in Sacramento, Calif., said he would sign a restraining order preventing the recitation of the pledge at the Elk Grove Unified, Rio Linda and Elverta Joint Elementary school districts in Sacramento County, where the plaintiffs' children attend.

The order would not extend beyond those districts unless it is affirmed by a higher court, in which case it would apply to nine western states.

The decision sets up another showdown over the pledge in schools, at a time when the makeup of the Supreme Court is in flux.

Wednesday's ruling comes as Supreme Court nominee John Roberts faces day three of his confirmation hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee. He would succeed the late William H. Rehnquist as chief justice.

In July, Sandra Day O'Connor announced her plans to retire when a successor is confirmed.

The Becket Fund, a religious rights group that is a party to the case, said it would immediately appeal the case to the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. If the court does not change its precedent, the group would go to the Supreme Court.

"It's a way to get this issue to the Supreme Court for a final decision to be made," said fund attorney Jared Leland.

The decisions by Karlton and the 9th Circuit conflict with an August opinion by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. That court upheld a Virginia law requiring public schools lead daily Pledge of Allegiance recitation, which is similar to the requirement in California.

A three-judge panel of that circuit ruled that the pledge is a patriotic exercise, not a religious affirmation similar to a prayer.

"Undoubtedly, the pledge contains a religious phrase, and it is demeaning to persons of any faith to assert that the words 'under God' contain no religious significance," Judge Karen Williams wrote for the 4th Circuit. "The inclusion of those two words, however, does not alter the nature of the pledge as a patriotic activity."

Newdow, reached at his home, was not immediately prepared to comment.

Karlton, appointed to the Sacramento bench in 1979 by President Carter, wrote that the case concerned "the ongoing struggle as to the role of religion in the civil life of this nation" and added that his opinion "will satisfy no one involved in that debate."

Karlton dismissed claims that the 1954 Congressional legislation inserting the words "under God" was unconstitutional. If his ruling stands, he reasoned that the schoolchildren and their parents in the case would not be harmed by the phrase because they would no longer have to recite it at school.

Terence Cassidy, a lawyer representing the school districts, said he was reviewing the opinion and was not immediately prepared to comment.

Pledge Unconstitutional At Public Schools, Judge Says (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, September 15, 2005

Sept. 14 (Bloomberg) -- A federal judge in California said the recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools is unconstitutional, in a ruling that will rekindle a debate over the use of the phrase ``under God."

Judge Lawrence Karlton in Sacramento, California, today said that a school district's policy requiring the pledge with the phrase ``under God" is unconstitutional. The case was brought by Michael Newdow, an atheist who had previously sued to challenge the use of the phrase.

The U.S. Supreme Court last year vacated a decision that said a California school district violated the Constitution's separation of church and state clause by requiring teachers to lead the pledge. The justices didn't decide whether the pledge was constitutional, instead ruling that Newdow lacked the right to bring the challenge. Newdow overcame the hurdle by including students who live in the district in today's case.

Karlton said he followed a previous ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals based in San Francisco. Newdow's claims ``are resolved because the 9th Circuit has held that the school policy mandating the pledge is unconstitutional," Karlton wrote.

Derek Gaubatz, director of litigation for the Washington- based Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, said his group would appeal today's decision. Gaubatz said he represents 10 students and their parents in the Sacramento case.

Immediate Appeal

``We object to the ruling that the pledge violates any part of the establishment clause," Gaubatz said. ``We will immediately appeal" the ruling to a federal appeals court, ``and if necessary to the Supreme Court to get that ruling reversed to secure the constitutionality of the pledge once and for all."

Newdow, a Sacramento lawyer, didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

Today's ruling doesn't require the four Sacramento-area public school districts Newdow sued to change their practice of reciting the pledge. Karlton said he'd issue a restraining order ``upon a properly supported motion."

Karlton's ruling is likely to take on more prominence as the U.S. Senate considers the confirmation of U.S. Supreme Court Justice nominee John Roberts. The ruling was released during a hearing today in Washington.

``This is an example, in my opinion, of where judges do not protect us from having the government impose religion on us, but declare war on all things religious," Senator Lindsey Graham, a Republican from South Carolina, said during Roberts' hearing.

The school districts are the Elk Grove Unified School District, Sacramento City Unified School District, Elverta Joint Elementary School District and the Rio Linda School District.

The case is Newdow v. Congress of the United States of America, No. S-05-17, in U.S. District Court in Sacramento.

Judge Rules Against Pledge In Schools (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

A California federal judge yesterday ruled it is unconstitutional to require children to recite the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton's ruling came in a revised lawsuit brought by Michael Newdow, an atheist whose first bid to remove the words "under God" from the pledge was rejected last year by the Supreme Court.

"The pledge is an unconstitutional violation of the children's right to be free from a coercive requirement to affirm God," Judge Karlton wrote in yesterday's decision.

Three Sacramento-area school districts were named in the retooled suit, which features a new set of plaintiffs, including the atheist parents of a seventh-grader and the divorced atheist parent of a third-grader and a kindergartner.

Judge Karlton, 70, was appointed to the court in 1979 by President Carter. The judge cited a 2003 decision by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals "that the school districts' policies violate the establishment clause" as the reason for his decision.

A jubilant Mr. Newdow hailed the news.

"I'm excited," he said in an interview. "It's good now that the judge has agreed with me and that the Constitution was upheld. We'll see how long that lasts."

The judge also told Mr. Newdow he would sign a restraining order preventing the recitation of the pledge at the Elk Grove Unified, Rio Linda Union and Elverta Joint Elementary school districts, where the plaintiffs' children attend.

Mr. Newdow promised he'd file a restraining order soon.

House and Senate Republicans criticized Judge Karlton's ruling.

"The Pledge of Allegiance is a vital, ennobling part of our national identity, and the American people resoundingly support its value in the education of our children," said House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas. "The ruling is wrong, period, and I look forward to its reversal."

"This is yet another example of an irresponsible decision by a liberal activist judge unable to separate personal politics from public service," said Sen. John Thune, South Dakota Republican. "As we work to fill two vacancies in the highest court of the land, today's news only serves to underscore the importance of appointing judicial nominees who refuse to allow their personal views to shape decisions."

During oral arguments for the case in July, Judge Karlton threw out several parts of Mr. Newdow's revised lawsuit, saying the plaintiff's argument that the entire pledge is unconstitutional would not make it past a higher court. Rather, the judge said, the case should focus on whether saying the pledge in public schools is an unacceptable endorsement of religion.

Derek Gaubatz, director of litigation for the Becket Fund, a religious liberties group opposing Mr. Newdow, described the judge as an "old-time liberal."

"He telegraphed to everyone how he wanted to rule," Mr. Gaubatz said. "He wanted to strike the pledge down, but he wanted to rely on the prior 9th Circuit decision so they could do his dirty work."

He said the Becket Fund will appeal the case to the 9th Circuit, which sided with Mr. Newdow in 2003. The Supreme Court struck down that ruling in June 2004, but did not rule on the merits of the case. Instead, the high court said Mr. Newdow, the divorced, noncustodial father of a fourth-grader in the Elk Grove district, did not have legal standing as a plaintiff.

Lee Strang, an assistant law professor at Ave Maria School of Law in Ann Arbor, Mich., said the public should not be surprised that the issue has resurfaced.

"The Supreme Court has been all over the map on this issue," he said. "Their establishment clause case law has been such a muddle because you have these shifting coalitions of justices who come together to arrive at sometimes unprincipled results."

Judge Karlton was "pushing the limits" of his job description, Mr. Strang said, "but judges have been known to guide litigants in subtle and not-so-subtle ways."

"I think the judge made the right call," said Rob Boston of Americans United for Separation of Church and State. "The whole question of patriotism and the religious content of the pledge hasn't been explored like it should be. A student should be able to express patriotism and love of country without making a religious affirmation at the same time."

Massachusetts Rejects Bill To Eliminate Gay Marriage (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

BOSTON, Sept. 14 - In a sign that the legalization of same-sex marriage has changed the political landscape in Massachusetts, the legislature soundly defeated a proposed constitutional amendment on Wednesday to ban gay marriage and create civil unions, an amendment that lawmakers gave preliminary approval to in a raucous constitutional convention last year.

Wednesday's 157-to-39 vote by a joint session of the House and Senate partly reflected the fact that some legislators now consider same-sex marriage more politically acceptable, after a largely conflict-free year in which some 6,600 same-sex couples got married and lawmakers who supported it got re-elected.

The vote also reflected some lawmakers' reluctance to pass a bill that could either withdraw rights from already married couples or create a class of married gay men and lesbians and a class of those unable to marry.

Indeed, Senator Brian P. Lees, a Republican who is the minority leader and who co-sponsored the amendment, which received preliminary approval from the legislature in March 2004 in a 105-to-92 vote, said he voted against it Wednesday.

"Today, gay marriage is the law of the land," Mr. Lees said, noting that same-sex marriage became legal in May 2004. Voting for the amendment, he said, would mean "taking action against our friends and neighbors who today are currently enjoying the benefits of marriage."

Saying he had heard from over 7,000 constituents, most against the amendment, Mr. Lees added, "Gay marriage has begun and life has not changed for the citizens of the commonwealth, with the exception of those who can now marry who could not before."

Wednesday's vote also reflected a change in the strategy of opponents of same-sex marriage.

Last year some legislators who opposed both same-sex marriage and civil unions voted for the amendment because they considered it their best chance at preserving marriage for heterosexuals.

This year, after it appeared that the amendment would fail, many opponents of same-sex marriage started a citizens' petition for a stricter amendment that would ban same-sex marriage without creating civil unions.

The earliest that amendment, endorsed by Gov. Mitt Romney, could become law is 2008. Supporters must get 65,000 signatures, the votes of 50 lawmakers in two consecutive legislative sessions and the approval of voters in a referendum. Both sides expect a difficult fight.

Representative Philip Travis, a Democrat and opponent of same-sex marriage, argued Wednesday for the stricter amendment.

"The union of two women and two men can never consummate a marriage," Mr. Travis said. "It's physically impossible. We can't get around that."

In contrast to last year's long sessions packed with activists, Wednesday's session lasted two hours and drew smaller, calmer crowds.

Juan Carlos Huertas was one of a few dozen opponents of same-sex marriage singing Christian hymns at the statehouse. Mr. Huertas said that the idea that marriage is between a man and a woman is "written in the Scripture."

Nearby were about 200 supporters of same-sex marriage, some with T-shirts or buttons that said "I Do."

For weeks, same-sex couples and supporters met with legislators to present their case. Elaine Lamy, 49, and Chris Hannibal, 50, of Quincy, who married last year, met with Representative Bruce J. Ayers and Senator Michael W. Morrissey, who was also lobbied by the women's heterosexual neighbors. On Wednesday, the women saw the two legislators, both Democrats who had supported the amendment, vote against it.

Senator James E. Timilty, a Democrat who last year supported the amendment, also changed his mind.

"When I looked in the eyes of the children living with these couples," Mr. Timilty said, "I decided that I don't feel at this time that same-sex marriage has hurt the commonwealth in any way. In fact I would say that in my view it has had a good effect for the children in these families."

Massachusetts Lawmakers Reject Bid To Stop Same-Sex Marriages (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BOSTON, Sept. 14 -- Amid a pep-rally atmosphere, Massachusetts legislators on Wednesday overwhelmingly rejected an attempt to halt same-sex marriages here -- showing how quickly gay nuptials have moved from being a court-ordered imposition to a powerful political cause.

By a vote of 157 to 39, members of the House and the Senate meeting together voted down a proposed constitutional amendment that would have eliminated the same-sex marriages legalized two years ago and replaced them with "civil unions" for gay couples.

Instead, the vote leaves same-sex marriage as the status quo in Massachusetts, and it now seems likely to remain so until at least 2008.

But, in a broader sense, the vote also illuminated how widely Massachusetts has diverged from much of the nation, where several dozen states have passed laws limiting marriage to heterosexual couples. California's lawmakers have passed legislation legalizing same-sex marriage. It is now sitting on the desk of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R), who has said he will veto it.

Politicians here credit the weddings themselves with shifting the political momentum, saying their growing ordinariness has defused some of the opposition.

"The difference is that we have marriage," said state Sen. Jarrett T. Barrios (D) after the vote, while other supporters screamed and cheered nearby in a rally under a mural of the Boston Tea Party. "We've got a world that hasn't changed."

The issue of same-sex marriage has been on the front burner of politics here since November 2003, when the state's Supreme Court ruled in favor of seven same-sex couples who had pressed for the right to wed.

The court found that "the right to marry means little if it does not include the right to marry the person of one's choice" -- making Massachusetts the first state to offer gay couples more than civil unions.

Weeks of emotional debate followed, as some state legislators sought to nullify the court's ruling. Finally, plans were made to amend the state constitution to permit civil unions but ban marriage. But such amendments require votes in two successive sessions of the state legislature.

The proposal passed in March 2004 but still required another vote; it was the measure turned down on Wednesday.

In the meantime, the weddings began. Since the first one on May 17, 2004, more than 6,100 gay couples have wed, accounting for about 17 percent of all the state's weddings during that period.

Each one made the idea of same-sex marriage more acceptable, observers say.

The differences were noticed by politicians, who say they started getting more letters in favor of the marriages, and by public-opinion pollsters, who noted in March that 56 percent of state residents believed same-sex marriages should be allowed.

"It's one of those areas of politics where people have become accustomed to something that was once radical," said Julian E. Zelizer, a history professor at Boston University. "It's just normative at this point."

By the time Wednesday rolled around, support for the civil-unions measure had collapsed. Forces in favor of same-sex marriage were feeling too confident to compromise, while opponents had united behind another constitutional amendment that would eliminate same-sex unions of any kind.

Gov. Mitt Romney (R), who is contemplating a presidential bid in 2008, favors a complete ban on any legalization of same-sex unions. In an interview this week, he said he has concerns about whether children brought up by a same-sex couple could develop normally.

"The ideal setting for raising a child is where there is a male and female," Romney said.

Even though the amendment under consideration was known to be dead beforehand, its killing took on a party atmosphere.

First, there were speeches, from legislators who compared Massachusetts's place in the national debate to the radical role the state's Minutemen played in the Revolutionary War.

"We are as out of step today as we were on the village green in Lexington and Concord," said state Sen. Edward M. Augustus Jr. (D). "Massachusetts has always been the conscience of the nation."

Gay 'Marriage' Amendment Rejected (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Massachusetts lawmakers yesterday rejected a marriage constitutional amendment, guaranteeing that same-sex "marriage" will continue in that state for at least three more years.

The amendment would have created civil unions for same-sex couples while disallowing same-sex "marriage."

It was approved last year, 105-92, and lawmakers had to pass it a second time to place it on the 2006 ballot. However, yesterday's 157-39 rejection showed how little support the amendment had after a year.

DOJ_NMG_0005475

Many lawmakers said they rejected the measure because they no longer wanted to undo the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court's 2004 ruling legalizing same-sex "marriage."

"Gay marriage has begun, and life has not changed for the citizens of the commonwealth, with the exception of those who can now marry," said state Sen. Brian Lees, a Republican co-sponsor of the amendment. "This amendment, which was an appropriate measure or compromise a year ago, is no longer, I feel, a compromise today."

Conservatives shunned the amendment because it created civil unions, which they oppose as ersatz same-sex "marriage."

"The union of two women and two men can never consummate a marriage. It's physically impossible," said Rep. Phil Travis, a Democrat. "The other 49 states are right, and we are wrong."

Homosexual-rights advocates and traditional-values groups all lobbied for the defeat of the amendment, which had been introduced by Senate President Robert E. Travaglini and Mr. Lees.

With yesterday's defeat, the battle shifts to a petition drive for a marriage constitutional amendment aimed at the 2008 ballot.

The amendment, sponsored by VoteOnMarriage.org and supported by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, would outlaw same-sex "marriage" in Massachusetts upon passage.

However, the amendment would not be retroactive and same-sex "marriages" already conducted by 2008 would not be affected. An estimated 6,100 same-sex "marriages" have been conducted in Massachusetts since May 2004.

The petition drive starts later this month. Supporters have until the Nov. 23 to meet their goal of around 120,000 certified signatures.

The amendment initiative must then be approved twice by 25 percent of lawmakers -- or 50 members -- before it can go to voters.

Traditional values groups think they can find 50 votes in each of the Democrat-led legislative chambers. However, House Speaker Salvatore F. DiMasi supports same-sex "marriage" rights, and Mr. Travaglini is also viewed as friendly to homosexual rights.

The amendment initiative says, "When recognizing marriages entered into after the adoption of this amendment by the people, the Commonwealth and its political subdivisions shall define marriage only as the union of one man and one woman."

ANTITRUST:

Industry-supported Study Concludes There Is Competition (INMAN)

By Jessica Swesey, Inman News

Inman News, September 14, 2005

A new study funded by the National Association of Realtors concludes that competition for customers among real estate brokerage firms in local housing markets across the nation is strong.

The study, compiled by researchers at Pennsylvania State University, looks at 12 local real estate markets and draws data from multiple listing services, interviews and secondary sources.

"The central finding is the intense competition in local real estate markets," Professor Steve Sawyer of Penn State's School of Information Sciences & Technology writes.

The report is timely in the continuing battle between the U.S. Justice Department and organized real estate. Competition in the real estate industry has come under fire after the DOJ filed an antitrust lawsuit last week against the National Association of Realtors over its policies for online listings. The DOJ charges that the powerful trade group's policies restrain competition by obstructing real estate brokers who use Web-based systems to offer consumers lower costs.

NAR says its policy for Web property listings is "fair, pro-consumer, pro-competitive and accommodates innovation."

The DOJ and the Federal Trade Commission will hold a public forum to discuss competition in the real estate industry on Oct. 25, in Washington, D.C. The forum will focus on the real estate transaction, the multiple listing service, and private and state actions that affect competition among brokers.

The Penn State study, while focusing on a small sample of real estate markets, concludes that inter-firm competition is fierce within local housing markets.

In 10 of the 12 markets examined in the Penn State study, market share held by top firms was found to be shrinking.

Meanwhile, franchised firms had a larger percentage of market share than other locally owned firms in seven of the 12 markets and in four of the six largest markets studied.

The study also noted that there is steady to substantial growth in each of the 12 markets, and that smaller markets are seeing the least growth.

"This high level of competition in real estate is striking given that the combined volume dollar growth across the many local real estate markets would suggest that competition might be lessened," Sawyer wrote.

As home sales and housing prices have soared in markets nationwide over the last few years, so have the number of Realtors. The National Association of Realtors now has about 1.1 million members, a record high for the trade group.

Markets included in the Penn State study were St. Louis, Mo.; Tampa, Fla.; Columbus, Ohio; Madison, Wis.; Lima, Ohio; Baltimore, Md.; Culpepper, Va.; Cumberland, Md.; Charlotte, N.C.; Easton, Md.; Hagerstown, Md.; and Wilmington, N.C.

The study suggests that increased consumer access to real estate information is redefining how consumers engage real estate services and may be contributing to growth of real estate markets even as it drives competition.

Increased access to housing information on the Web may be "a critical factor in the current surge in house prices," the study suggests. "Buyers and sellers are better informed, and this is reflected in their confidence in the housing market."

In collecting data for the 12 markets cited in the study, researchers interviewed five people from the local real estate markets, including one from St. Louis, one from Madison, Wis., one from Tampa, Fla., and two from Lima, Ohio.

Interviewees noted that competition among agents – even those affiliated with the same brokerage company – for a listing is fierce, researchers said. Increased access to real estate information has armed consumers with more knowledge and raised their expectations for the services provided by real estate agents.

"The ability for consumers to access real estate information about their markets is raising the stakes for real estate agents and brokers," the study noted.

The Penn State researchers also found no numerical evidence of discount brokerage or for-sale-by-owner sales increasing even in the fastest growing of the 12 local markets studied. The discount brokerages involved in the areas accounted for less than one percent of the total market share.

The author noted that few patterns of competitive activity are common to all local real estate markets. Smaller markets are more concentrated than larger markets, and there are market share position changes among the top firms in each market.

In St. Louis, one firm has a dominant share of the local real estate market, the study found. However, the researchers said they learned through interviews that the unidentified firm competes in most of the micro-markets that make up St. Louis, and in each of the micro-markets there are one or two other firms with substantial percentages of market share.

Meanwhile, in Tampa, four brokerage firms affiliated with a single national franchise compete with each other and other locally owned firms and their year-to-year market shares vary, the study found.

In Madison, brokerage companies affiliated with national franchises have a smaller share of the total market than other locally owned companies, researchers said.

House Democrats Target High Gas Prices (KRT)

By Maria Recio

Knight Ridder, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - House Democratic leaders unveiled a plan Wednesday to combat what they said was price gouging at the pump, as some Republican lawmakers worried about the lackluster Bush administration response to high gasoline prices.

"Many of America's families are experiencing a middle-class squeeze, and the price at the pump is becoming oppressive," said House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif, adding that prices were high even before Hurricane Katrina knocked out 20 percent of the nation's supply lines.

"Something must be done about this," Pelosi told reporters after House Democrats signed off on the plan at their weekly meeting. "There must be a federal law to investigate and prosecute price gouging, and to receive damages from those in violation of the law" that would be directed to the federal home heating oil assistance program.

The nationwide average price of regular gasoline was $2.93 per gallon Wednesday, according to the AAA, down from the Sept. 5 high of $3.05, but still 49 cents higher than a month ago and $1.10 a gallon more expensive than a year ago. The average price in Texas was $2.83 per gallon Wednesday.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Robert Menendez of New Jersey faulted the Bush administration for not having "sensitivity" on the issue. "Maybe it's because we have two oilmen in the White House," Menendez said.

President Bush is a former Texas oilman and Vice President Dick Cheney ran the oil services giant Halliburton Co. Bush has said he will not tolerate gouging and White House spokesman Scott McClellan said last week that gasoline prices were too high and the administration's sales from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve would ease supplies - and prices.

"We view this as a temporary disruption," McClellan said.

Republicans have largely focused on the need to re-open supply lines and using federal oil reserves to push prices down. But Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., spoke out sharply Wednesday about the consequences of gasoline prices at a hearing of the Senate Commerce Committee's Aviation Subcommittee.

"Now, you can give me a lecture about free enterprise, supply and demand and all that other stuff," Lott told an official from the Energy Information Administration. "That ain't good enough."

"We'd better realize that there's a problem," Lott said. "It's hurting farmers, small businessmen and women, families with children. And we at least need to empathize. At least say `this is bad, we know it's bad.' And make it look like we care and we're doing something about it. I think the energy department needs to be a little bit more aggressive in jawboning the industry as a whole."

Pelosi's plan would give the Federal Trade Commission added authority to prosecute oil companies. Republicans and Democrats in the Senate and House have asked the agency to aggressively investigate pricing, but FTC officials told Congress in hearings last week that they can only pursue collusive activity - which had not uncovered any gouging in previous investigations.

American Petroleum Institute spokesman Ray Connolly said he had not seen the Democratic package but that Red Cavaney, president of the oil industry trade association had testified before Congress last week that "API and its members condemn price gouging."

The debate in Washington has amused economists like Bernard Weinstein, director of the Center for Economic Development at the University of North Texas.

"Price gouging is a political term," he said. "I don't think economic textbooks list price gouging." He sees the run-up in prices as a reflection of the market's expectation of prices based on tighter supplies. "The price has gone up for a reason," said Byron Schlomach, chief economist at the Texas Public Policy Foundation, an Austin-based conservative think tank. "I would argue it's immoral for people not to be able to price freely." He added that he recognized that "it's not a popular view."

Menendez, meanwhile, introduced legislation separate from the Democratic leadership plan to reduce the 18.4 cents federal gasoline tax by 10 cents and pay for the lost revenue with a windfall profits tax on oil that is over $40 a barrel.

The Pelosi plan would require so-called "transparency" of pricing by making the oil companies disclose how they determine price at all levels. It would also apply antitrust laws to OPEC countries to force information about pricing policies.

Gillette Is Betting That Men Want An Even Closer Shave (NYT)

By Claudia H. Deutsch

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

LET regulators worry whether Gillette's proposed merger with Procter & Gamble poses antitrust problems. Let investors worry about how that merger will affect the fused companies' stocks. The people at Gillette have a far more immediate challenge: persuading men that they need to buy yet another new shaving system.

DOJ_NMG_0005478

Yesterday, Gillette unveiled Fusion (manual) and Fusion Power (battery operated), a wet-shaving system with a lot more bells and whistles than the company's Mach3Turbo and M3Power, currently the top-selling shavers. It also announced a line of shaving creams and gels to go with the new razors.

Gillette Fusion is "the future of shaving," James M. Kilts, Gillette's chairman and chief executive, told analysts and reporters who had gathered in a Manhattan auditorium to hear the latest news. Not to be outdone in hyperbole, Peter K. Hoffman, president of Gillette's blades and razors unit, defined fusion for the crowd - "a nuclear reaction in which nuclei combine to create power" - and intimated that the Fusion system's "breakthrough technology" lives up to the analogy.

Much is at stake. According to Gillette, American men spent about $1.7 billion on blades and razors last year, and another $300 million on shaving creams and gels. Globally, shaving products accounted for more than $10.4 billion in sales.

Gillette will spend a lot to get the word out. It would not divulge marketing plans or even let product samples leave the room - "We don't want to give anything to the competition," Mr. Hoffman said in an interview after the event. But he promised that come early 2006, when the Fusion products hit stores, Gillette will mount a "blockbuster marketing program, absolutely huge, the biggest launch of a Gillette shaving system in history." And, yes, that is true even if adjusted for inflation, Mr. Kilts chimed in.

"Mach3 will remain No. 1 for the first few years, but Fusion will become our flagship brand," Mr. Kilts said.

This is the first time Gillette has introduced a full line of razors and accouterments at once, and marketing experts agree with the decision.

"Hats off to these guys; they're offering metrosexual nirvana," said Gary M. Stibel, principal and founder of the New England Consulting Group, a marketing consulting firm in Westport, Conn. "You get a five-bladed razor any way you want it, with power, without power. You get the gel and grooming products to go with it. Men will credit the whole system for a better shave."

Maybe so - but do men really need a better shave than Mach3 provides? Mr. Hoffman is certain they do. Noting that 60 percent of the men who tested the Fusion razors preferred them to the Mach3, he predicts that Fusion will be a "billion-dollar product" by 2008.

But marketing experts, while applauding Gillette's willingness to eat into Mach3 sales, are not so sure. "It is an incredibly hard decision, to cannibalize your own leading brand, even when you know that someone else will do it to you if you don't," said Nicholas Donatiello Jr., president of Odyssey, a San Francisco market research firm. "But there is still the question of market fatigue - I mean, at this point, how much better do men really think their shaving experience needs to be?"

Gillette's agency - BBDO Worldwide, a unit of the Omnicom Group - has access to plenty of product images and attributes to whet the jaded shaver's appetite. Both Fusion models have five blades instead of Mach3's three, and they are spaced 30 percent closer than are Mach3 blades - changes that the company says provide a more comfortable shave.

The Fusion models have a "Precision Trimmer" blade on the back of the blade cartridge, to be used to trim sideburns or shape facial hair. (According to Gillette, about half of all men have a mustache, goatee or other form of decorative facial hair.)

Fusion Power gets more techie. Its cartridges - which will also fit on the manual version - have a super-thin coating that Gillette says provides for an even closer shave. And while it runs on conventional AAA batteries, it incorporates an electronic chip to regulate voltage and otherwise ensure that the "shaving experience" is consistent as the battery drains. It even turns itself off if it sits idle for eight minutes.

Gillette has already filed 70 patents on the Fusion razors, and it expects to be able to command prices about 30 percent higher than for the Mach3. The manual razor and two cartridges will sell for about $9.99, with a 4-pack of refill cartridges going for about $11.99. Fusion Power, with one cartridge and a battery - Duracell, of course, since Gillette owns that brand - will retail for about $11.99, with refill 4-packs going for $13 or $14.

The elephant in the room, though, is the merger with Procter, which, barring regulatory holdups, should be completed this fall. Procter is already doing pre-emptive divestitures to ward off the antitrust cops - for example, it is selling its SpinBrush electric toothbrush business to Church & Dwight to avoid becoming too dominant in that area when it joins forces with Gillette's formidable Oral-B line.

Fortunately for Mr. Hoffman and his team, Procter is not in the shaving business, so Gillette's new-product plans do not pose any potential conflicts. "Fusion will be the first blockbuster for the merged P.& G.-Gillette entity," predicted William P. Pecoriello, a household products analyst at Morgan Stanley.

Mr. Kilts certainly agrees. Fusion is being introduced in North America first, and the merger should be well under way when Gillette rolls out the product internationally.

Procter has a better global distribution system than does Gillette, and "our combined sales forces will have the kind of scale to really get meaningful distribution in those markets," Mr. Kilts said in an interview. Moreover, he added, "Procter is one of the best media buyers in the world."

The merger could still cause problems, though. "A big product launch is hard under any circumstances, but particularly so if the staff is distracted by a merger," Mr. Donatiello warned.

Mr. Kilts shrugs that off. "You'll see," he said. "We'll write the Harvard case history on how to do an integration while launching a product."

Church & Dwight To Buy SpinBrush From P&G (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

CHICAGO (Reuters) - Church & Dwight Co. Inc. (CHD.N) on Wednesday said it has agreed to buy the SpinBrush toothbrush business from Procter & Gamble Co. (PG.N), a sale P&G hopes will help lead to antitrust approval of its multibillion dollar acquisition of Gillette Co. (G.N).

P&G had agreed to divest the business, which had $110 million in sales in the fiscal year that ended June 30, as part of its negotiations over the Gillette deal with the European Commission.

Church & Dwight would pay an initial $75 million in cash at the closing of the deal, which would unite the battery-powered toothbrush with its Arm & Hammer and Mentadent toothpaste brands. An additional inventory settlement would be paid following the transfer of the business and Church & Dwight would also pay up to another $30 million based on near-term performance, Church & Dwight said.

The price would be sharply lower than the $475 million P&G paid for SpinBrush between 2000 and 2002. But while battery powered toothbrushes were a hot item in the oral care industry for a while, sales have waned in the category lately.

``The deal came cheap, but (the) category and SpinBrush have both lagged recently," William Schmitz, analyst at Deutsche Bank Equity Research, said in a research note.

He added that power toothbrush sales overall declined 10 percent in sales outlets tracked by market research firms last year and SpinBrush market share was down to 15.3 percent in the second quarter of this year from a high of 37.4 percent in the first quarter of 2003.

The deal is expected to close in the fourth quarter, subject to review by the Federal Trade Commission and European Commission.

P&G said it still expects its Gillette acquisition to close in the fall.

Church & Dwight shares were down 37 cents at $38.21 on Wednesday afternoon on the New York Stock Exchange, while P&G shares were down 50 cents at $55.04.

Lazard Ltd. (LAZ.N) advised Church & Dwight on the deal and Merrill Lynch advised P&G.

File-Sharing Firms Are Urged To Protect Music-Industry Rights (WSJ)

By Sarah Mcbride, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

The Recording Industry Association of America has sent cease-and-desist letters to several file-sharing companies, including BearShare, LimeWire and WinMX, asking that they stop activities that allow users to download copyrighted music.

The letters ask the companies to "immediately cease and desist from enabling and inducing the infringement of RIAA member sound recordings," according to a copy of the letter reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

The letters are an attempt by the music industry to build on the favorable ruling it received from the U.S. Supreme Court in June in the so-called Grokster case, involving a file-sharing company that was accused by the industry of facilitating copyright violations. In that ruling, the court found that copyright holders could sue file-sharing companies for encouraging people to violate copyrights. Now, the industry is taking the first step toward enforcing the ruling against other file-sharing companies.

"Companies similar to Grokster have been given ample opportunity to do the right thing," said the RIAA, which confirmed sending the letters to seven file-sharing companies.

The RIAA has long said it supports legal uses of file sharing. It wants file-sharing firms to alter their software -- for example, by creating filters to strip out copyrighted material or creating mechanisms to pay copyright holders. In recent months, it has been working with several file-sharing firms, including iMesh and Mashboxx, to create services that wouldn't violate copyrights.

The file-sharing companies that received cease-and-desist letters can shut down, fight the RIAA in court, or make changes that mollify the RIAA.

Despite the Grokster decision, a court case based on other file-sharing programs wouldn't necessarily be open and shut, says Ralph Oman, the former U.S. Register of Copyrights and a Washington, D.C.-based intellectual-property lawyer at the law firm Dechert LLP. The Supreme Court found that Grokster and co-defendant Morpheus were actively pursuing former users of the original Napster, a free file-sharing service found to be illegal, and remanded the case to trial court for further consideration. (A new Napster service offers paid, legal downloads.) It might be harder to prove that for the newer services.

Mr. Oman said file-sharing companies would have to prove they had "some credible rationale other than the promotion of illegal file sharing."

LimeWire confirmed receiving the letter, but declined to comment on any action it would take. BearShare and WinMX didn't respond to requests for comment. As of last night, these companies were still offering unchanged file-sharing software programs for download.

A Specialist On Mergers Joins Morgan As A Senior Adviser (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

J. P. Morgan Chase said yesterday that Robert I. Lipp, a longtime financial services executive who has played a role in some of the biggest bank and insurance mergers in recent decades, is joining the bank as a senior adviser.

In his new role, Mr. Lipp, 67, will work closely with J. P. Morgan's chairman, William B. Harrison Jr., and its president, James Dimon, in strategic planning as the bank continues to integrate operations after last year's merger between J. P. Morgan Chase and Bank One.

While Morgan has been hampered from deal making by its low-valued stock, Mr. Dimon alluded in remarks this summer to analysts that the bank could be on the hunt for acquisitions as early as next year.

"One of my duties is going to be thinking about growth, especially in the context of strategic planning," said Mr. Lipp, who will remain on Morgan's board. "I look forward to knowing the organization better so that I can contribute to strategic discussions."

Mr. Lipp has a long personal and professional history with both Mr. Harrison and Mr. Dimon. He spent 23 years at Chemical Bank, where he worked with Mr. Harrison before leaving in the mid-1980's to join Sanford I. Weill at Commercial Credit, which is based in Baltimore. There, he worked alongside Mr. Dimon in turning the sleepy consumer finance company into the nation's largest financial services giant, Citigroup, through a series of acquisitions.

After stepping down as head of global consumer banking at Citigroup in 2001, Mr. Lipp became chief executive of the Travelers Property Casualty Corporation, which Citigroup spun off for $3.89 billion in 2002. Two years later, Travelers Property Casualty merged with St. Paul in a deal valued at $16 billion.

Earlier this week, Mr. Lipp stepped down as chairman of St. Paul Travelers, four months ahead of schedule. He will remain on St. Paul Travelers' board.

Mr. Lipp, who will report to work next week, said he was looking forward to working closely again with Mr. Harrison and Mr. Dimon. "It's going to be fun working with people who are friends and that you have respect for," Mr. Lipp said.

Mr. Lipp said he would also assist in leadership development programs at the bank.

EU Fines Thread Makers EU43.5 Mln For Fixing Prices (Update1) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, September 15, 2005

Sept. 14 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators fined manufacturers of industrial thread including Coats Ltd., the world's biggest, 43.5 million euros ($53 million) for operating a price-fixing cartel.

The makers of thread used in products such as clothes, shoes, furniture and car seats held meetings starting in the 1990s to agree on prices, exchange information and allocate customers, the Brussels-based European Commission said today. The fine ends a probe that began with raids in the U.K. and Germany in 2001.

``Cartel behavior is illegal, unjustified and unjustifiable, and will be punished severely no matter how large or small the companies involved," Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement. ``I will not allow consumers to be denied the benefits of the single market by companies carving up markets between themselves."

Under EU law, the commission, the EU's antitrust regulator, can fine companies accused of operating a cartel as much as 10 percent of their annual sales. It typically opts for about 2-3 percent of sales. The largest EU cartel fine was 462 million euros levied against Hoffmann-La Roche AG in 2001 for fixing the price of vitamins.

Coats, based in Uxbridge on the outskirts of London and owned by Guinness Peat Group Plc since March 2003, received the largest fine of 15 million euros, followed by Amann & Soehne GmbH with 13 million euros.

Three Cartels

The commission said it found a total of three cartels in the industrial thread market. The first was in Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg and the Nordic countries from January 1990 until September 2001. Another was in the U.K. from October 1990 until September 1996. The third was in the thread market for automotive customers in the EU, as well as Iceland, Liechtenstein and Norway, from May 1998 until May 2000.

Other companies fined for the thread cartels include Guetermann AG, 4 million euros, Barbour Thread Ltd., 2.1 million euros, Belgian Sewing Thread NV, 979,000 euros, Bieze Stork BV, 514,000 euros, and Zwicky & Co. AG, 174,000 euros.

In the automotive thread cartel, the companies fined were Cousin/Amann, 4.9 million euros, Coats, 650,000 euros, Oxley Threads Ltd. and Barbour 715,000 euros.

S.Korea's FTC Slaps Fines On Fixed-Line Telecom Firms (ASIAP)

Asia Pulse, September 15, 2005

SEOUL, Sept 15 Asia Pulse - South Korea's antitrust regulator decided Thursday to slap fines on four local fixed-line telecommunication service providers for illegal cartel activities.

The nine-person committee of the Fair Trade Commission (FTC) ruled to levy a combined 25.74 billion won (US$25.1 million) in fines against the country's four fixed-line companies - KT Corp. (KSE:030200), Hanarotelecom Inc., Onse Telecom Co. and Dacom Corp..

KT, the country's largest fixed-line telephone and broadband Internet operator, has been ordered to pay 23.87 billion won in fines for rigging the prices of both its long distance domestic services and international telephone services.

Dacom, the nation's second-largest long-distance telephone company, was slapped with a total 1.6 billion won in fines, with Onse being ordered to pay 2.1 billion won for its involvement in illegally fixing long distance and international telephone services.

Hanarotelecom was fined 60 million won for irregularities in its domestic long distance line operations.

The anti-trust authority also ordered the four companies, along with Dreamline Co. and Thrunet Co., to correct irregular activities related to their ultra-high-speed broadband operations.

The FTC's decision-making body said that it took the actions because the companies colluded in setting rates on both domestic and international telephone services and rigged fees they charged to businesses using their Internet lines.

Officials at the regulatory authority said they are planning to conclude a similar investigation into mobile telecommunication operators by the end of the year.

Industry sources said that the companies cited may contest the charges and take the matter to court.

S.Korea Fines KT, 3 Others $25 Mln For Price Fixing (REU)

Reuters, September 15, 2005

SEOUL, Sept 15 (Reuters) - South Korea's antitrust watchdog fined the country's top fixed-line operator, KT Corp., and three other firms 25.74 billion won ($25.10 million) for price fixing, the Fair Trade Commission (FTC) said on Thursday.

"The penalties are for price fixing in long-distance calls and international calls," a spokesman at the commission said by telephone.

The commission fined KT 23.87 billion won and Dacom Corp. 1.6 billion won. Hanarotelecom inc. and Onse Telecom were fined 60 million won and 210 million won, respectively.

The commission also found evidences of collusion in the high-speed Internet service charges, but only issued orders to improve business practices without imposing fines, the spokesman said.

The punishment comes as local operators struggle with stalled growth and cut-throat competition. In a separate case in May, the FTC slapped a record $120 million fine on KT, hanarotelecom and Dacom over collusion in local calls and network connection charges.

Competition in the fixed-line market has intensified because the broadband market is close to being saturated and growth in voice traffic has slowed as subscribers migrate to mobile phone services.

Shares in KT fell 0.94 percent to 42,000 won by 0050 GMT, versus a 0.14 percent fall in the broader market .

Dacom shares dropped 2.31 percent to 12,700 won and hanarotelecom shed 3.04 percent to 2,710 won. ($1=1025.4 Won)

ECB Chief Warns Against Attempts To Remove Fazio (FT)

By Ralph Atkins In Frankfurt And Tony Barber In Rome

Financial Times, September 15, 2005

Jean-Claude Trichet, the European Central Bank president, made clear on Wednesday he would oppose unwarranted political attempts to remove Antonio Fazio, the Bank of Italy governor engulfed in controversy over his handling of bank takeover bids.

Using national legislation to eject a central bank governor would set “a catastrophic precedent for the independence of all central banks”, Mr Trichet told the European parliament's monetary affairs committee.

He was speaking as Domenico Siniscalco, Italy's finance minister, put more pressure on Mr Fazio by saying Italy risked isolation in international financial markets unless its central bank and regulatory systems were profoundly reformed.

Mr Siniscalco and several other government ministers are demanding Mr Fazio's resignation for alleged improper conduct in two takeover battles for Italian banks. Critics accuse Mr Fazio of favouring domestic bidders over foreign ones. The central banker denies wrongdoing and has benefited from divisions in Italy's centre-right government over how, or even whether, to remove him.

Mr Siniscalco urged Italy's parliament to pass a government bill that would impose a seven-year term of office on future governors of the Bank of Italy. Under another reform, which was not in the original bill approved on September 2 by the Italian cabinet, Mr Siniscalco proposed transferring supervision of banking competition to Italy's antitrust authority from the central bank.

“We have waited nine months for a self-reform by the central bank, and there has been no trace of it,” he said.

The proposed reforms would apply only to Mr Fazio's successors, and there is much uncertainty about when they might take effect, given Mr Fazio's refusal to resign and the risk that parliament might not pass the bill before it is dissolved early next year ahead of national elections.

Mr Trichet suggested that, even if Italy's parliament passed the reforms, Mr Fazio would not immediately leave office. He referred to an opinion issued by the ECB in May 2004, which recommended a five-year “transitional regime” for an incumbent national central bank governor.

Mr Trichet said the ECB would give “urgent consideration” to the Italian government's proposals, including the fixed term of office. He suggested the ECB was likely to support their thrust.

DOJ_NMG_0005483

Mr Trichet is treading a delicate path in the Fazio affair, affirming the principle of central bank independence from political pressure but stressing the ECB's support for eurozone financial integration and the equal treatment of banks of different nationalities.

The Italian government's proposals form part of a broader overhaul of financial market regulation that was drawn up after the multi-billion euro fraud at the Parmalat food group, discovered in December 2003.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Mirant Plans To Request Plant's Reopening (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Mirant Corp. plans to propose that its Alexandria power plant, which provides electricity to homes in the District and Maryland, be allowed to reopen on a limited basis. The plant was closed last month because of environmental problems.

Under a tentative plan Mirant outlined last week in documents filed with federal regulators, the Potomac River plant would operate at a level "significantly reduced from full capacity" that does not violate national air quality standards. At the same time, Mirant would continue studying long-term fixes such as burning cleaner coal or raising the height of the plant's smokestacks to disperse pollutants.

The plan must pass muster with the Virginia Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ), which has ordered Mirant to take immediate steps to reduce pollution. DEQ spokesman Bill Hayden said the department has not seen a proposal from Mirant but "will take a look at what they do propose. The main thing we're looking for is, if they are continuing to operate, it must be in a way that does not violate air quality standards."

Federal regulators, meanwhile, are also evaluating a petition, filed by the D.C. Public Service Commission, that asks them to order the plant to reopen. Mirant revealed that it will probably propose the partial reopening in documents the company filed last week with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

Amid the blitz of regulatory activity, it remains unclear when the plant might reopen, even temporarily. And Mirant acknowledges that a full-scale resumption of operations could be more than a year away. Although the plant is in Alexandria, it does not serve Virginia.

Mirant decided Aug. 24 to shut down the plant in response to the order from Virginia officials to cut potentially harmful pollution from the coal-fired facility. The directive by the Department of Environmental Quality came after it reviewed the results of an analysis that showed some pollutants found in the plant's vicinity are at times considerably higher than what national standards allow.

Neighbors of Mirant have complained for years about what they believe to be high levels of contaminants emanating from the plant.

But the 56-year-old plant supplies enough electricity to serve about 400,000 homes in the District and Maryland, and officials with Pepco and the D.C. Public Service Commission have described it as a vital link in the Washington power grid.

Without the plant's generating capacity, if other transmission circuits failed there could be a blackout "in much of the District of Columbia" affecting all electric customers in Georgetown, Foggy Bottom and major portions of downtown Washington, Pepco wrote in a filing last week with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

"Numerous federal facilities will lose power, including those crucial to the security, safety and welfare of the whole country, such as the FBI, the Justice Department, the State Department," wrote Pepco, which distributes electric power in the region.

Officials at Pepco and the D.C. Public Service Commission acknowledged last week that the plant's shutdown has not yet affected the power supplied to residents. "So far, we've gotten by because we haven't had the kind of conditions that could lead to sudden blackouts, like equipment failures, and we've had relatively mild weather," said D.C. public service Commissioner Richard E. Morgan.

"But it still could happen," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0005484

Pepco said it does not plan on letting things get to that point. The company announced that it plans to work with the D.C. commission to accelerate construction of new transmission facilities that would ensure reliable electric power even without the Mirant plant.

"Given Mirant's recent decisions, we believe action is necessary to satisfy Pepco's obligation to provide reliable service to our customers," said Dennis Wraase, president and chief executive officer of Pepco Holdings Inc. The transmission construction project is expected to take about 18 months.

For now, Pepco said it supports the D.C. Public Service Commission petition asking federal regulators to order the plant to reopen. Brian Lee, a spokesman for the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, declined to say when the commission will make a decision.

Mirant, for its part, remains determined to reopen the plant. "We're confident that we're going to find a solution that will allow us to get our plant back into service and restore the level of electric reliability that we've come to expect," Mirant spokesman Steve Arabia said.

The report that precipitated the shutdown looked at worst-case scenarios involving pollution, weather and operational capacity. Researchers found that under certain conditions, the levels of sulfur dioxide, nitrogen dioxide and particles in the vicinity of the Mirant plant are higher than national ambient air quality standards allow.

As a result, state officials directed Mirant to take immediate steps to reduce pollution from the plant. Mirant decided to shut the plant down until it could find a way to meet air quality standards.

Atlanta-based Mirant, which filed for bankruptcy in 2003, operates four plants in the Washington area, including three in Maryland: in Montgomery, Prince George's and Charles counties.

Neighbors of the Alexandria plant, on the banks of the Potomac in the northern end of the city, have complained for years about what they believed to be high levels of mercury, contaminants in the air and water, and of a sooty substance that they say covers surfaces around their homes and gardens.

Poul Hertel, a neighbor who has helped lead the fight against the plant, said he is skeptical about Mirant's plan to reopen on a limited basis. He said the problem of polluted downwash from the plant's smokestacks could actually worsen.

"Downwash is not proportional to how much they are producing, it's more proportional to the speed and velocity of the emissions," Hertel said. "Just because they are operating at lowered capacity doesn't mean the issue is by any way, shape or form resolved."

In the end, Hertel said, he believes the plant probably will have to close. "Everything suggests that this plant is just not suitable or compatible with its surroundings," he said. "The health effects are too significant to ignore or negotiate away."

Straight Shooter To Some, Loose Cannon To Others (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

The fans of U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth praise his straight-talking ways, his defense of the wronged, and his stinging rebukes of lawyers and officials who try to fudge the facts.

So many decades after he left his beloved Texas and cowboy roots for a legal career in government service, fellow judges and former colleagues say, old Royce still gets riled up when he smells a bunch of bull.

When Lamberth theorized in a July ruling that the Interior Department's failure, over many decades, to account for potentially billions of dollars owed to Native Americans could only be explained by outright evil, apathy, cowardice or -- more likely -- crushing bureaucratic incompetence, the Justice Department decided to go after the judge.

In one of the rarest legal moves Justice has ever taken, the government asked that a higher court remove Lamberth from a case he has overseen for the past nine years.

In the escalating and unparalleled war between the judge and Interior, Justice lawyers said privately they saw no other option. They argued to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that Lamberth has gone overboard in a string of verbal harangues in recent years, accused agency officials of racism and lost the appearance of impartiality in the case.

Already, he has found two secretaries of Interior in contempt of court and ordered sanctions against numerous government lawyers for improper conduct in the case.

When they stand before a different bench tomorrow, government lawyers are expected to try to shift the discussion from the acknowledged failure of Interior to properly account for money held in trust and due 50,000 Indians, to the often assaulting words and actions of a powerful Reagan appointee who has made no secret of his disgust. Only three times before has this appeals court disqualified a trial judge from a case.

Lamberth and Justice Department officials declined to comment for this article. But their most recent writings in the case of Cobell v. Norton capture the tenor of what the appellate court's chief judge called the "peculiar dialogue going on" in Courtroom 21.

"On numerous occasions over the last nine years, the Court has wanted to simply wash its hands of Interior and its iniquities once and for all," Lamberth wrote. The plaintiffs have urged him to appoint a receiver to take over, he wrote, "but doing so . . . would constitute an announcement that negligence and incompetence in government are beyond judicial remedy."

In their Aug. 15 request for a new judge, Justice lawyers said that besides using intemperate language, Lamberth has ignored appellate rulings and accused the government of "falsification, spite and obstinate litigiousness" with "no legal or factual basis."

Lamberth has many defenders, from conservative Supreme Court justices to left-wing civil liberties lawyers, and is repeatedly ranked by lawyers as among the most skilled judges on the court.

Many of his fans applaud his stamina and even his outrage, but a few say privately that they think Lamberth has been pushed too far in the Interior case and has made himself a target with his sharp tongue. Said one fellow judge who requested anonymity: "He's been driven beyond the limit of his patience by these people. In his heart, he may know he's no longer dispassionate."

Since a Blackfeet tribe leader named Eloise Cobell filed this lawsuit in 1996, several independent investigations found much evidence for Lamberth's concerns. Although, the government initially said its existing Indian trust fund records were in good shape, Lamberth hired a hacker who found they could easily be accessed and altered from outside. Other reviews found that the Interior Departmenthad never kept complete records, used unknown amounts of money to help balance the federal budget, and let the oil and gas industry use Indian lands at bargain rates. They also concluded that the Clinton and Bush administrations have repeatedly sidestepped initiating the required accounting because of the likely cost.

Colleagues say Lamberth's strong prose is motivated by his government service and belief that it is a high calling. "He believes every person -- whether it's the president of the United States or an administrative clerk -- has a duty to serve the American people and do their duty as required under the law," said Mark Nagle, who worked under Lamberth when he ran the civil division of the U.S. attorney's office.

"I remember him calling up some senior-level presidential appointees and telling them: 'We can't defend this one. And we're not going to,' " Nagle said.

Lamberth's directness continued when he joined the bench. In presiding over several controversial cases involving the Clinton administration, Lamberth repeatedly accused government officials of trying to dupe the court.

In the November trial of Murder Inc. gang members, Lamberth spotted one defendant mouthing words to an ex-girlfriend as she reluctantly testified. Lamberth excused the jury, then let loose. "You sit down and shut up," the judge growled. "If you want to be bound and gagged for the rest of this trial, you just keep it up."

Lamberth has never spared the government in Cobell , and government lawyers say they cringe at his sometimes mocking tone. "You know any banker would be in jail for handling funds like this, don't you?" he told one Interior witness.

U.S. District Judge Stanley Sporkin, now retired, who was removed from a criminal case by the appeals court after not following sentencing guidelines, said Lamberth's motives are undoubtedly pure in Cobell , and the appeals court needs to acknowledge this litigation is "no tea party."

"Here you have a judge who is terribly frustrated," Sporkin said. "Every time he tells the government to get something done, they don't. It seems to me you have a bunch of crybabies that aren't willing to do what has to be done."

Report: FBI Turnover Hampers Cooperation (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 15, 2005

The FBI has experienced excessive turnover among senior officials, hampering cooperation with state and local authorities since the Sept. 11 attacks, a new report released Wednesday said.

The senior agents who run the 56 FBI field offices average just 15 months in their jobs before moving on to new assignments or leaving the bureau altogether, according to a report by the congressionally chartered National Academy of Public Administration. At FBI headquarters in Washington, the average posting for high-ranking officials is 13 months, the report said.

The short tenures of Special Agents in Charge of the field offices, or SACs in FBI parlance, make "it difficult for them to perform one of their most important functions, developing effective relationships with state and local officials," said former Attorney General Richard Thornburgh, chairman of the panel that produced the report. It was released at a House Appropriations subcommittee hearing on changes at the FBI following the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks.

Thornburgh told lawmakers at the hearing that he was "astonished to see the short tenures of SACs."

No senior executive in Washington and only four SACs have been in their jobs longer than FBI Director Robert Mueller, who started work 10 days before the attacks.

Floyd Clarke, another panel member, spent five years as FBI deputy director, Thornburgh said. Since Clarke's retirement in 1994, there have been nine deputy directors, Thornburgh said.

Mueller, testifying at the same hearing, acknowledged the difficulty in keeping experienced agents. "There have been tremendous problems with retaining persons particularly since Sept. 11 because there's not a corporation in the country that doesn't want a security officer," Mueller said.

The FBI is expected shortly to hire a chief personnel officer to address problems raised in the report and other studies by the Government Accountability Office, the Congressional Research Service and the Justice Department inspector general, he said.

The reports are the latest in a series of examinations of the FBI that say the bureau has made enormous strides in changing its primary mission from solving crimes to thwarting terrorism, but still needs to improve its intelligence gathering and analysis, as well as upgrade its technology.

Thornburgh ascribed some turnover to the dramatic change in the FBI's duties. "It is traumatic," he said, especially for agents who made careers pursuing mobsters, drug dealers and bank robbers.

The FBI has had several costly setbacks in its attempt to overhaul its computer systems, a top priority for Mueller after Sept. 11. Mueller scrapped a paperless case management system at a loss of $105 million to taxpayers after he was told it was obsolete.

Its replacement, dubbed Sentinel, will be rolled out in four phases, beginning by the end of 2006, he said.

The Thornburgh panel report, however, found some field offices and FBI training facilities in Quantico still have limited access to the Internet.

The FBI purchased 10,000 licenses from a software company for computer-based training, "but access to appropriate computers is so limited that only 200 employees, on average, are in a position to use the licenses at any one time," Thornburgh said.

FBI chief information officer Zalmai Azmi said the numbers were wrong, but did not elaborate.

Court Says FBI Whistleblower May Sue The Agency For Retaliation (AP)

By MARY CLARE JALONICK, Associated Press

AP, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON - A federal appeals court has ruled that Jane Turner, an FBI whistleblower who accused the agency of discrimination and retaliation, may seek monetary damages and a jury trial.

Turner accused male FBI agents of mishandling several cases of sexual abuse in Indian country and alleged her superiors transferred her from Minot, N.D., to Minneapolis in retaliation for complaints about sexual discrimination.

The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in a ruling Aug. 30, said Turner had sufficient evidence to justify at trial over whether the transfer was in retaliation for her complaints. But the judges dismissed Turner's claims that she worked in a hostile environment and was a victim of discrimination because of her gender.

An FBI spokeswoman said the agency would not comment on the case because the litigation is ongoing.

"I am very pleased that after all these years, we have vindication on retaliation happening in the FBI," Turner said Wednesday.

Turner has a separate case against the agency alleging wrongful termination under the Whistleblower Act. She said the agency started termination proceedings against her after she triggered an internal investigation into the agency's removal of souvenir debris from the site of the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in New York.

Turner noticed a Tiffany globe paperweight on a secretary's desk in the Minneapolis FBI office in August 2002. After learning it came from the World Trade Center, she brought the globe to the attention of the inspector general.

She resigned in October 2003 before the termination proceedings could be completed.

Pot Author Challenges Drug Convictions (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 15, 2005

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Attorneys for a man who has written books on how to grow marijuana and avoid getting caught asked a federal appeals court Tuesday to overturn his drug convictions.

Ed Rosenthal, the self-described "Guru of Ganja," was convicted two years ago of growing and distributing hundreds of marijuana plants. He says he was authorized to do so by the city of Oakland under a 1996 California medical marijuana law.

After U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer refused to allow a jury to hear that defense, Rosenthal was convicted of being a major drug supplier.

Breyer sentenced him to one day in prison on grounds that Rosenthal reasonably believed he was immune from prosecution because he was acting on behalf of Oakland city officials. The government and Rosenthal both appealed.

The government maintained Rosenthal, now 60, should have gotten at least 24 months. Amber Rosen, an assistant United States attorney, told a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that Breyer abused his discretion by issuing a sentence that fell outside sentencing guidelines.

While the case was on appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that the federal government can prosecute medical marijuana growers and users despite California's medical marijuana law.

The justices also ruled in an unrelated case while Rosenthal's prosecution was pending appeal that federal judges do not have to follow congressional sentencing guidelines. That decision was also retroactive.

Dennis Riordan, one of Rosenthal's appellate attorneys, told the court that Rosenthal's conviction should be overturned.

"I was told by the city attorney's office that I was immune from prosecution. If I can't rely on government officials, who can you rely on?" Rosenthal said in an interview after the hearing.

He once wrote the "Ask Ed" column for High Times magazine and has written books with titles including "The Big Book of Buds" and "Ask Ed: Marijuana Law. Don't Get Busted."

Prospect Of Drugs ‘black List’ Hangs Over Venezuela (FT)

By Andy Webb-vidal In Caracas

Financial Times, September 15, 2005

From the jetty at San Juan de las Galdonas, a fishing village on the eastern coast of Venezuela, Pedro Salcedo casts his eye across the Caribbean. The sea is calm. A fine day for sailing.

Fishing, however, is just an occasional pastime for Mr Salcedo. He makes better money transporting drugs to far-flung islands in the Caribbean, for a couple of thousand dollars a journey.

''Trinidad, Grenada, and nowadays we go as far as Puerto Rico,'' he says. The US lies almost 900km away, two days on a small launch.

Mr Salcedo, and others like him, used to avoid soldiers from Venezuela's National Guard, the body charged with combating drugs-trafficking in the country, through which up to one-third of the cocaine smuggled from Colombia passes. But increasingly often, US officials say, the fishermen are in competition with the National Guard, rogue elements of which also take part in drug-running.

This may be one reason why the US, the world's largest consumer of cocaine, could remove Venezuela from its annual list of countries ''certified'' as adequately collaborating in the war on drugs. The State Department is expected to announce its list today, and some US officials say Venezuela will be ''decertified'', incurring sanctions.

Controversy over drugs was recently added to the list of factors that have become a fresh source of diplomatic tension between Caracas and Washington. Last month Hugo Chávez, Venezuela's president, suspended a co-operation agreement with the US Drugs Enforcement Administration, alleging that its officials were ''spying''.

Days later it emerged that the US had revoked the visas of several National Guard officers for alleged complicity in drugs cases. But Venezuelan officials claim they are delivering ever improving results in the war on drugs, and that a decision to decertify Venezuela would be ''political''.

On Tuesday, Jesse Chacón, the interior minister, said the authorities had seized 18.7 tonnes of cocaine in the first eight months of the year, almost as much as the 19.6 tonnes seized in 2004.

John Walsh, a senior analyst at the Washington Office on Latin America, a liberal think-tank, agrees that it will be hard for a decertification decision to not be seen as political. ''It's difficult in this context to imagine that if there is a decertification it won't be read as more political than substantive,'' he says. ''If the US isn't careful once again they are going to give Chávez some material to work with.''

Mr Chávez frequently criticises Washington's policies as ''imperialist'', and charges that it is ''hypocritical'' of the world's top drugs- consuming country to certify other countries.

This week, Venezuela offered an alternative arrangement to allow the DEA to continue operating under a more limited framework. A US embassy official said the draft agreement was being ''studied''.

Analysts have questioned the effectiveness of a drugs ''black list''. The decertification of the government of President Ernesto Samper in Colombia in the mid-1990s arguably had little lasting impact. And in Venezuela, sanctions that could amount to as little $500,000 (€400,000, £245,000) would be of little concern to Mr Chávez, whose government is dizzy on an unprecedented oil bonanza.

Sullivan County Grand Jury Hands Up 100 Indictments (UNIONL)

By STEPHEN SEITZ, Union Leader Correspondent

Manchester Union Leader, September 15, 2005

NEWPORT — In the end, "Operation Summer Sizzle" yielded more than 100 indictments against 41 people.

The drug raids took place on Aug. 31, involving 15 state and local law enforcement agencies, as well as the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. The indictments were handed up on Monday by the Sullivan County grand jury. The raids took place mostly in Newport and Claremont, although arrests were made in Charlestown and Sunapee as well.

Newport resident Sherry West, 38, faces 10 to 40 years and up to $600,000 in possible fines if convicted on charges of selling methadone and crack cocaine within 1,000 feet of a school. Robin Langlois, 38, of Claremont, was charged with selling heroin within 1,000 feet of a school; due to a prior conviction of selling cocaine, her penalty could reach 30 years and a $400,000 fine if convicted. Claremont resident Del Lord, 46, was charged with two counts each of selling the prescription drug Percocet and marijuana within 1,000 feet of a school. That could bring 12 to 30 years on each count and total fines of $400,000.

Charges against the others range from possession to conspiracy to sell, as well as sales of various drugs. Penalties in these cases range from one year in prison to 15 for each count, depending on the severity of the offense; fines top out at $100,000, again depending on the charge.

Four charges were dropped by the Sullivan County Attorney's office.

Texas Mafia Member Is Given 60 Years (SAEN)

San Antonio Express-News, September 15, 2005

A federal judge on Wednesday sentenced a Texas Mexican Mafia member to 60 years in prison for his role in a violent drug-dealing conspiracy.

Johnny "Gira" Garcia-Esparza, 45, was the last of four Mexican Mafia members awaiting punishment on charges stemming from their April conviction on drug-related charges.

U.S. District Judge Orlando Garcia sentenced Garcia-Esparza to 55 years on the conspiracy and drug charges, plus five years on the gun charges.

Between 1999 and 2004, as many as 28 gang members were accused of delivering more than 150 kilos of cocaine and more than 30 kilos of heroin. Law officers seized more than 80 firearms in the course of making the arrests in August 2004, prompting the U.S. attorney's office to say the conspirators operated like a terrorist organization.

Out of the 28 who were rounded up, only four defendants went to trial last April and all were convicted of charges that included drug-trafficking conspiracy, money-laundering conspiracy, selling drugs and using guns in the commission of drug crimes.

Teen Convicted In Bomb Case (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, September 15, 2005

A Brandon teenager who made a bomb powerful enough to blow up half of a car was convicted Tuesday of federal charges.

U.S. District Judge William Barbour Jr. set James Vaughn Rankin, 19, sentencing for Dec. 1. He faces a maximum 30 years in prison.

Rankin was convicted of possession of an unregistered firearm, transfer of an unregistered firearm and the manufacture of an unregistered firearm.

U.S. Assistant Attorney David Fulcher said Rankin intended for the bomb to kill. "He said on the videotape it will destroy half of a car," Fulcher said.

Rankin's landlord, Willis Freeman, said by telephone late Tuesday: "I would have bet my right arm that he wouldn't have done something like that, but he did. I never had a problem with him.

"I hope they take the good in him and try to rehabilitate him," Freeman said.

During the two-day trial, jurors watched a videotape of Rankin selling the bomb to an undercover agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Rankin's attorney, Federal Assistant Public Defender Kathy Nester, argued her client may have possessed the bomb, but the government didn't prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he intended to harm anyone.

Nester said ATF agent Connie Wilson testified on cross-examination that she didn't mention anything about wanting the bomb to kill an ex-husband until after Rankin had placed the device in her car. Also, Nester said the government didn't prove her client transported across state lines gunpowder used in making the bomb.

"They haven't proved it (gunpowder) wasn't made in his bedroom," Nester said.

Rankin was arrested Nov. 9. Wilson said she posed as someone wanting to harm an ex-husband in Texas after a confidential informant told her Rankin could make a bomb. The informant set up a meeting for her with Rankin.

After Rankin was charged in federal court, his probation in a car-theft case was revoked and he was sentenced to five years in a state prison.

Feds Target Firearms (FPTJ)

By Kelly Townsend, The Times-Journal

Fort Payne (AL) Times-Journal, September 13, 2005

DeKalb County was one of five counties in Alabama that had indictments handed down Sept. 2 in federal court for various federal firearm violations.

The others were Cullman, Madison, Shelby and Jefferson counties.

U.S. Attorney Alice Martin would not release the names of those indicted.

"The names of theses individuals are being withheld pending service of outstanding warrants," Martin said. "We cannot release any of this information, including how many were indicted in each county, until all the warrants have been served."

DeKalb County Drug Task Force Agent Darrell Collins said he couldn't recall the number of gun cases worked in the past couple of months. But he did say that normally, three-fourths of the methamphetamine cases they do work involve some type of firearm.

"That is why we work with the ATF on a daily basis, in an effort to enforce the reduction of illegal gun use," Collins said.

Martin, along with James M. Cavanaugh, Special Agent in Charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said a grand jury returned indictments against 12 people in unrelated cases.

According to Martin, the indictments include seven violations for felons in possession of firearms, a violation for possession a sawed-off shotgun, possession of a firearm by an illegal alien, and three violations for possessing a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking or violent offense.

Plan To Blow Up Rudolph Truck Upsets Some (AP)

By JAY REEVES, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2005

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — The government wants to blow up the truck Eric Rudolph was driving when he bombed an Alabama abortion clinic, a plan that has upset some of Rudolph's victims.

Authorities said they want to use the pickup truck in a training drill to prevent it from ending up in the hands of Rudolph's admirers.

"It was done partly out of concern that it would show up on eBay," said Assistant U.S. Attorney James Ingram, referring to the Internet auction site. "Somebody would plunk down some money for it."

But nurse Emily Lyons, who was badly wounded in the clinic bombing, believes the truck should go to Rudolph's victims, who are unlikely to get any other compensation, according to her husband, Jeff Lyons.

In 2003, a state court judge awarded the couple $115 million in a lawsuit against Rudolph, who was declared indigent in federal court and has not paid anything. Trucks similar to Rudolph's 1989 Nissan have a retail value of about $1,700, according to Kelley Blue Book, a pricing guide for used vehicles.

"We had the judgment before they did the seizure," Jeff Lyons said Wednesday.

Shortly after the clinic bombing, a witness recorded the truck's license plate number and reported it to police, who used the information to identify Rudolph as a suspect in the explosion. He was later tied to the 1996 Olympic park bombing and two other bombings in Atlanta in 1997.

Rudolph was captured in May 2003, pleaded guilty in four bombings, and is now in federal prison serving four life terms.

Last month, a federal judge in Birmingham approved the government's request to permanently seize the truck, which had been held as evidence for Rudolph's trial.

The truck likely will be loaded with explosives and detonated by the FBI or the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, said Jim Cavanaugh, the ATF's regional director. Both agencies routinely blow up vehicles in classes to teach officers about explosives and bomb reconstruction.

Donald Spitz, an abortion opponent who has corresponded with Rudolph and posted some of his writings on the Internet, said he doubted anyone in his movement would want to buy the truck, "but there are people out there who would do it."

Marshals Rescind Ban On Releasing Mug Shots (DEN)

By David Shepardson, The Detroit News

Detroit News, September 15, 2005

DETROIT -- The U.S. Marshals Service has reversed a ban on releasing mug shots in response to a pair of federal lawsuits.

In an Aug. 10 memorandum made public Friday, the service's Office of General Counsel told officials in Michigan, Kentucky, Ohio and Tennessee -- the states covered by the U.S. Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals -- that they must release the photographs.

The memo rescinded an Aug. 19, 2004, order that said officials would no longer release the mug shots, citing a March U.S. Supreme Court decision.

In that unanimous decision, the court said the government wasn't required to release four photographs of former White House lawyer Vincent Foster's dead body, saying it would violate the family's privacy.

Two newspapers filed separate lawsuits this spring seeking to overturn an August 2004 decision by the U.S. Marshal Service to stop releasing the booking photos of prisoners to news media outlets and others under the Freedom of Information Act.

The Justice Department reversed itself and agreed to release the mugshots.

In the other 46 states, the U.S. Marshals Service typically only releases mug shots for "fugitive apprehension purposes." Under a 1996 ruling by the U.S. Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, the department has been required to release mug shots. That upheld a ruling by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ordering the release of the photographs in a 1993 lawsuit.

IMMIGRATION:

13 Bosnian Serbs Arrested For Immigration Fraud,7 Others Detained (AP)

By BETH DeFALCO, The Associated Press

AP, September 14, 2005

PHOENIX - Thirteen Bosnian Serbs living here were indicted on charges of lying to American authorities about their service in the Serbian Army and seven others were being detained for similar reasons, federal authorities said Wednesday.

According to an indictment filed in U.S. District Court in Phoenix, the 13 who were indicted on immigration fraud charges are accused of lying on their immigration applications by omitting that they served in Serbia's Army of the Republic of Srpska.

All immigrants applying for refugee status and legal residency are required to declare prior military service.

"We will not allow the United States to become a sanctuary for those using fraud and deception to qualify for refugee status," said Roberto G. Medina, special agent in charge of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Phoenix.

The seven being detained would have been charged criminally for failing to declare their past military service except that the statute of limitations had run out, said Russell Ahr, an ICE spokesman in Phoenix.

The 13 arrested on Monday were: Nenad Dragic, Milenko Gujic, Mitra Gujic, Rajko Hercegovac, Risto Hercegovac, Rajko Ninkovic, Radenko Spiric, Vitomir Spiric, Savo Tojcic, Nikola Stankovic, Cvijan Vidakovic, Momcilo Krstic and Mladen Blagojevic. All were citizens of the former Yugoslavia, now Bosnia-Herzegovina, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix.

The seven being held on immigration charges were not immediately identified by federal authorities.

This week's apprehensions left many in Phoenix's Bosnian Serbian community confounded as to why their friends and family members were taken away after living in this country peacefully for so many years. Some wondered if they would be next.

Goran Spiric's father and brother were both apprehended. His brother, Vitomir Spiric, was among those charged criminally. He said his 63-year-old father, who came to Arizona seven years ago, was a civil firefighter but never served in the Serbian Army.

Goran Spiric, who said he came to America 11 years ago from a concentration camp where he was kept by Bosnian Muslims, wondered if he would also be apprehended.

"Every single morning I go to work, I carefully watch on both sides and wonder if the FBI or someone is watching me," Spiric said.

DOJ_NMG_0005492

Some in the Bosnian Serb community said they believe the connection among those arrested and detained is that many lived in Srebrenica, the site of a massacre in July 1995 - months before the end of the Bosnian war and after the Bosnian Serb troops took control over the town in the east of the Balkan republic.

The victorious Bosnian Serb troops allegedly executed some 8,000 Muslim boys and men who were captured in the onslaught on the town. The remains of the victims were buried in mass graves around Srebrenica.

Several top Bosnian Serb military and political officials already are serving sentences for war crimes over Srebrenica.

Federal authorities in Phoenix would not disclose why immigration paperwork for those Bosnians Serbs arrested and detained this week was targeted for review or how officials knew they served in the Serbian Army.

"Information was provided to ICE and our agents relating to service in the Serb Army. With enough investigation work, we determined that the statements made on refugee applications turned out to be false," Ahr said.

Federal authorities also declined to say whether any of the 20 Bosnian Serbs were suspected of war crimes or were material witnesses. None of those arrested or detained have been charged with a war crime, according to war tribunal indictments.

Last year, four Bosnian Serbs living in Phoenix were also arrested and charged with lying on immigration paperwork. They are Radenko Ubiparipovic, Dragon Ubiparipovic, Goran Bencun and Zdravko Bozic.

Bozic was sentenced on March 30 to a year in prison. After serving his sentenced, he'll be turned over to ICE for deportation, federal prosecutors said.

The other three cases are still pending.

According to court documents, all four - Bozic, Radenko Ubiparipovic, Dragon Ubiparipovic and Bencun - were said to have been assigned to the Drina Corp in the Batunac Brigade in 1995.

Earlier rulings by the U.N. tribunal have established that the Bosnian Serb Drina Corps led the attack on Srebrenica.

There are no indications from authorities that the 13 arrested or seven detained this week have any connection to the four arrested last year.

Alexander Stojsic, a spokesman for St. Nicholas Orthodox Church in Phoenix, where many Bosnian Serbs attend, said church members had already begun to raise money for a legal defense fund. He also said the Serbian consulate planned to meet with the community members this week.

Judge Is Asked To Dismiss War Crime Case (BOS)

The Boston Globe, September 15, 2005

Charges against a Peabody construction worker accused of hiding his role in a Bosnian Muslim massacre should be thrown out because Marko Boskic was forced under threat of death to participate in the Srebrenica killings, his lawyer said yesterday.

The lawyer, Max D. Stern, told a US district court judge yesterday that Boskic was not deceptive on immigration forms when he entered the United States in 2000 and that he was never motivated by the fact that the victims were Muslim.

Judge Douglas P. Woodlock promised to issue a ruling on the motion soon.

Boskic faces a five-count indictment of fraudulently entering the US as a refugee, as well as concealing his past in a Bosnian Serb Army unit accused of killing some 7,000 Muslim men and boys.

Lawmakers, Rove Talk Immigration (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 15, 2005

Two House Republicans met with White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove yesterday to discuss immigration reform one week after the House chairman with jurisdiction over that issue predicted that Hurricane Katrina could delay it until next year.

Reps. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) met with Rove at the White House to discuss immigration reform, Flake said yesterday. Neither member had returned from the afternoon meeting by press time.

The meeting comes as congressional leaders reshuffle their fall agenda after a glut of emergency legislation responding to the damage caused by Katrina. It also comes days after House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) told the Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel: "I think immigration is off until next year."

Immigration reform is a particularly difficult issue for congressional Republicans because it divides supporters of the business community from those social conservatives whose goal is to shut down the borders and prohibit employers from hiring illegal immigrants.

The business community, on the other hand, argues that the estimated 10 million to 12 million illegal immigrants employed in this country fill jobs U.S. citizens would not otherwise take. This broad coalition, which includes large corporate interests such as the Chamber of Commerce as well as regional businesses such as seasonal crab farmers in Maryland, also argues that the relocation costs would be too high.

While the political climate favors a strong border-security measure, the business lobby could be essential in creating the political momentum to pass a broader bill through the Senate.

Kolbe and Flake have introduced a bill, along with Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.), to register illegal immigrants currently employed in the United States as part of a national database for prospective employers. Their legislation does not require those immigrants to return to their countries of origin before gaining temporary residency.

Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.), meanwhile, have offered companion legislation in the Senate, while Sens. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) have offered competing legislation that would require immigrants to return to their countries of origin to register as guest workers.

Both bills have provisions that would expand border security and increase fines for employers caught violating the law.

GOP House leaders made immigration reform a priority early in the 109th Congress. Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) tapped Republican Policy Committee Chairman John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) to coordinate the divergent member views on this issue in anticipation of a floor vote this year.

Shadegg was to hold the fourth of his Unity Dinners to discuss the subject last night. The Arizona Republican has used these Unity Dinners, which were established by former Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Texas), to find consensus on fractious issues within the conference.

In the wake of Katrina, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) has maintained his commitment to passing an immigration and border-security package that could be either one bill or multiple pieces of legislation. DeLay has recently hinted that he would like to pass a border-security bill first and then address the issue of illegal immigrants employed in this country. He is working with Sensenbrenner, whose Judiciary Committee has jurisdiction over the legislation.

Flake said he believes the practical details of enforcement, such as locating illegal workers, will eventually require lawmakers to address instead the question of registering these employees before passing a separate enforcement bill.

"If you want enforcement, you've got to have a law you can enforce," Flake said.

The Judiciary Committee already had a full schedule of legislation on its plate heading into the fall, including the child-safety bill that passed yesterday, an update of the Voting Rights Act that may spark a fight about redistricting and a House-Senate conference negotiation about reauthorizing the USA Patriot Act.

Sensenbrenner made his remarks about postponement in response to a question about the fall legislative agenda.

After the damage wrought by Katrina, the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a group strongly opposed to illegal immigration, released a report illustrating how immigration loopholes could lead to another massive terrorist attack.

Meanwhile, the Department of Homeland Security last week relaxed document requirements for employers hiring workers who have been displaced by the hurricane. The department will not fine any businesses that hire any of these workers within 45 days of last Tuesday, which could create a major immigration loophole.

Washington lobbying firm Quinn-Gillespie has organized a large coalition of business lobbies, including the Chamber, to work with the White House to pass a broader immigration bill, which would allow for more flexibility for employers to retain those workers already in this country.

Kilgore Urges Penalties For Employers Of Illegals (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Republican gubernatorial candidate Jerry W. Kilgore said yesterday if elected he will go after businesses that knowingly hire illegal aliens.

"They are supposed to check for legal status," Mr. Kilgore told The Washington Times. "If they are knowingly violating the law they shouldn't be getting state contracts and they should not be getting state credits and benefits."

His comments come one day after he debated his Democratic challenger Timothy M. Kaine over a host of topics, including the establishment of a day laborer center in Herndon that will provide services for legal immigrants and illegal aliens.

The debate was sponsored by the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce, whose members include local business leaders. Last night, a chamber spokesman had no comment on Mr. Kilgore's proposal, saying it would be up to individual businesses to weigh in.

Mr. Kilgore has said officials in Northern Virginia are giving incentives to illegals by allowing such centers. One way to address the problem would be to revoke any tax credits or benefits companies receive from the state if they knowingly hire illegal aliens, he said.

Mr. Kaine said at the debate that his opponent was "mean-spirited" and that the members of the Herndon Town Council should have the right to deal with "tough public safety challenges."

"They are elected by local people and I'm not going to grandstand over their right to make the best decision for themselves, using their own money," Mr. Kaine said Tuesday. "The problem is a federal government that turns its back, that lets employers violate the law and then expects local governments to try to pick up the pieces.

"Jerry, there is a mean-spiritedness in your attack," he added.

Yesterday, Mr. Kilgore responded to Mr. Kaine's remarks: "I don't know how it is mean-spirited to ask someone to follow the law."

Mr. Kilgore also said if elected he would sign an agreement with the U.S. Department of Homeland Security to train 50 state troopers and give them special authority to detain illegal aliens.

The executive director of the Virginia Association of Chiefs of Police said Mr. Kilgore's stance is not realistic.

"We believe you need to be here legally, but in the real world we don't have the resources to address that," said Dana Schrad, executive director of the association that represents police chiefs in the state.

"If you take a position we're going to launch enforcement activities to rid Virginia of all illegal immigrants, it backfires on law enforcement because we don't have the resources to do that," she said.

She said that authorities worry about detaining gang members and violent criminals before they worry about detaining illegal aliens who violated immigration law.

Miss Schrad also said day laborer centers are a better alternative to large groups of men standing around and potentially causing trouble for local businesses, which is one of the reasons Herndon leaders gave when they approved the center.

Mark Bergman, a spokesman for the Democratic Party of Virginia, said Mr. Kaine is correct in stating that the federal government is failing to do its job and agreed that Herndon shouldn't be second-guessed on its decision to allow the center.

"These are local issues and we shouldn't be in the position to bully people," he said. "We shouldn't be in the business of coming in and intervening in local issues."

Mr. Bergman also said that Democrats agree with Mr. Kilgore that illegal behavior should not be rewarded with state contracts.

Conservative lawmakers supporting Mr. Kilgore yesterday criticized Mr. Kaine for the comments he made at the debate.

Delegates David B. Albo and L. Scott Lingamfelter, both Republicans, said Mr. Kaine's comments put him out of touch with Virginia voters and equate to encouraging illegal activity.

"He is turning a blind eye toward the problem," said Mr. Lingamfelter of Prince William County. "Tim is completely out of step with the voting public on this issue."

However, statewide polls show that concern over illegal aliens ranks low in voting priorities.

DOJ_NMG_0005495

Independent candidate H. Russell Potts Jr., a Republican state senator from Winchester, has previously criticized Mr. Kilgore's position on the day laborer center as "bigoted."

Mr. Kilgore and the two lawmakers said that illegal aliens is an issue that is "constantly" brought up by voters.

Mr. Lingamfelter and Mr. Albo said they agree with Mr. Kaine that the federal government must take action on illegal aliens. The lawmakers also agree with Mr. Kilgore that all benefits should be yanked from companies that hire illegal workers.

TAX:

Defendant Maintains Anti-income Tax Stance (LVS)

By David Kihara, LAS VEGAS SUN

Las Vegas Sun, September 14, 2005

The defendant in a tax evasion trial that began on Tuesday said he is innocent of the charges against him because there is essentially no law that requires people to pay income tax.

In a rambling opening statement that brought at least seven objections from a Justice Department lawyer and just as many admonitions from U.S. District Judge Kent Dawson, Irwin Schiff also tried to discount his alleged influence, saying that doctors, lawyers and others wouldn't stop paying income taxes just because he told them to.

"In my view, there is no law requiring people to pay income tax," said Schiff, who is representing himself in the criminal case against him.

The trial is expected to last five weeks.

Schiff and fellow defendants Cynthia Neun and Lawrence Cohen are facing multiple criminal charges in U.S. District Court, including aiding and assisting others in filing false income tax returns, attempting to evade paying taxes and failing to file false returns, according to a March indictment.

The indictment charges that Schiff filed "zero return" tax forms, in which he would enter zeros in every line for expenses and income. Schiff, Neun and Cohen allegedly filed or helped file for people almost 5,000 "zero return" tax forms.

People would then make claims for a full refund of all federal taxes withheld or paid, the indictment stated.

During his opening statement, Schiff denied that he was involved in breaking any laws because he was unaware that any laws existed requiring people to pay income tax.

Unlike "universal laws" such as robbery, stealing or rape -- which someone from Taiwan would intrinsically understand -- taxes in the United States are different because someone would need to know they have an obligation to pay taxes, he said.

He also said that he never attempted to hide what he was doing, and that he is a high profile lecturer who had a local radio show and authored numerous books, including "The Great Income Tax Hoax" and "The Federal Mafia: How the Government Imposes and Unlawfully Collects Income Tax."

"The government knew what I was doing -- I didn't make it a secret," he said.

The Justice Department, however, said Schiff and the other defendants were involved in what amounted to a scam.

Jeffrey Neiman, attorney with the Justice Department's Tax Division, said the defendants would advertise the "zero return" tax returns as a way to not pay taxes and would sell people a $38 book explaining how to do it.

Neiman also conceded that the Internal Revenue Service also did not catch some of the "zero returns," and that Schiff held them up as proof that his method worked.

However, after clients or followers of the practice would get into trouble with the authorities, Schiff and others would continue to offer help by selling more merchandise from Schiff's business, Freedom Books, Neiman said.

Schiff could sell anything from $2 bumper stickers to $415 video and cassette seminars that offered ways for the people to get out of further tax troubles, he said.

From 1997 to 2002, Freedom Books generated gross business receipts of $3,726,000, the indictment stated.

"He encouraged thousands to file the zero returns," Neiman said.

The first witness called, Antoinette Mitchell, a former employee of Freedom Books, testified that she filed "zero return" taxes for about three years after hearing Schiff on a paid radio broadcast on AM 1230.

She eventually volunteered for Schiff because she wanted to be "close to what was going on, basically for the cause," she said.

Schiff paid her $10 an hour in cash, and she said she never received a W-2 or 1099 tax form.

The IRS eventually penalized her, she said, and she is facing a $17,000 lien on her home.

Neiman also accused Neun, Schiff's former girlfriend, of not reporting income she received from working at Freedom Books because she would have lost about $600 a month in Social Security benefits.

Nuen's attorney, Michael Cristalli, told jurors that the essence of his case is whether Neun believed whether Schiff's "teachings" were legitimate.

"Cindy sincerely does not believe that the government has legal authority to collect personal income tax," he said.

Cristalli framed Schiff's tax beliefs in almost religious terms and described some who followed Schiff, such as Neun, as willing to give up many things to practice his ideas.

"Her belief system ruined her" financially, emotionally and even hurt family relationships, he said.

"She sacrificed her life for this belief," he said, adding that Neun didn't seem like someone who was profiting from her belief system because she had so little.

Chad Bowers, attorney for Lawrence Cohen, also stated that his client believed in the "zero return" tax idea, that it was an expression of his beliefs.

However, Bowers also also tried to put a little distance between Cohen and Schiff and Nuen, saying that Cohen is not alleged to have shared in any of the profit from the Freedom Books venture.

"This plan was designed to overwhelm the IRS and make money," Bowers said. "That isn't going to be presented for Larry Cohen. Larry genuinely believes this."

'ZERO RETURN': Income Tax Foe's Trial Begins (LVRJ)

By CARRI GEER THEVENOT, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, September 14, 2005

Income-tax opponent Irwin Schiff delivered his opening statement to jurors Tuesday and promised to unravel "the greatest hoax ever perpetrated upon the American people."

"So fasten your seat belts," said Schiff, who is representing himself. "I hope you enjoy the ride."

Prosecutors began presenting evidence Tuesday against Schiff and two of his followers, Cynthia Neun and Lawrence Cohen, who are accused of conspiring to defraud the federal government.

"Nobody likes to pay taxes, but that's not what this case is about," Justice Department attorney Jeffrey Neiman told the jury.

Schiff, the 77-year-old owner of Freedom Books in Las Vegas, has made a career of teaching his customers how to avoid paying federal income tax.

He claims no law requires Americans to pay the tax, and he has written several books advocating his position.

Neiman said the main issue in the criminal case is: "What were the defendants aware of, and what were they told?"

The prosecutor said evidence will prove that the defendants knew the law and chose to violate it.

Neiman said Schiff's book, "The Federal Mafia: How the Government Illegally Imposes and Unlawfully Collects Income Taxes," provides details of his scheme, which involves instructing his customers to file a "zero return."

"As the name would suggest, the zero return has all zeroes," the prosecutor said.

A court order has prevented Schiff from selling "The Federal Mafia" since 2003.

Neiman said Schiff advised his customers to list zero income on their tax returns, regardless of whether they had received income.

Schiff also advised his customers to write down the amount of taxes withheld from their paychecks, then seek a refund for that amount, the prosecutor said.

"At first, when the IRS began receiving these, some slipped through the cracks, and some refunds were paid," Neiman said.

The prosecutor said Schiff used those refunds to support his position.

Another part of Schiff's scheme, Neiman said, involved advising employees to write "exempt" on their W-4 forms in an attempt to prevent their employers from withholding taxes.

"What the defendants didn't tell you was: Trouble was on its way," the prosecutor said.

When trouble came, Neiman said, the customers turned to Freedom Books for help. The help came in the form of more products "that the defendants knew would just ensure more trouble," he said.

The prosecutor said Schiff has sold millions of dollars worth of products, which ranged from a $2 bumper sticker to a $415 video and cassette seminar.

In a 2002 Review-Journal interview, Schiff said he had paid no income tax since 1973.

Schiff was indicted in 2004 and is accused of evading the payment of $1.3 million in taxes, penalties and interest between 1979 and 1985.

Neiman said some of Schiff's followers also have faced prosecution. Many have had to file for bankruptcy, and all have faced fines, the prosecutor said.

One woman, Toni Mitchell, testified for the government Tuesday under a grant of immunity.

Mitchell, a banquet food server at the Monte Carlo, said she followed Schiff's advice and filed zero returns for 1996, 1997 and 2000.

Mitchell said she began volunteering at Freedom Books in 2000 and later became a part-time employee.

Neiman said both Neun, Schiff's girlfriend, and Cohen, Schiff's top sales person, worked at Freedom Books and earned "decent hourly wages," which they received in cash.

"No paper trail, no documents, no W-2s," the prosecutor said.

All three defendants are accused of aiding and assisting in the preparation of false returns for helping customers file zero returns.

Neiman said Neun chose not to file a tax return for herself, because she knew it would jeopardize the $600 a month she received in Social Security benefits.

She is accused of failure to file tax returns, Social Security fraud and theft of government property.

Schiff began his opening statement Tuesday by telling jurors, "I hope you'll be patient with me while I'm fumbling along trying to be a lawyer."

His often-rambling statement was frequently interrupted by objections from Neiman, and U.S. District Judge Kent Dawson repeatedly instructed Schiff on how to deliver a proper opening statement.

Schiff told jurors the government must prove "that not only was the information false, but I didn't believe it."

"It's what I know, and I know I don't have to pay income taxes," the defendant said.

If authorities can point out a law that requires the payment of income taxes, Schiff said, "I'll plead guilty right now, and I'll save the court the expense of a trial."

"In 30 years of research, I never found a law that says I have to pay income tax," Schiff said.

He also said anybody who has followed his advice knows that he has spent time in prison.

Lawyers representing both Neun and Cohen said their clients acted in good faith.

Defense attorney Chad Bowers said Cohen's "only intent was to follow the law as he understands it."

Attorney Michael Cristalli, who represents Neun, said jurors must decide whether she believed Schiff's teachings were legitimate.

"If you believe that she believes it, you will not be able to convict her," Cristalli said.

The attorney said Neun did not profit from her beliefs. He said she received financial support from Schiff but never received payment for her work at Freedom Books.

Las Vegas Tax Rebel Goes On Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 14, 2005

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-An author went on trial Tuewho claims that paying federal income taxes is voluntary sday on federal charges including tax evasion and aiding in the filing of fraudulent tax returns.

Irwin Schiff, author of "The Federal Mafia: How the Government Illegally Imposes and Unlawfully Collects Income Taxes," and two co-defendants are accused of causing hundreds of people to file false returns and promoting tax-evasion schemes through Schiff's business, Freedom Books.

Schiff, representing himself, said during opening statements that no law requires Americans to pay taxes and the federal court has no jurisdiction over the matter.

Schiff is accused of failing to report income on federal tax returns from 1987 to 2002, and of evading payment of $1.3 million in taxes, penalties and interest between 1979 and 1985. If convicted, he faces a maximum sentence of 43 years in prison and $3.25 million in fines.

Attorneys for co-defendants Cynthia Neun and Lawrence Cohen, who worked for Schiff, said their clients believed their conduct was legal.

Neun's lawyer, Michael Cristalli, said Neun followed Schiff's tax advice partly because of his powerful personality but also because she did not believe she was violating the law.

Cohen's lawyer, Chad Bowers, said there was no evidence his client intended to break the law.

If convicted, Neun could receive a 51-year sentence and $3.4 million in fines. Cohen faces a maximum 27 years and $1.5 million in fines.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

'Advise And Consent,' Anyone? (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Efforts to get an answer out of John G. Roberts were going nowhere at yesterday's Senate Judiciary Committee meeting, so Sen. Charles E. Schumer went Hollywood.

"Your failure to answer questions is confounding me," the New York Democrat fumed at the nominee for chief justice. "It's as if I asked you: 'What kind of movies do you like? Tell me two or three good movies.' And you say, 'I like movies with good acting.' Then I ask you if you like 'Casablanca,' and you respond by saying, 'Lots of people like "Casablanca." ' You tell me, 'It's widely settled that "Casablanca" is one of the great movies.' "

As the laughter at his expense subsided, the judge's smile shifted toward a smirk. Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) moved to call a recess, but Roberts asked if he could reply to Schumer.

" 'Dr. Zhivago' and 'North by Northwest,' " the nominee deadpanned. The crowd scored it another point for Roberts. Jane Roberts gave her husband a kiss. Schumer went outside to the cameras, where he observed, a bit wistfully, that Roberts "is a very, very smart man."

In yesterday's second day of questioning Roberts, the confirmation hearing had lost much of what little suspense it had in the first place. The only speculation in the halls outside the hearing was how many, if any, Democrats on the committee would vote for Roberts en route to his all-but-certain confirmation.

On Tuesday, Jane Roberts was so confident about her husband's fate that she was seen dozing on camera as her husband answered questions. By yesterday, there was not much left in the way of either questions or answers. Roberts avoided any query on a topic that might come before the high court -- which is to say most any question senators wished to ask. The result: Democrats and Republicans alike used the bulk of their time for speechmaking.

The conservatives blew kisses to Roberts.

"I've never seen anyone do a better job," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah). "You have made a very, very strong presentation here.

Lindsey Graham (S.C.) called Roberts "the most qualified justice in my lifetime" and added: "Obviously, he's read every case ever written and memorized it."

DOJ_NMG_0005499

Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.) dashed to the microphones during a break and shoved aside John Marshall, Oliver Wendell Holmes and Felix Frankfurter. Roberts, Cornyn said, is probably "the most qualified nominee who has ever been put up for a Supreme Court vacancy."

Awash in flattery, Roberts grew more brash in declining to answer the Democrats' questions.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (Calif.) observed that on Tuesday morning, "you were very full and forward-speaking. And then after lunch, it was as if you shut down and became very cautious. So my first question: Did anybody caution you between the morning and the afternoon sessions?"

"No, Senator," Roberts protested.

Feinstein knew she was just going through the motions. "I have another question I could ask, but you won't answer it," she said.

"Give it a try, Dianne," Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) encouraged. "Go ahead."

Feinstein, tentative, asked about "the right of a woman to decide whether to continue her pregnancy."

"Well, Senator, as I've explained, that is an area that's --" "Yes," Feinstein said, finishing his sentence, "apt to come before you."

With Republicans not inclined to grill Roberts and Democrats unable to pin him down, senators on both sides decided to do the talking themselves. In Hatch's 15 minutes of questioning, the senator spoke for 12 and left the nominee with three. When Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) took his turn, he used 15 of the 20 minutes and gave Roberts five. Sen. Joseph R. Biden (D-Del.) warned Roberts to give "short answers" and held the floor for 12 of his 20 minutes. Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), who spoke 3,500 words, left Roberts time for 1,500.

It was, as Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) put it, "a lot of senator talk." Explained Kyl: "I think this is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. It is the only time that you'll have the opportunity to be directly lobbied in the political context in an appropriate way."

Brownback used his question time to digress into a discussion about an elevator operator in the Capitol who has Down syndrome. "He frequently gives me a hug in the elevator," Brownback said. "I know he hugs Senator Hatch often, too, who kindly gives him ties -- some of which I question the taste of, Orrin."

Hatch, wearing a loud blue-and-gold-striped tie, interjected: "It doesn't have to get personal."

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) used his time to deliver an antiabortion speech. After this long message, Coburn asked, "Would you agree that the opposite of being dead is being alive?" After another monologue on his abortion views, Coburn said he wasn't even intending to ask a question about it. "That was for your information," he said.

Then Coburn went moved on to assert that he used his "medical skills of observation of body language" to ascertain whether Roberts was telling the truth. "And I will tell you that I am very pleased, both in my observational capabilities as a physician to know that your answers have been honest and forthright as I watch the rest of your body respond to the stress that you're under."

The body language was quite different on the Democratic side, where Biden gave Roberts the full Al Gore: While Roberts spoke, Biden shook his head, put his face in his hand, pouted and glared disgustedly. "We are rolling the dice with you, Judge," Biden said. "It's kind of interesting, this Kabuki dance we have in these hearings here, as if the public doesn't have a right to know what you think about fundamental issues facing them."

Spinning In The Ring (WP)

By Marcia Davis

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

It's midmorning on the second day of questioning John G. Roberts Jr., President Bush's nominee for Supreme Court chief justice.

Things are going pretty much like the day before: Democrats are pressing Roberts on voting rights and issues of privacy (translation: Roe v. Wade), and Roberts is looking a little bit like a young Muhammad Ali dancing his way around the hearing room. He's drawn his judicial line about what he is going to say and what he isn't. Steam is rising from Democratic collars, and their Republican colleagues have all but grabbed Roberts's arm and thrown it up in victory. Yesterday, they'd almost stopped asking questions, opting instead for congratulatory speeches.

Don't be fooled, though. There are many rounds to go.

Any evidence you need is right outside the doors of Hearing Room 216 in the Hart office building. When Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) calls a 15-minute break, what was constrained tension inside the room explodes into the corridors.

This is spin city, where both sides jockey to get their word out to an American public preoccupied with Hurricane Katrina, the war in Iraq and gas prices that require second mortgages.

A bank of cameras lines one wall, and look, there's Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) in front of a row of mikes. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) is just behind him as Coburn voices his frustration with the Democrats, who he says just aren't giving Roberts a fair shot.

"We want judges who are well qualified. Ginsburg was confirmed with 96 votes. . . . I would hate to see a double standard," Coburn is saying.

A few feet away, Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, the liberal organization that helped defeat the nomination of Robert Bork 18 years ago, is surrounded by reporters, too.

He's got a one-liner that he's working about Roberts, who in his introductory remarks on Monday likened the role of a judge to that of an umpire.

"He's spent his time talking about baseball, now he's playing dodgeball," Neas says, venting his frustration about the nominee. "I think the American people have a right to know the judicial philosophy of Judge Roberts."

Roberts, he says, is being disingenuous, too clever by half, giving answers about privacy, then quickly qualifying them so that they are only, well -- dodges.

Then a reporter listening to Neas is interrupted by a tug on the sleeve.

It's Greg Mueller, president of Creative Response Concepts, who's flacking for conservative groups the Federalist Society and the Judicial Confirmation Network.

"Hey," he says, with a nod in the opposite direction, with what will have to pass for a come-hither look. Mueller's operation has been working the hearing room and hallway like that all week. There are some viewpoints he wants to make sure don't get overlooked in this crowd.

Abigail Thernstrom, the conservative vice chair of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, is really annoyed at Ted Kennedy's persistent questions on voting rights.

No sooner than Thernstrom is done, Bethanie Swendsen, media coordinator for the Family Research Council, is introducing Tony Perkins. Perkins, president of the conservative group that would like to see Roe v. Wade overturned, says he's pleased with what he's been hearing from Roberts. He likes his philosophy and how he approaches the hearings.

"We're here making sure we're getting what we were promised," he says.

And what's that?

"A judge who practices judicial restraint. Roberts understands the limited role of the court."

"With all the media, these are high-stakes games," Mueller says. "And a little presidential politics are going on here."

"Hey, if Ralph Neas is having a mini-press conference, then we have to make sure that folks get to hear the other side," he says.

Julie Bernstein, communications director for the Alliance for Justice, is working just as hard, getting interviews for her boss, Nan Aron, who along with Neas and Wade Henderson of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, are well known activists working to oppose the nominations of conservative judges.

"Since seating is so restrictive, we try and connect reporters to leaders in the civil rights and women's rights communities so they can share their reactions with press," says Bernstein, who doesn't have a seat in the hearings. She has to watch it on television, then get on scene during the breaks.

DOJ_NMG_0005501

Her boss is doing more than working the hall. Aron is meeting with senators and liberal groups that have come to lobby their representatives against Roberts.

Aron didn't get home until almost midnight Tuesday, she says, and was up yesterday by 4 a.m., getting ready for another day of the message wars.

Even the seating in the hearing room seems to be divided into camps, with Aron, Neas and allies such as Kim Gandy, of the National Organization for Women, and Debra Ness, of the National Partnership for Women & Families, on one side of the room. Thernstrom and others are seated across the aisle.

"What we do now will establish how they handle future nominations," Aron said of the Bush administration. "This is the time to send the White House a message. That helps frame [the debate for] filing the O'Connor seat."

Ding! That's the bell for the next round.

Roberts Parries Queries On Roe And End Of Life (NYT)

By Adam Liptak And Robin Toner

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - Judge John G. Roberts Jr. faced increasingly contentious questions from Democrats on Wednesday as he outlined his views on an array of legal issues, but repeatedly declined to address some of the most ideologically charged matters, including whether the Constitution establishes a right to abortion and a right to die.

"I'm not standing for election," Judge Roberts said in one testy exchange on end-of-life issues on the third day of his confirmation hearings for chief justice of the United States. [Excerpts, Page A28.]

His refusal to elaborate on his statement that there is a constitutionally protected right to privacy drew criticism from Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, one of several Democrats on the Judiciary Committee who challenged him with growing frustration on Wednesday.

"Without any knowledge of your understanding of the law, because you will not share it with us," Mr. Biden said, "we are rolling the dice with you, Judge."

But Judge Roberts, by the end of a second long day of careful, unflappable testimony, appeared in comfortable position for a confirmation vote next Thursday in the Republican-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee and, many Republicans predicted, a strong vote the following week in the full Senate, where Republicans have a 10-vote majority.

"If people can't vote for you," Senator Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah, told Judge Roberts, "then I doubt that they can vote for any Republican nominee."

Leading Democrats on the committee refused to discuss how they would vote, saying Judge Roberts's views were still largely unknown.

"The American people are entitled to answers," said Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts.

Judge Roberts did respond to questions on capital punishment, affirmative action, the limits of Congressional power and other legal issues during 10 hours of testimony before the committee's 18 senators.

He said, for instance, that he agreed with an aspect of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's decision in a recent case that allowed public colleges and universities to take race into account in admissions decisions. The decision took note of the practical consequences for minority applicants.

"You do need to look at the real-world impact in this area," Judge Roberts said.

He also discussed a Supreme Court death penalty case in which he filed a brief as a government lawyer in 1992. The brief said that newly discovered evidence of a death row inmate's innocence should not be considered by the courts if it is raised too late.

"Does the Constitution permit the execution of an innocent person?" asked Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont.

"I would think not," Judge Roberts said, adding later that the 1992 case did not involve DNA evidence that could provide categorical proof of innocence.

Also, while acknowledging that as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration he opposed a provision that made it easier to prove voting rights violations, Judge Roberts defended his position on the Voting Rights Act.

DOJ_NMG_0005502

"It wasn't a dispute about the goal," he said. "It wasn't a dispute about the objective." He said that he now believed that the broader approach ultimately adopted by Congress was constitutional.

While most of the questions ran along party lines - friendly from the Republicans, decidedly less so from the Democrats - senators from both parties expressed frustration with and even hostility toward the current court. That left Judge Roberts in the uncomfortable position of trying to protect the reputation and prerogatives of the institution he hopes to join while appearing attentive to the concerns of those who will decide whether he can.

Over and over, Judge Roberts was questioned by senators in both parties about Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision recognizing a constitutional right to abortion. As on Tuesday, he refused to discuss his views on whether the case should be overruled. Under questioning from Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, he did say that no one in the Bush administration had asked him for his views on the case.

Judge Roberts listened carefully to questions touching on any area related to abortion and hesitated to answer many of them. He was noticeably suspicious, for instance, when Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, asked him, "Would you agree that the opposite of being dead is being alive?"

Judge Roberts paused and said, hesitantly and to laughter, "Yes," adding, "I don't mean to be overly cautious in answering it."

The line of questioning did indeed end at abortion, and Judge Roberts declined to answer direct questions concerning it.

Judge Roberts also declined to answer questions about his personal views on issues like assisted suicide.

"I'm trying to see your feelings as a man," Ms. Feinstein said. "I'm not asking you for a legal view."

But Judge Roberts resisted, saying that a judge's personal views and values should play no role in his judicial decisions.

He also declined to comment on Bush v. Gore, the 2000 decision that resolved the presidential election that year.

He was less reluctant to talk about his judicial philosophy, so long as the discussion remained relatively abstract. He distanced himself, for instance, from the most conservative members of the current Supreme Court, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, who have said they view themselves as bound by the original meaning of the Constitution.

"I depart from some views of original intent," Judge Roberts said, without naming names. "I think you need to look at the words they use," referring to the framers of the Constitution, "and if the words adopt a broader principle, it applies more broadly."

He added, "I think the framers, when they used broad language like 'liberty,' like 'due process,' like 'unreasonable' with respect to searches and seizures, they were crafting a document that they intended to apply in a meaningful way down the ages."

He similarly distanced himself from members of the court, including Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Stephen G. Breyer, who have endorsed the citation of decisions from foreign courts in some cases. But Judge Roberts drew the line when Mr. Coburn suggested that Supreme Court justices who cite foreign judicial precedents in their decisions should be subject to impeachment.

Judge Roberts said he agreed that the citation of foreign law was "not a good approach." But, he added, "I wouldn't accuse judges or justices who disagree with that, though, of violating their oath."

In a somewhat similar vein, Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, asked Judge Roberts whether the Constitution authorizes Congress to limit the Supreme Court's jurisdiction to hear certain sorts of cases. Judge Roberts discussed the legal arguments on both sides of the question but suggested that he viewed any such efforts as unwise. "The primary check on the courts," he said, "has always been judicial self-restraint."

But Judge Roberts also said he was reluctant to pick too many fights with Congress, at least for now.

Mr. Coburn asked him, for instance, whether there was room for improvement in the clarity of the legislation Congress passes.

"Sitting where I am," Judge Roberts said, "I'm not terribly inclined to be critical of the Congress and wouldn't be, in any event."

Supporters of abortion rights remained wary of Judge Roberts. Planned Parenthood Federation of America formally announced its opposition to his nomination on Wednesday, saying Judge Roberts's record and testimony "leave grave doubt about whether he will protect, not take away, a woman's right to choose."

DOJ_NMG_0005503

Most Democrats of the Judiciary Committee seem inclined to oppose the Roberts nomination, but it is still unclear how Democrats as a whole will vote. Republicans are all but challenging them not to vote for a jurist who is unquestionably qualified.

Ed Gillespie, the former Republican Party chairman who is overseeing the nomination on behalf of the White House, said, "If you apply the historical standard - is he intellectually qualified, is he ethically qualified, is he fair and even-handed, the standard that allowed Justice Scalia to get close to 100 votes and Justice Ginsburg to get close to 100 votes, then clearly Judge Roberts deserves to get close to 100 votes."

But some Democrats argue that times have changed, that the nation and the courts are far more ideologically divided than they were during those earlier nominations and that they have a right to know where Judge Roberts stands on some of the most divisive issues.

"There's so much water under the dam since then," Mrs. Feinstein said.

"The nation is divided, it's polarized, we're at war," she said, adding, "Executive authority is very much on people's minds."

Moreover, the prospect of another nomination - and how conservative he or she might be - is an unpredictable variable in any political calculation, many strategists said.

Judge Roberts gave expansive answers, seeming most at ease when he was given the opportunity to explain the state of the law in complex areas like eminent domain and antitrust. He did not give much detail about his own views on these topics, but his discussion of the leading cases and governing principles was informal, confident and lucid.

After declining to answer any questions on Tuesday about charges that he had acted improperly in participating in a case earlier this year, he gave some basic information about it on Wednesday. The case concerned the military commissions the Bush administration intends to use to try several of those being held as enemy combatants at the naval base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. Judge Roberts joined a decision ruling for the administration in July.

Experts on legal ethics have been divided about whether Judge Roberts should have recused himself given that he was then under consideration for the Supreme Court. On Wednesday, Judge Roberts said that the decision was drafted before there was a Supreme Court vacancy and completed before he was first interviewed by President Bush.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said that Judge Roberts's refusal to answer many questions had rendered the hearings absurd. Mr. Schumer suggested that Judge Roberts would not even name his favorite movies.

Judge Roberts named two: "Doctor Zhivago" and "North by Northwest."

Nominee Is Standing On Precedent, And Setting His Own, With Hearing Responses (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - Time and again, as he has danced his way around questions on issues like the right to privacy and the right to die, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. has looked to the past, saying he is simply following the precedent of Supreme Court nominees who have come before him and will become his colleagues if he is confirmed.

But with a second vacancy on the court, Judge Roberts is also setting his own precedent for whomever comes next.

As President Bush's nominee to be the nation's 17th chief justice, Judge Roberts has carved out what Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, on Wednesday called "the Roberts standard," drawing the line against talking about cases that, in the judge's view, are likely to come before the Supreme Court.

"I think what he's trying to do," Mr. Graham said, "is to bootstrap himself to past justice's hearings, follow their lead, and trying to tell the next nominee: 'Where you can, speak.' "

But the nominee is not talking nearly enough to satisfy Democrats, and how he is interpreting his standard has become a major flashpoint in the hearings. On Wednesday, Democrats grew increasingly agitated over what they regarded as his repeated refusal to answer their questions. A coalition of civil rights and liberal advocacy groups, meanwhile, was making plans to run an Internet advertisement on Thursday spotlighting what they regarded as stonewalling by Judge Roberts.

In one particularly contentious exchange on Wednesday afternoon, Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, pressed Judge Roberts - who acknowledged a day earlier that the Constitution included a right to privacy - on the case of Lawrence v. Texas, in which the court found that the right to privacy provided a framework for protection of gay rights.

DOJ_NMG_0005504

Mr. Schumer reminded Judge Roberts that Justice Clarence Thomas, who voted in the minority on the Lawrence case, had spoken at his own confirmation hearings of a general right to privacy. The two men went round and round on the issue, with Judge Roberts repeatedly declining to talk about Lawrence.

"Would you say there's a general right to privacy?" Mr. Schumer finally asked.

"I don't know what 'general' means," Judge Roberts replied.

Yet at times, the judge has surprised senators, as he did on Wednesday, when Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, asked if he agreed with an opinion in which Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said the court should give great weight to the "real world impact" of affirmative action in universities.

"Well, Senator," Judge Roberts replied, "I think I can answer the specific questions you asked, because, as you phrased the question - Do you agree with her that it's important to look at the real-world significance and impact? - and I can certainly say that I do think that that is the appropriate approach; without commenting on the outcome or the judgment in a particular case."

Judge Roberts has argued that he has been more forthcoming than some of his predecessors - an obvious reference to Justice Antonin Scalia, who declined even to answer questions about Marbury v. Madison, the fundamental 1803 decision that established the authority of the Supreme Court to strike down laws as unconstitutional.

Michael Gerhardt, a law professor at the University of North Carolina, said that Judge Roberts had indeed been more expansive than Justice Scalia, but not by much.

"I think there has been a spectrum," Professor Gerhardt said, "with Justice Scalia clearly being the least forthcoming of all modern nominees, post-1982 nominees, and I think Justices Breyer and Ginsburg have been among the most forthcoming nominees," referring to Justices Stephen G. Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. He said Judge Roberts "is closest to what I would call the Scalia end of the spectrum."

That delights Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a conservative advocacy group. The next nominee can "follow his footsteps," Mr. Perkins said, adding, "If I were another nominee, I would carefully study his responses, the way he has handled questions."

Democrats and Republicans have kept tallies of the number of questions that Judge Roberts has answered. Republicans said he had declined to answer 57 of 477 questions, while Justice Ginsburg had declined to answer 59 of 275.

But Democrats say it is the substance, not the numbers, that is important. Justice Ginsburg's standard was to answer questions if she had either written about cases or taken a public position on them, though Democrats say in some cases she went beyond that. Judge Roberts has little trouble adhering to that standard because, having served on the United States Court of Appeals for just two years, he has a limited record.

Mr. Schumer said that was all the more reason for Judge Roberts to be forthcoming.

"I think he's answered fewer questions than most nominees, and his burden was greater than most nominees, because most nominees have a more extensive record," Mr. Schumer said, adding, "Just when they're needed to talk more, they talk less."

Roberts Heads Toward Likely Confirmation (BSUN)

By Gwyneth K. Shaw

The Baltimore Sun, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Pressed by senators on issues ranging from private property rights to the right to die, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. said Wednesday that he would not allow his personal views to creep into his work on the Supreme Court.

President Bush's nominee for chief justice declined, for the second day in a row, to lay out his views on issues that might come before the court. His reticence prompted annoyance from Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, who complained that the 50-year-old appellate judge was talking a lot but saying little.

"Without any knowledge of your understanding of the law -- because you will not share it with us -- we are rolling the dice with you, Judge," said Democratic Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware.

Republicans defended Roberts' right to demur, saying previous nominees have done so.

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch told Roberts he was the best nominee he had seen in decades and that he looked forward to watching him in the chief justice's seat when the court begins its new term Oct. 3.

DOJ_NMG_0005505

"We've seen some really sterling, brilliant, wonderful people before this committee. But I've never seen anybody who has done a better job of explaining himself than you have," said the Utah Republican. "If people can't vote for you, then I doubt that they can vote for any Republican nominee."

A final, short round of questioning is set for Thursday morning, followed by testimony from more than two dozen outside witnesses, including former colleagues and conservative and liberal partisans.

Republicans hold a 10-8 advantage on the committee, which is expected to approve Roberts' nomination next week. Barring a major surprise, the Senate will confirm him as the nation's 17th chief justice this month.

Wednesday, senators returned to Roberts' interpretation of the right to privacy, with both sides looking for hints about how he might vote in abortion cases. The conversations wound up being mostly one-sided.

Biden asked about the ability of citizens to make decisions about ending their lives and encouraged Roberts to answer on a personal level. Roberts replied that judges should not bring their personal views into their decisions.

"I'm not going to consider issues like that in the context as a father or a husband, or anything else," Roberts said. "I think obviously putting aside any of those considerations, these issues are the most difficult we face as people and they are profoundly affected by views of individuality and moral views and deeply personal views."

Democratic Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont asked Roberts about the rights of death-row inmates to appeal their cases, pointing to the exoneration of a string of wrongfully convicted prisoners.

"Does the Constitution permit the execution of an innocent person?" Leahy asked.

"I would think not," Roberts replied. "But the question is never 'Do you allow the execution of an innocent person?' The question is 'Do you allow particular claimants to raise different claims, four or five or six times, to say at the last minute that somebody who just died was actually the person who committed the murder and let's have a new trial? Or do you take into account the proceedings that have already gone on?'"

Sen. Sam Brownback, a Kansas Republican, asked about one of the Supreme Court's most contentious recent decisions, in which the city of New London, Conn., was allowed to take private property and give it to another private entity for economic development.

Roberts said Congress and state legislatures have the power to pass laws barring such transactions. He would not say whether he thought the case was wrongly decided but did say the primary check on judges is their self-restraint.

"They're given life tenure, as you mentioned, precisely because they're not shaping policy. They're not supposed to be responsive; they're supposed to just interpret the law," Roberts said.

Democrats View Roberts As Evasive (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings And Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- White House hopes for Judge John Roberts to be confirmed as chief justice by a wide margin in the Senate grew dimmer yesterday, as Democrats complained that the nominee gave narrowly crafted responses or declined to answer questions about civil rights, privacy and other issues.

With Republicans holding a 10-vote Senate advantage, Judge Roberts is likely to be confirmed. But Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee have stepped up their accusations that he is being evasive, and will use that claim to lobby their colleagues to withhold their votes. Democrats argue that Judge Roberts's thin public record -- two years on the federal appeals court here, after two decades of private practice and service in Republican administrations -- is inadequate to gauge his approach to major legal issues.

No senator has announced plans to vote against Judge Roberts, and he has carefully avoided giving them any new substantive grounds for doing so during two full days of questioning. But some Democrats have stepped close to opposition. A confirmation vote, based on what legislators now know, would be like "rolling the dice with you, judge," Sen. Joseph Biden (D., Del.) told the nominee at one point yesterday, the second full day he faced questions by the panel.

Judge Roberts defended his decision not to answer all questions -- and insisted that he has been more forthcoming than some previous nominees who declined to discuss even long-settled landmark cases. But he said that speaking on issues he believed might return to the high court would be inappropriate, and suggested that some senators had crossed this line.

"This is not a process under which senators get to say, 'I want you to rule this way, this way and this way, and if you tell me you'll rule this way, this way and this way, I'll vote for you,' " he told Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.), perhaps the most aggressive questioner.

As a concession to Democrats, Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) agreed, over White House objections, to allow questioning to continue into this morning.

The Bush administration wants to pull in a substantial number of Democrats when the full Senate votes -- likely in two weeks -- on Judge Roberts, hoping that will give the president room to nominate a more openly conservative judge to fill the seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

The political intensity heightened yesterday when a federal court in Sacramento, Calif., ruled that local authorities couldn't require teacher-led recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools. The issue has outraged social conservatives, and was mentioned by several Republican senators during yesterday's hearing as evidence of improper judicial activism they hope Judge Roberts will halt. In his decision, the Sacramento judge wrote that the Supreme Court had given lower courts confusing guidance on religion cases.

Judge Roberts declined to comment on the case directly, but agreed that the Supreme Court should provide more clarity.

White House officials have hoped that Judge Roberts' résumé and gracious manner could persuade at least one or two Democrats on the panel, say people familiar with their strategy. But one of their prime targets, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D. Calif.), yesterday expressed frustration. In order to make a judgment on his nomination, "I do expect to know a little bit more about how you think," she said.

Despite Democratic complaints, Judge Roberts did give a few more glimpses of his views. After Sen. Sam Brownback (R., Kan.) excoriated the high court's June decision that local governments enjoyed wide discretion in exercising their eminent-domain powers, Judge Roberts explained that the court had -- as lawmakers have demanded in other contexts -- deferred to the judgment of elected officials.

"The court was not saying you have...to exercise this power. What the court was saying is, there is this power, and then it's up to the legislature to determine whether it wants that to be available," Judge Roberts said. He didn't say whether he agreed with the ruling, but in response to Sen. Herb Kohl (D., Wis.) said it had "surprised" him.

Sen. Tom Coburn (R., Okla.) suggested that justices who cite foreign authority in interpreting constitutional provisions might deserve impeachment. Judge Roberts replied that while he disapproved of looking to foreign sources, "I wouldn't accuse judges or justices who disagree" of "violating their oath. I'd accuse them of getting it wrong on that point, and I'd hope to sit down with them and debate it and reason about it."

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.) asked Judge Roberts his views on government restrictions on media coverage. The judge said he had limited experience with First Amendment law, but said "there is obviously a balancing of sorts between particular interests when you're dealing with governmental operations, and there's some perfectly valid reasons for excluding media. On the other hand, simply disagreement about whether it's an appropriate issue for the public to see would not strike me as a very compelling governmental interest."

Responding to Sen. Feinstein, Judge Roberts seemed to accept affirmative action, saying he endorsed "efforts to ensure the full participation in all aspects of our society by people, without regard to their race, ethnicity, gender or religious beliefs," which he said was also the policy of the Reagan administration, where he worked on affirmative-action issues. He didn't say whether he specifically considered race-conscious affirmative-action programs constitutional.

Responding to Illinois Democrat Richard Durbin's questions on capital punishment, Judge Roberts acknowledged a "risk" of executing innocent people, because like any "human enterprise" the criminal justice system is flawed. But he also defended the goal -- over the objections of civil libertarians -- of limiting condemned inmates from raising repeated claims of innocence. "Do you allow someone who has raised several claims over the years to suddenly say at the last minute, somebody who just died was the person who committed the murder, and does that mean you start the trial all over again, simply on the basis of that last-minute claim, or do you require more of a showing at that stage?" he told Mr. Leahy at another point. As deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration, Judge Roberts helped persuade the Supreme Court to bar such an appeal. The high court will hear a case on a related issue in its coming term.

Roberts Displays More Moderate Views (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee John Roberts suggested Wednesday that his views on civil rights were more moderate than those he expressed during his days as a Reagan administration lawyer, and he hinted at a concern for gay men and lesbians who might face discrimination.

Roberts, 50, also described several principles that seemed to separate his legal views from those of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the high court's most conservative members. Roberts said he did not subscribe to a limited view of constitutional liberty, and he suggested that constitutional principles should evolve with the times.

That's a distinction from the views of Scalia and Thomas, who view the Constitution as a more rigid document. Their approach leads to a narrow interpretation of the constitutional guarantee of equality for racial minorities and women, provides no right to abortion and offers no particular protection for gay men and lesbians. The comments by Roberts — the federal judge President Bush has chosen to replace the late William Rehnquist as chief justice — were significant because Bush has said he wants court nominees like Scalia and Thomas.

Roberts' testimony Wednesday suggested that he might not be as conservative as Scalia or Thomas, and that his brand of conservatism could be more in line with that of Rehnquist, for whom Roberts once was a law clerk.

Whatever light Roberts shed on his legal views Wednesday, it wasn't enough for several Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee. For the second day, they were irked that Roberts refused to answer several questions on issues that he said might come before the high court.

“We are rolling the dice with you, judge,” Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., told Roberts after Biden failed to draw out the nominee's views on when someone can remove life support to an ailing relative. Even so, Roberts offered some insight into his philosophy:

•In response to questions from Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., Roberts said he could not address whether Congress could bar discrimination against gays and lesbians in employment because the question might come before the court. However, Roberts said, “Personally, I believe that everybody should be treated with dignity in this area and respect.”

•Roberts suggested to Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., that he did not believe federal voting rights laws should be weakened. In a lengthy give-and-take with Kennedy, Roberts distanced himself from a position he argued during the Reagan administration that would have limited protections in the Voting Rights Act intended to help blacks and Hispanics elect more of their own. Roberts said that if he were called upon to interpret the law or any amendments, “I would, of course, confront that issue as a judge and not as a staff attorney for an administration with a position.”

•He also said that when the Supreme Court upheld the use of affirmative action in college admissions in 2003, it rightly examined “the real-world impact in this area.” Without commenting on the ruling, he implicitly agreed with an approach used by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who cited the importance of fostering diversity on campuses.

•Roberts emphasized the need for competent lawyers to represent defendants who face capital punishment, to minimize the risk of executing the innocent.

•Roberts said dilemmas over the “right to die” and physician-assisted suicide are “the most difficult that we face as individuals.” He said a judge's job, however, is to set aside any personal feelings and look to the law.

Roberts passed up opportunities to compare himself with current justices, and he declined to answer questions by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., on how his view of privacy rights differs from Thomas'. Schumer noted that Thomas, like Roberts, had testified as a nominee that he believed in a constitutional right to privacy. As a justice, however, Thomas has not embraced the idea.

“I will be my own man on the Supreme Court, period,” Roberts said.

DOJ_NMG_0005508

Although the committee's eight Democrats have fired tough questions at Roberts this week, none has declared that they will not vote for him. Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., gave the judge high marks for his performance. “I don't think he's hurt himself,” Kohl said.

Several of the panel's 10 Republicans, such as Jon Kyl of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, said they will back Roberts.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., wants a Senate vote on Roberts by the end of the month, so Roberts could join the court by the start of its term Oct. 3.

Roberts Appears Open To New Interpretations (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON — Chief justice nominee John G. Roberts Jr. carefully avoided taking sides on many issues Wednesday, but he went out of his way at his Senate confirmation hearing to put some distance between himself and justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas — the Supreme Court's two staunchest conservatives.

And the issue was a basic one, with possibly great import for the future: How should a high court justice interpret the Constitution?

Scalia and Thomas proudly call themselves "originalists." They say the Constitution should be interpreted strictly, based on its literal words and its original history.

Like other conservatives, they shun the notion of a "living Constitution." They say their approach is faithful to the Constitution as it was written in 1787 and amended since then. Scalia says, only half-joking, that he believes in a "dead Constitution."

This look to the past leaves no room to consider such contemporary concepts as a right to die or equal rights for gays.

Roberts pointedly said Wednesday that he disagreed with this narrow originalist approach and would apply the Constitution in light of today's concerns and understandings.

"I depart from some views of original intent," he told the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Words such as liberty or equality should not be given a "cramped or narrow construction," based on "just the conditions at the time" when the Constitution was written, he said.

"The framers chose broad terms, [with] a broad applicability, and they state a broad principle," he told Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the committee's chairman.

He noted that the preamble to the Constitution says the document was designed "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

"It applies to modern times," he said. The Founding Fathers intended the Constitution "to apply to changing conditions. And I think that in that sense, it is alive … and applies down through the ages," Roberts said.

It is certainly not clear how Roberts would decide controversies such as abortion rights, gay rights or the right to die. He repeatedly refused to state his view or comment on most past rulings on those disputes.

But his comments hint that he is at least open to a future decision saying the Constitution protects a right to die, or gives gays protection from discrimination.

Roberts also endorsed the 1965 decision in Griswold vs. Connecticut, which first spoke of a right to privacy in the Constitution. The ruling struck down an archaic state law that prohibited the use of contraceptives, but it has remained controversial because the right to privacy formed the basis for the Roe vs. Wade ruling in 1973, which established a woman's right to abortion.

Roberts said much during the two days of questioning that should reassure conservatives. He emphasized that the court has a "limited role" in deciding social controversies, and he insists judges should not "make law."

He also said the Constitution should be read in light of the "nation's history, traditions and practices."

And several conservative lawyers said Wednesday that they were not troubled by his comments about interpreting the Constitution.

"What I think Roberts was saying was that the framers were smart enough to take into account changes in circumstances," said Leonard Leo, executive vice president of the Federalist Society. "I don't read all that much into what he said."

Leo added, "It's right to say he believes privacy is protected, and the language of the Constitution is broad enough to capture modern problems. But he would not take these broad principles and rewrite the Constitution."

Whether to focus on the past or the present often divides the Supreme Court.

Scalia has scoffed at the notion of a right to die and insisted the justices have no business even discussing such claims.

But most of his colleagues have taken a more flexible view of the nation's founding charter. When faced with the question of whether to maintain the death penalty for mentally retarded defendants, the majority barred such executions in 2002, saying this was "cruel and unusual punishment" in light of "evolving standards of decency" in America.

Scalia and Thomas dissented, along with the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. They said such executions would not have troubled the authors of the Constitution, and therefore, they should not be deemed unconstitutional today.

Two years ago, in a victory for gay rights, the court struck down a Texas law that made sex between gays a crime. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, speaking for the majority, said the law violated the constitutional right to liberty in light of contemporary American values. Rehnquist, Scalia and Thomas dissented.

Scalia said he feared this evolving notion of liberty meant the high court would soon rule that gays had a constitutional right to marry, a prospect that has divided the nation.

The debate largely concerns a few words in the 14th Amendment, adopted in 1868, after the Civil War. It says states may not "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny [them] the equal protection of the laws."

Roberts said these words, read literally, might mean only that the government may not arrest and hold someone without giving them due process of law. He said he believed the protection for liberty went well beyond that interpretation and included protections for fundamental rights.

For example, Roberts cited the court's decision in 1925 that struck down a state law that required children to enroll in public schools. The justices said parents had the "personal liberty" to send their children to the school of their choice, including a private or parochial school.

As was the case when the committee began questioning Roberts on Tuesday, Democrats spent much of Wednesday's hearing trying to pin him down on issues such as abortion and civil rights. As he did Tuesday, he dodged most of their inquiries.

At one point, he refused even to answer whether a mentally competent dying person had a right to end his life. The Supreme Court answered that question in 1990. In the case of Nancy Cruzan, the justices agreed that all people have a right to refuse unwanted medical treatment.

The harder issue, in Cruzan's case as well as the recent one involving Terri Schiavo, arises when patients cannot speak for themselves.

Roberts refused to tip his hand. "There are cases involving disputes between people asserting their rights to terminate life, to remove feeding tubes, either on their own behalf or on behalf of others," he said.

"Those are issues that will come before the court, and I will confront those issues in light of the court's precedents with an open mind."

A Conservative, Yes, But Not A Scalia (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

After two days of often intense questioning of John G. Roberts Jr. by the Senate Judiciary Committee, a new image of President Bush's nominee for chief justice of the United States is coming into focus.

Still blurry at the edges, thanks to Roberts's refusal to declare how he would rule on abortion rights and other specific issues, it is nevertheless a picture of a conservative different in important respects from the two members of the Supreme Court whom Bush has said he most admires, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

Scalia has said that courts should avoid basing their interpretations of laws on the history behind them; Roberts said there is a role for legislative history. Thomas has embraced an approach to constitutional interpretation that relies heavily on his view of the original intent of the framers; Roberts said that is not always possible.

Concretely, Roberts said he believes the Constitution creates a right to privacy. Such a right was recognized by the Supreme Court in modern cases protecting the use of contraception, abortion and consensual homosexual conduct, but which Scalia and Thomas have sharply criticized.

Asked by Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) if he considered himself "in the mold" of Scalia and Thomas, Roberts replied, "I will be my own man on the Supreme Court."

While the differences may seem like nuances, they are likely to play an important role at the court, especially because Roberts has been named to fill the chief justice's chair.

As an eclectic legal thinker who can easily play at the same intellectual level as Scalia and Thomas, yet without employing the sharp rhetoric that Scalia especially is known to aim at colleagues, Roberts could exert a strong pull on the other justices -- particularly Anthony M. Kennedy, who, after Sandra Day O'Connor retires, probably will be left as the court's sole center-right swing voter.

Randy E. Barnett, a professor of law at Boston University and a leading thinker in conservative academic circles, likened Roberts to justices such as Felix Frankfurter and Robert H. Jackson, moderate conservatives appointed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt who "deferred to Congress, the executive and to legal precedent -- in some unspecified mix."

Roberts was perhaps most unlike Scalia and Thomas in his acknowledgment that the Constitution creates a right to privacy, even if such a right is not specifically spelled out.

Among the few cases he was willing to discuss specifically were a 1965 ruling, Griswold v. Connecticut , and a 1972 ruling, Eisenstadt v. Baird , which guaranteed a right to contraception use by married couples and singles.

Roberts said he agreed with the results of Griswold and Eisenstadt , noting that, in his view, privacy is part of the "liberty" that the 14th Amendment says cannot be taken away without due process of law.

Griswold and Eisenstadt formed part of the chain of precedents that led to Roe v. Wade in 1973.

In a 2003 case, Lawrence v. Texas , the court invoked this right to strike down all state laws banning consensual sex between same-sex couples.

Scalia has practically made a career out of attacking the court's past cases in which it has read specific "substantive" rights into the 14th Amendment's liberty clause. For him, and for many other conservatives, "substantive due process" is a contradiction in terms that gives judicial activists license to convert their own views into constitutional law.

Dissenting in Lawrence , he wrote disparagingly of Griswold and the "so-called right to privacy"; Thomas, agreeing with a dissenting justice in Griswold , said he could find no such right in the Constitution.

There is, however, a limit to the daylight between Scalia and Thomas, on the one hand, and Roberts on the other.

Roberts stopped well short of endorsing Roe -- or calling for its overruling -- in the hearings.

Social conservatives who support his nomination said they were generally comfortable with his testimony, which some said privately was what he had to say to help get confirmed. At the same time, it is also possible that Roberts will change his views once he is on the court.

As Schumer pointed out yesterday, Thomas gave a similar answer to Roberts on the right to privacy at his 1991 confirmation hearing, but struck a different note it in Lawrence .

Still, there was other evidence that Roberts, while he might or might not reach the same results as Scalia and Thomas, would approach cases in a different way.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) asked Roberts: "To what extent do you share Justice Scalia's view on unreliability of legislative history?"

Roberts replied that, though the interpretation of a law or the Constitution has to begin with the text, "I have quoted and looked to legislative history in the past to help determine the meaning of ambiguous terms, and I would expect to follow that same approach on the Supreme Court."

Whereas Scalia and Thomas often look to strict rules of statutory or constitutional interpretation to keep judges from taking over the legislative or executive function, Roberts repeatedly emphasized the restraining influence of what he called "the judicial process."

Harking back to concepts he learned at Harvard Law School, Roberts depicted judges deliberating within a kind of insulated environment in which the only materials they take into account are existing law, legal briefs, the case record and the views of other judges.

"It's basically an emphasis on legal craftsmanship," Barnett said. "You take a smidgen of history, a dollop of text, a spoonful of precedent and ladle it all over a very sensitive treatment of the facts and that yields a very high-quality product."

Roberts Says He's Been More Expansive Than Confirmed Justices (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman And Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Law.com, September 15, 2005

John Roberts Jr. moved into the second day of questioning before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday, with Democrats still complaining that the likely future chief justice remains too much of a cipher, and with GOP committee members stressing that Roberts has answered more questions than any other nominee.

"I do think I've been more expansive than most nominees, and those justices were confirmed," Roberts told Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz.

The committee will wrap up questioning of Roberts on Thursday morning, then proceed directly to six panels of witnesses, who will speak for and against the nominee.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said late Wednesday that he would conclude the Roberts hearings on Thursday and set a committee vote on the nominee for Sept. 22.

As in his testimony on the previous day, Roberts was probed about his views on the Voting Rights Act, privacy and the judiciary's proper role in interpreting congressional statutes.

And as in Tuesday's performance, Roberts was loath to do more than outline in the broadest terms his view of how he would adjudicate certain issues, prompting a frustrated Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., to complain: "It's as if we ask you what movies you like, and you say, 'I like movies with good acting.' And if I ask you if you like 'Casablanca' and you tell me, 'Lots of people like 'Casablanca.'"

"'Doctor Zhivago' and 'North by Northwest,'" Roberts shot back.

It was a rare moment of humor in an all-day hearing during which Democrats appeared increasingly outgunned by an unperturbable witness. One chief counsel for a committee Republican noted the reams of paperwork being passed between staff and the panel's 18 members and remarked, "Roberts has just got all this stuff in his head."

Indeed, by the end of the day, the most interesting question was not whether Roberts would win confirmation, but whether he would secure any Democratic votes in the process.

Earlier in the day, in some of the week's most heated testimony, Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., bored into Roberts in an effort to elicit his views on whether a state legislature should have the right to pass laws restricting the right of a dying person's next of kin to remove a feeding tube, evoking the Terri Schiavo case.

"You are one of the best witnesses to come before this committee, and I've been here some 30 years," said Biden, who had been chided by Specter the day before for repeatedly interrupting Roberts' testimony. "You've convinced folks on Sen. [Sam] Brownback's side that you are just right for them, and on Sen. [Edward] Kennedy's that you are just right for them," he added, referring to one of the committee's most conservative members and one of its most liberal.

Roberts replied that his personal views would not enter into his decision-making on the issue and that he would decide a question like that "based on my understanding of the law."

"That's what I want to know about," retorted Biden. "We're rolling the dice with you, Judge."

Roberts, however, who has yet to show any flashes of anger, and only the rarest moments of irritation, refused to give a direct answer. "Senator, that's asking me for an opinion in the abstract that will come before the Court," he replied.

After Biden noted that executive and legislative branch candidates must lay out their views on various issues, while judicial candidates can keep theirs to themselves, Roberts launched into a vigorous defense of judicial independence.

It was no accident that federal judges don't stand for election, Roberts said, adding that to make pledges in a confirmation hearing would violate their role as open-minded and fair arbiters of legal disputes. "It is contrary to the role of the judge in our society that this judge should go on the bench because this is his or her position," said Roberts. "That's inconsistent with the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court."

So far, the three days of hearings have been marked by Roberts' disarming manner, which allows him to repeatedly turn down senators' requests for answers yet maintain what appears to be a large reservoir of good will among the entire committee.

While Roberts insisted he had been "more expansive" than other nominees, he largely stuck to his views on cases, such as 1803's Marbury v. Madison, that are unlikely to be reconsidered by the Court. But then again, in 1986, then-nominee Antonin Scalia would not even comment on Marbury.

But the 50-year-old federal appeals court judge did surrender a few pieces of information on Wednesday, in particular his views on the high court's proclivity to produce decisions with several concurring opinions.

Specter said he was troubled by the Court's decisions in June 2004 over the detainees at Guantánamo Bay, calling the opinions "a patchwork of confusion." In response, Roberts seemed to almost startle the committee by implying that too many separate opinions were not a good thing.

"The Supreme Court speaks only as a court," he said. "Individually, the justices have no authority... . [A]n important function of the Supreme Court is to provide guidance. As a lower court judge, I appreciate clear guidance from the Supreme Court."

And Roberts offered other comments Wednesday that could signal a different approach from Scalia and other conservative legal thinkers. "I depart from some views of the original intent" movement, Roberts said.

Originalists, he suggested, believe the Constitution should be interpreted in light of "just the conditions at that time, just the particular problem" at the time of the Constitution's drafting. "I think you need to look at the words they used, and if the words adopt a broader principle, it applies more broadly," he said.

When principles like liberty are involved, Roberts said, "that doesn't get a narrow construction." A broad view of the liberty concept could have implications for Roberts' views on privacy, abortion, and the right to die.

Looking More Moderate Than His Early Writings (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON — Chief justice nominee John G. Roberts Jr. offered a fuller accounting of his views on voting rights and affirmative action Wednesday in carefully guarded testimony that provided the barest hints that he did not hew to the most conservative positions on the two sensitive issues.

Under relentless and occasionally sharp interrogation before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Roberts also emphasized a modest approach to judicial action and a deference to Congress.

Panel members pressed him for his views on a series of controversial cases and social issues, searching for clues about how he would affect the Supreme Court's ideological balance.

Although his comments leaned toward a more moderate position than the views expressed in some of his writings as a Justice Department lawyer in the Reagan administration, they were so sparse and cautiously phrased that they sparked protests from Democrats about his refusal to be more forthcoming.

Roberts declined to discuss his views on whether the Constitution allowed terminally ill people to end their lives — even though the Supreme Court ruled that it did more than a decade ago.

And he declined to say whether he agreed with a high court ruling that limited the rights of death row inmates to appeal their convictions based on newly discovered evidence that might prove them innocent.

In the absence of answers, many panel members resorted to a kind of lobbying effort, seeking to impress upon Roberts their views of the law — opinions he might consider if, as expected, he wins Senate confirmation to lead the court.

"I hope, sitting in the marble palace, you'll remember that I have great pride in the success of the False Claims Act," Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) told Roberts. He made his remarks after trying, mostly unsuccessfully, to learn more about what

Roberts thought about a federal whistle-blower law Grassley sponsored that allows private individuals to sue in cases of government fraud.

A day after Democrats grilled Roberts over whether he would overturn high court rulings guaranteeing abortion rights — to no avail — antiabortion Republicans seized an opportunity to make their case, admittedly with little, if any, expectation of a response.

"I would just ask you, Judge Roberts, to consider — and probably you can't answer here today — whether individuals with disabilities have the same constitutional rights that you and I share while they're in the womb," Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) said.

"I appreciate your thoughts on the subject very much," Roberts said. But he declined to answer, saying: "Those precise questions could come before the courts."

Despite Roberts' reticence on several fronts, a somewhat more complete portrait of the 50-year-old federal appeals court judge and former Reagan administration lawyer emerged. At times, his newly expressed views seemed at odds with those contained in the thousands of pages of memos and musings he wrote as a government lawyer two decades ago.

Pressed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Roberts said he saw nothing "constitutionally suspect" in a provision of the Voting Rights Act that he had raised questions about in the early 1980s. The provision makes it possible for minorities to win voting rights cases without proving intentional discrimination by election officials.

His position on the rights law — a portion of which is set to expire in 2007 — is a central concern to Democrats wary that as chief justice, he would promote rigidly conservative views on civil rights.

Roberts expressed support for portions of a 2003 opinion by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor upholding the rights of state universities to consider race in making admission decisions. Roberts said it was proper for the court to take note of the positive effect of racial and ethnic diversity in the military when it upheld an admissions policy at the University of Michigan Law School.

"You do need to look at the real-world impact in this area," Roberts said.

Roberts gave what Republican members of the panel interpreted as signals that he would be more deferential to the power of Congress to enact laws without being second-guessed by an activist judiciary.

He said it would be appropriate for state and local lawmakers to pass legislation to lessen the effect of a Supreme Court ruling in June that took an expansive view of the right of the government to seize private property.

As Roberts concluded his second day of taking questions from senators, he appeared on track to win confirmation from the GOP-controlled committee. The panel is expected to conclude its questioning of Roberts today.

Several of the Republican committee members expressed effusive support for the nominee.

"If people can't vote for you, then I doubt that they can vote for any Republican nominee," Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said.

The Judiciary Committee chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), told reporters that Roberts had "answered more questions than most."

"Nominees answer about as many questions as they think they have to to be confirmed," Specter said.

But it remained uncertain how Democrats — either on the committee or in the full Senate — would vote on Roberts.

Several Democrats on the panel made it clear they were not persuaded that Roberts could set aside his political views and rule impartially on the court.

At the same time, they acknowledged privately that it was hard to quarrel with his credentials.

Republicans on the committee have pointed out that they set aside partisan differences in 1993 to vote overwhelmingly in favor of President Clinton's high court nominee — Ruth Bader Ginsburg, a former legal counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union. They argue that the opposition should return the courtesy and confirm the choice President Bush has made.

But Democrats say the country is more deeply divided now than it was then, and that the stakes are higher.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said that in the last 10 years, nearly 200 cases had been decided by a single vote, "which suggests that on major questions the court is also very divided."

Feinstein said that she supported Roberts' confirmation to the federal appeals court in Washington in 2003. "But there's more [at stake] in this vote," she said.

Other Democrats indicated they also would have problems supporting Roberts.

"We are rolling the dice with you, judge," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) said after Roberts declined to say whether he believed terminally ill people had a right to discontinue life-preserving treatment.

Roberts responded that he should not have to answer such questions, and that it would be dangerous if the process of selecting judges turned on promises that nominees made to elected officials.

"Judges don't stand for election. I'm not standing for election," he said.

But Biden said the judge was missing the point.

"No one's asking for a promise," he said.

Roberts Vows To Seek Consensus (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, September 15, 2005

U.S. Chief Justice nominee John Roberts said on Wednesday that if confirmed by the Senate he would seek consensus on the often bitterly divided Supreme Court that has spawned frustration with a series of 5-4 rulings.

Roberts, President George W. Bush's nominee to replace the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, made the pledge as Democrats complained he had dodged many questions in two days of his confirmation hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"When you add it all up you are being less forthcoming ... with this committee than just about any other person who has come before us," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), a New York Democrat.

Roberts, a conservative federal appeals court judge, calmly countered the complaint as he appeared headed toward confirmation by the Republican-led Senate before the court begins its new term on October 3.

"I wanted to be able to share as much as I can with the committee," he said.

The hearing, which began on Monday, recessed on Wednesday night, and was to resume early Thursday for a possible final day.

Besides his vow to seek consensus on the high court, Roberts has promised to address each case with an open mind and a strict interpretation of the Constitution and to safeguard the rights of all Americans.

But he refused to discuss a number of specific matters -- from voting rights to gender bias -- saying such issues may come before him on the court. He has said like earlier nominees, he did not want to prejudge them.

For example, Roberts declined to say if he favors reversing the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion, but said the Constitution affords Americans the right to privacy, the key legal underpinning of the landmark ruling.

Sen. Joseph Biden (news, bio, voting record), a Delaware Democrat, complained that Roberts' answers were so vague that both Republicans and Democrats thought he agreed with them.

"Without any knowledge of your understanding of the law, because you will not share it with us, we are rolling the dice with you, judge," Biden said.

Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, said the Senate knows a lot about Roberts, 50, who was one of the nation's top lawyers and served in the Reagan and first Bush administrations.

Specter asked Roberts what he would do to address what many lawmakers and state and local officials across the country claim is a tendency by the nine-member high court to produce often conflicting 5-4 decisions in recent years.

"I do think the chief justice has a particular obligation to try to achieve consensus consistent with everyone's individual oath to uphold the Constitution, and that would certainly be a priority for me if I were confirmed," Roberts said.

The court has been closely divided on issues including church-state separation and the death penalty. It has at times issued rulings that appeared to be at odds and based on narrow distinctions that failed to give broad legal principles.

"An important function of the Supreme Court is to provide guidance," said Roberts. "As a lower court judge, I appreciate clear guidance from the Supreme Court."

As he was testifying, a California atheist who last year lost a Supreme Court fight to remove the phrase "under God" from the Pledge of Allegiance won an initial round as he revived the case in the courts.

DOJ_NMG_0005515

While not commenting because the case could again be before the high court, Roberts said: "I think everyone would agree that the religion jurisprudence under the First Amendment, the establishment clause and the free exercise clause, could be clearer."

Though Democrats have challenged Roberts' commitment to civil rights and women's rights, based largely on memos he wrote as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration, Republicans control the Senate, holding 55 of 100 seats. A simple majority is needed to confirm him.

Roberts said his memos reflected the policies of a conservative administration that approached such issues differently from liberal critics.

"I would resist the suggestion that I'm racially insensitive," Roberts said. "I know why the phrase, 'Equal Justice Under Law' is carved in marble above the Supreme Court entrance."

Roberts Frustrates Committee Democrats (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jo Becker

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Democratic senators angrily accused John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday of hiding his views on end-of-life questions, privacy and other contentious issues, but the nominee to be the nation's 17th chief justice refused to be drawn out, and his Republican supporters said his confirmation is virtually assured.

Democrats' frustration boiled over several times during the eight hours of questioning, as Roberts repeatedly declined to discuss his personal or judicial views on matters that he said could come before the court someday. Senators implored him to speak from the heart, but Roberts told them time and again that he would be guided by "the rule of law."

"We are rolling the dice with you, Judge," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) said. "It's kind of interesting, this Kabuki dance we have in these hearings here, as if the public doesn't have a right to know what you think about fundamental issues facing them."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) accused Roberts of treating the hearing room as a "cone of silence." "It seems strange, I think, to the American people that you can't talk about decided cases -- past cases, not future cases -- when you've been nominated to the most important job in the federal judiciary," the senator said.

Roberts asked for extra time to defend himself. "I think I have been more forthcoming than any of the other nominees," said Roberts, who had reviewed the confirmation hearing testimony of all the sitting Supreme Court justices in preparation for his hearing. "It is not a process under which senators get to say: 'I want you to rule this way, this way and this way. And if you tell me you'll rule this way, this way and this way, I'll vote for you.' Judges are not politicians. They cannot promise to do certain things in exchange for votes."

But Republican Arlen Specter (Pa.), the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, also expressed irritation when Roberts refused to answer questions about several Supreme Court decisions striking down laws passed by Congress to help the disabled and victims of domestic violence. "Why not?" Specter asked sharply. "Judge Roberts, I'm not talking about an issue. I'm talking about the essence of jurisprudence."

But several Republicans defended Roberts's circumscribed answers for a second straight day and began congratulating him as though he were already on the court. As a sign of their confidence, Republican senators ended their questions late yesterday but agreed to let Democrats have another round today, and then conclude the day with testimony from outside witnesses. The committee plans to vote on the nomination Sept. 22. The full Senate will vote by the month's end, leaders said.

If Democrats will not support Roberts, said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), they will not endorse any GOP nominee. "They all admit that he is qualified," Hatch said in an interview. "So if they vote against him, it just means they are playing partisan politics and they'll look like hell."

Liberal activists privately said they would consider it a moral victory if all eight committee Democrats oppose Roberts, noting that the 10 Republicans are widely expected to back him. With Republicans holding 55 of the Senate's 100 seats -- and Democrats ruling out a filibuster -- his confirmation is highly likely, activists on both sides said.

In frequently emotional terms, Democrats pressed Roberts to discuss the government's proper role in determining when and how doctors and families can allow a terminally ill or severely incapacitated person to die. "Just talk to me as a father," Biden said. "Just tell me, just philosophically, what do you think?"

Roberts replied, "I'm not going to consider issues like that in the context as a father or a husband or anything else." He could not tell the panel how the law would guide him, he said, because "those are issues that come before the court."

Later, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) tried again. "I'm trying to see your feelings as a man," she said, adding that she had to make wrenching end-of-life decisions about her father and her husband. Roberts told her, "it is difficult to put yourself in that position."

"All I'm saying is, you wouldn't want the government telling you what to do," Feinstein said. Roberts replied: "Well, I'm happy to say that as a general matter." But when asked if there "should be a basic right of privacy" involved, he said: "Well, that's getting into a legal question."

Roberts testified that he believes it would be "very appropriate" for Congress and state legislatures to consider legislation to effectively modify a recent Supreme Court ruling that expanded the right of local governments to force the sale of private property in the name of economic development. "What the court was saying is 'There is this power' and then it's up to the legislature to determine whether it wants that to be available," Roberts said. "You can protect" people's rights, he added.

Roberts was pressed about a death-penalty position he took during his 1989-1993 tenure as deputy U.S. solicitor general. Roberts had argued that death row inmates have no constitutional right to ask federal courts to consider a new claim of innocence. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) asked if he still holds that view.

Roberts replied, "The question is: Do you allow someone who has raised several claims over the years to suddenly say at the last minute that somebody who just died was the person who committed the murder?"

Throughout two days of questions and answers, Roberts has offered few details about his life. But the Indiana native, who attended a private high school and graduated at the top of his class as a Harvard undergraduate and law student, grew animated when Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) asked whether he understood there were real people behind the legal precedents, "families behind footnotes." "What would the powerless, the disenfranchised, minorities and others see in your life experience that would lead them to believe that they would have a fighting chance in your court?" Durbin asked.

Roberts said his life has been comfortable but "isolated in no sense." Critics, he said, should consider the clients he represented: death row inmates and corporations, welfare recipients and environmental groups.

On the issue of abortion, Roberts declined to answer a Republican's question whether a fetus is a person or property. On Tuesday, Roberts said there is a constitutional right to privacy, but yesterday he refused to say whether he agrees with Justice Clarence Thomas, who has written that there is no "general right to privacy." Such a right is considered the legal underpinning of a right to abortion.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) returned to civil rights, disputing Roberts's contention that memos he wrote as a young administration lawyer did not necessarily reflect his own views but rather reflected those of the administration he served.

Questioned by Republicans, Roberts agreed that the Supreme Court should clarify its rulings on public expressions of religious faith. "I think everyone would agree that the religion jurisprudence under the First Amendment, the establishment clause and the free-exercise clause, could be clearer," he said. And as chief justice, he said, he would work to unite a court that has been sharply divided on many major issues.

For Roberts, Path To High Court Splits Candor, Caution (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON - As one of the most respected advocates practicing before the US Supreme Court, John Roberts held that a good lawyer should be able to argue either side of a case.

Now he's using a variation of that same strategy and all the skills he honed under intense High Court questioning to try to win Senate confirmation as the 17th chief justice of the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0005517

His plan: reveal just enough information about his approach to judging to convince the senators of his integrity and constitutional expertise - but not enough to permit someone to forecast how he might vote once on the high court.

Roberts isn't just fighting for himself. If he is successful in holding that line he will help set the stage for the president's next high court nominee - the pick that will replace centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and potentially swing the court to the right.

So far, Roberts has fended off, dodged, and sidestepped his way through a gauntlet of Senate Judiciary Committee questions involving the abortion precedent Roe v. Wade, efforts to strike down congressional enactments under the commerce clause, and the president's power to wage war independent of congressional guidance.

The bottom line: Senators - and the American public - are learning precious little about which way Roberts is likely rule as the nation's most powerful judge.

To Roberts, refusing to reveal how he might rule is important because in his view it upholds the special role of unelected, life-tenure judges in a representative democracy.

"It's based on the concern that the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court depend upon justices who will decide issues there with an open mind based on the judicial decisional process, not based on prior commitments they made during the nomination hearing," Roberts told the committee.

"All the justices have adhered to that approach," he says. "And if I'm to join their number, I need to be able to look them in the eye in the conference room and say I kept the same faith with the independence and integrity of this court."

That's the view of a judge and prospective chief justice.

But the issue looks a bit different from a seat in the US Senate, particularly on the Democratic side of the aisle, with constituents worried about threats to the abortion precedent and broad court rulings upholding civil rights.

While discussing constitutional precedents, Roberts frequently highlights both sides of the issue, leaving senators to guess which side of the argument he personally favors.

"He is doing a delicate dance trying to please everyone," says Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, which opposes the Roberts nomination. "At the end of the day people are going to walk out of this hearing room being uncomfortable."

Ms. Aron, a well-known watchdog of the judicial selection process, says Clinton high court nominees Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer were both more forthcoming than Roberts during their confirmation hearings. While many liberals are worried about Roberts's lack of candor, some conservatives seem pleased, even reassured by his cautious approach.

"We are not concerned," says Andrea Sheldon Lafferty, executive director of the Traditional Values Coalition. "We are looking for a jurist who will faithfully interpret the Constitution. We are not asking for someone who is pro-life."

Ms. Lafferty adds, "We believe he will be an honest jurist."

Roberts was repeatedly asked about his vigorous defense of White House power while serving as a lawyer in the Reagan administration. And more recently, he was a member of a three-judge appeals court panel that upheld the Bush administration's position on military tribunals for Al Qaeda suspects.

In reply, Roberts told the senator that one of the former Supreme Court justices he most admires is Robert Jackson. Justice Jackson was an advocate for White House power as President Franklin D. Roosevelt's attorney general before his nomination to the high court.

But in 1952, Justice Jackson voted to rein in presidential authority in invalidating President Truman's attempt to take over steel mills during the Korean conflict.

"Although he had strong views as attorney general, he recognized when he became a member of the Supreme Court that his job had changed," Roberts says.

The drawback of being such a gifted advocate is that it is sometimes difficult for observers to know when he is merely acting as an effective lawyer fighting to win a case and when he is speaking from the heart.

But there are moments during the hearing that point to the "real" John Roberts, and perhaps even the judge he is striving to become.

One of those moments came when he recalled one of his judicial mentors, Judge Henry Friendly who served on the federal appeals court in New York City.

DOJ_NMG_0005518

"With Judge Friendly, it was just a total devotion to the rule of law and the confidence that if you just worked hard enough at it, you'd come up with the right answers," Roberts says.

"He liked the fact that the editorialists of the day couldn't decide whether he was a liberal or a conservative."

What the editorial writers failed to understand, Roberts says, is "he wasn't adhering to a political ideology, he was adhering to the rule of law."

Nominee Sails Through Second Day Of Questions (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 15, 2005

Chief-justice nominee John Roberts sailed through a second day of inquiries from the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday, leaving some lawmakers and analysts to wonder whether President Bush's pick to fill a second Supreme Court vacancy will be able to measure up.

The full Senate could take up the nomination as early as the end of next week, according to Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn).

"Can't rule it out. Things are going well in committee," Ueland said in an e-mail.

Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy (Vt.) indicated the committee will have its executive session, to vote on Roberts, next Thursday.

Republicans have given up their right to a third round of questioning, but Democrats will go ahead. Kennedy is scheduled for this morning.

As he had Monday, the 50-year-old Roberts fielded and at times sidestepped questions with poise and humor, even as Democratic Senate heavyweights Joseph Biden (Del.) and Edward Kennedy (Mass.) pressed him repeatedly on civil rights and whether people have a right to determine when they die.

Some wondered if Roberts's composure and ability to establish his own framework for which questions to answer and which to avoid will set an artificially high bar for the next nominee.

"The next candidate's going to have a real job," said Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.), who watched the proceedings briefly.

Jeff Peck, a former Judiciary Committee general counsel and staff director under Biden and a partner at the Washington lobbying firm Johnson, Madigan, Peck, Boland and Stewart, agreed, saying, "On style points and on substance points, the next nominee's going to be in for a tough road."

Democrats again expressed exasperation at Roberts's refusal to detail how he would rule in specific cases or to reveal his personal views on many issues.

Without such answers, Biden charged, "We are rolling the dice with you, judge."

Late in the day, Roberts repeated his refrain to Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) that "judges are not politicians" and thus not in a position to make promises in exchange for votes.

With testimony from others still to come today, Roberts appears to be all but assured of committee approval and confirmation. No Republican senator has announced opposition to Roberts, and many Democrats have said they are reserving judgment.

Roberts, a judge only since 2003, has a short record as a jurist and has characterized his writings as a lawyer in Republican administrations as those of an aide responsible for backing the administration's policy. GOP supporters said potential Democratic opponents had little substantive ground on which to attack him.

"What's the biggest crime he's been accused of?" asked Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a member of the Judiciary Committee. "Working for Ronald Reagan."

Rather than criticizing Roberts for what he has said, liberal opponents have been left to attack him for playing "dodge ball," as People For the American Way did on its website yesterday.

"He really didn't tell us anything," said Ralph G. Neas, president of the group. Rather than predicting Roberts's defeat, Neas, known for his aggressive opposition to conservative nominees to the high court, has said only that he expects close votes in committee and on the floor.

DOJ_NMG_0005519

The two sides are gearing up for Bush's nomination of an associate justice to replace Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring and has been a swing vote on the closely divided court.

"Who knows what the president will do with the O'Connor seat, but clearly that is one where the balance of the court on so many critical issues will be in play," Peck said.

Former Republican National Committee Chairman Ed Gillespie, assigned by the White House to help guide Roberts through the process, predicted that the largely civil tone of the Roberts confirmation hearings would extend to Bush's next choice.

"What you've seen here is going to play out again in the next round," Gillespie said in a hallway outside the hearing room.

But Specter, a centrist who has been praised by more conservative colleagues for his conduct of the hearings, was more circumspect when asked whether the second nominee would get the same treatment from the panel.

"If you tell me who the next nominee is, I'll give you an answer," Specter said.

For some observers, the central question remaining about the Roberts nomination is how many Democrats will vote against him.

Democrats Dissect Memos From 1980s (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

As Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee try to cast doubt on whether John G. Roberts Jr. deserves to become chief justice of the United States, the main club they are wielding are his own words -- as glimpsed in memos he wrote, as a young but well-positioned legal adviser inside the Reagan revolution, on the most polarizing civil rights issues of a generation ago.

For two days, the Democrats have read excerpts -- and at times even handed the nominee copies of his own work -- on voting rights, sex discrimination, affirmative action, racial bias, and the possibility of stripping the Supreme Court of jurisdiction over certain kinds of rights cases.

To try to blunt the impact of this document assault, Roberts has employed a two-pronged strategy: He has asserted that his words and legal reasoning were merely those of a staff lawyer. And he has largely refused to embrace or disavow the views his memos espouse.

In response, as Roberts's confirmation hearings went through a third day, Democrats and their allies among liberal advocacy groups loudly contended that the memos provide a more revealing window onto the nominee's true beliefs than his testimony suggests. "He was an advocate," the Senate's most enduring liberal, Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), said in an interview. "You can't read through those memoranda and not understand that he had a very strong commitment" to conservative values.

The centrality of Roberts's decades-old words to the minority party's strategy makes clear why Democrats worked intensely -- and with limited success -- this summer to pry loose all the nominee's records from his tenure in two Republican administrations. Roberts worked as a special assistant to then-Attorney General William French Smith in 1981 and 1982, then spent four years in the White House counsel's office. He returned to the government in 1989, as deputy solicitor general under President George H.W. Bush.

Lacking papers from his solicitor general's years -- the current Bush administration has refused to release them -- and with a thin record of rulings from Roberts's two years as a federal appellate judge, Democrats are drawing their ammunition from the early Reagan era.

Those were tempestuous years on civil rights, as the conservatives who had entered the government tried to curtail use of the courts to remedy discrimination. "They were flipping the script with respect to whose interests they were going to protect," said Theodore M. Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, which is opposing Roberts. "He was in the thick of it."

During the past two days, some of the most extensive questioning of Roberts's memos stems from his work on voting rights. In 1982, following a Supreme Court ruling two years earlier, Congress altered the Voting Rights Act to make clear that the law prohibited voting practices that had the effect of denying any groups the ability to elect candidates of their choice, regardless of whether the practices were specifically intended to have that effect. During Roberts's time in the attorney general's office, the Reagan administration opposed that change, preferring a more restrictive standard that outlawed intentional voting discrimination.

On Tuesday, Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) attempted to press Roberts on memos he had written on the topic. "Senator, you keep referring to what I supported and what I wanted to do," Roberts replied. "I was a 26-year-old staff lawyer. It was my first job as a lawyer after my clerkships. I was not shaping administration policy."

Yesterday, Kennedy returned to the theme of voting rights, challenging Roberts about the last paragraph of a four-page memo in which Roberts had written that the broader "effects" standard "is not only constitutionally suspect, but also contrary to the most fundamental tenets of the legislative process on which the laws of this country are based." Kennedy asked whether Roberts believes that today.

After a lengthy series of questions, Roberts replied, "And I have no basis for viewing it as constitutionally suspect and I don't." He declined, however, to indicate his views on an extension of the voting rights law.

In a similar vein, the committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), questioned Roberts about a 1983 memo concerning the proper role of the Supreme Court, in which he had suggested that the court was overburdened and should consider fewer appeals of death penalty cases.

Leahy asked: "Are you saying that judges are just too busy to pay attention to death cases?" Roberts replied that he was not.

Yesterday afternoon, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) cited a memo co-written by Roberts that had criticized the solicitor general's office for not filing a brief on behalf of Texas in a 1982 case in which the Supreme Court ruled that the state could not forbid illegal immigrants from attending public elementary schools.

Roberts replied that he had been "making the point that the position was inconsistent with the attorney general's litigation policy approach." When Durbin asked what he thought of that case today, Roberts said he had not looked at it in 23 years.

At one point, Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) asked in exasperation: "You have . . . suggested on numerous occasions that the things that you represented in writing or in an opinion back in the '80s and into the '90s . . . were in many cases the opinions of people for whom you worked, not necessarily your own. I assume, therefore, there are those opinions that you're prepared to disavow?"

Roberts replied: "My view in preparing all the memoranda that people have been talking about was as a staff lawyer. I was promoting the views of the people for whom I worked, and in some instances those are consistent with personal views, and in other instances they may not be.

"In most instances, no one cared terribly much what my personal views were. They were to advance the views of the administration for which I worked."

Roberts Backs Eminent Domain Limits (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr. told senators yesterday that laws restricting the government's power of eminent domain are legitimate, despite a landmark Supreme Court decision earlier this year that broadly expanded that authority.

"The court was not saying, 'You have to have this power, you have to exercise this power,' " Judge Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "That leaves the ball in the court of the legislature."

Judge Roberts, nominated to be the next chief justice of the Supreme Court, finished a second day of testimony yesterday with a few flare-ups, but no major upsets.

The hearings have been so devoid of fireworks that Senate staffers are having a hard time keeping the limited public seating area filled. There also have not been the major protests that normally accompany Supreme Court confirmation hearings.

Judge Roberts is slated to sit before the committee for a final round of questions this morning at the request of Democrats on the panel.

DOJ_NMG_0005521

Yesterday, several Democrats commended the nominee for his performance thus far, but none has indicated that he or she will vote to confirm him. The committee vote is scheduled for next Thursday, and many observers speculate that his nomination will be sent to the full Senate on a straight party-line vote.

"You are one of the best witnesses that, I think, has come before this committee," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., a Delaware Democrat who has been one of the most combative questioners of Judge Roberts.

"If people can't vote for you, then I doubt that they can vote for any Republican nominee," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican.

One of the most closely watched Democrats is Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat who voted in favor of Judge Roberts for his position on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. She said she will vote against Judge Roberts for the Supreme Court, however, if she determines that he would overturn Roe v. Wade, the court decision that established federal abortion rights.

She told Judge Roberts that he'd spoken "eloquently" about Roe.

"I learned a lot from listening to you," she said. "You discussed the right to privacy. You were very full and forward-speaking."

Then Mrs. Feinstein inquired whether the White House also had applied an abortion litmus test when it selected Judge Roberts for nomination.

"Has anyone -- when you were being interviewed for this position -- ever asked your opinion on Roe?" she asked, to which he responded in the negative.

"OK. That's good to know," she added.

As on the previous day, Judge Roberts repeatedly declined -- to the great irritation of several senators -- to answer questions about particular cases or issues that might come before the Supreme Court.

"Without any knowledge of your understanding of the law -- because you will not share it with us -- we are rolling the dice with you, judge," said Mr. Biden, after failing to prod Judge Roberts into discussing "right to die" issues.

"Senator, that's asking me for an opinion in the abstract on a question that'll come before the court," Judge Roberts told Mr. Biden. "And when that question does come before the court, the litigants before me are entitled to have a justice deciding their case with an open mind based on the arguments presented, based on the precedence presented."

In a different exchange, Judge Roberts said his confirmation is not a "bargaining process."

"Judges are not politicians," he said. "They cannot promise to do certain things in exchange for votes."

The matter of the eminent domain case, however, proved safer waters for Judge Roberts.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, had asked Judge Roberts about the court decision in Kelo v. City of New London, in which the Supreme Court ruled 5-4 that the government could take private property from one owner and give it to another.

Previously, eminent domain was restricted to cases in which the property was acquired for public use. Under the new parameters, eminent domain could be invoked if it is merely thought that the new owner could generate more tax revenue.

The ruling triggered a national outcry from both liberals and conservatives. Judge Roberts said yesterday that he was "surprised" by the ruling.

"In, you know, the first year in law school we all read the decision in Calder against Bull, which has the famous statement that the government may not take the property of A and give it to B," he said.

Judiciary Panel Peppers Nominee With Pet Issues (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

With federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr.'s confirmation appearing more likely, members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have resorted to using the hearings to lobby the nominee about their own favorite issues.

Senators have pressed their views on the prospective chief justice about televising Supreme Court proceedings, the right to die and abortion, among other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0005522

"Are you against cameras in the courtroom like [Chief] Justice [William H.] Rehnquist was?" Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican and longtime advocate of televising Supreme Court proceedings, asked bluntly.

Judge Roberts -- sensing the prickly territory -- made a lighthearted reference to former Sen. Fred Thompson, the Tennessee Republican and television star who has been ushering him through the confirmation process.

"Well, you know, my new best friend, Senator Thompson, assures me that television cameras are nothing to be afraid of," he responded, before adding that he does not have a "set view" on the matter, but would listen to colleagues if confirmed.

After establishing that the opposite of being alive is being dead, Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, went on to impress upon Judge Roberts his own view of abortion.

"I won't press you on this issue," Mr. Coburn said. "But for the listeners of this hearing, if in fact life is the presence of a heartbeat and brain wave, it's important for everybody in the country to know that at 16 days post-conception, a heartbeat is present. At 41 days, right now we can assure ourselves, that brain activity and brain waves are present."

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, took issue with the "denigrating comments" Supreme Court justices make about Congress. In particular, he was galled by one decision that ruled a law of Congress unconstitutional for its "method of reasoning."

"Do we have your commitment that you won't characterize your method of reasoning as superior to ours?" Mr. Specter asked in a tone that wasn't terribly inquisitive.

"I don't think it's appropriate," Judge Roberts responded.

For good measure, Mr. Specter added: "I take umbrage at what the court has said, and so do my colleagues. There isn't a method of reasoning which changes when you move across the green from the Senate columns to the Supreme Court columns."

But not all such exchanges were so friendly.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, took the opportunity to lecture Judge Roberts about his own views of whether Congress has any say in whether feeding tubes are removed to allow a patient to die.

"My family faced -- I'm sure many people in this audience's families faced a difficult decision -- of deciding when to no longer continue the application of artificial apparatus to keep your father or mother or husband or wife or son or daughter alive," he explained. "It's of great moment to the American public."

Judge Roberts, as he had many times before, said it would be improper for him to discuss a matter pending before the Supreme Court.

Nominee Sees 'Room' For Bigger Caseload (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Judge John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday revealed one way his management of the Supreme Court could differ starkly from his predecessor and mentor William H. Rehnquist: The number of cases the court takes on is likely to increase.

Under Chief Justice Rehnquist, who began his tenure in 1986, the average high court caseload dropped from about 150 to 80 cases a year -- a trend Judge Roberts appeared intent on reversing during exchanges yesterday.

"I do think there's room for the court to take more cases," Judge Roberts told Sen. Herb Kohl, Wisconsin Democrat, although he couched the remark by first saying, "It may be a view I'll have to be educated on further if I am confirmed and I'm not stating it as a solid view."

In an earlier exchange with Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, Judge Roberts noted that the justices "handled twice as many cases 20 years ago than they do today, and I think the capability to address more issues is there on the court."

While legal scholars agree more cases would significantly alter how the high court does business, there are varied theories of why the caseload decreased so dramatically during the Rehnquist years.

Through much of its history, the Supreme Court was required by Congress to hear certain cases appealed from lower courts. Congress abolished this "mandatory jurisdiction" law in 1988, effectively doing away with about 20 cases a year.

DOJ_NMG_0005523

The caseload has since been set by the justices, who pick -- or "grant certiorari" to -- the cases they wish to hear from about 6,000 petitions filed with the Supreme Court annually by individuals seeking review of their cases at the highest level.

During the shift toward conservatism under Chief Justice Rehnquist, liberal lawyers grew more reluctant to petition the Supreme Court "because of the potential for an adverse ruling," says Richard C. Reuben of the University of Missouri School of Law.

"While they may have lost at the court of appeals, they figured that was just one circuit," Mr. Reuben said.

Stephen Wermiel of American University's Washington College of Law agreed, but added the phenomena was only "one of several factors" behind the shrunken caseload.

With Supreme Court and lower federal court appointments filled by the Reagan and first Bush administrations, a conservative Supreme Court "would feel that there were fewer cases that they needed to review because the federal appeals courts were more in line with the Supreme Court's thinking," Mr. Wermiel said.

Another reason was simply that Chief Justice Rehnquist "was a very efficient administrator," said Mr. Reuben. "The quality of the workmanship in Supreme Court opinions, I think improved as a general manner. The opinions were less rushed, they were crafted better."

Judge Roberts' remarks on the issue yesterday were unexpected because they strayed from a memo he wrote as a White House lawyer in 1983 to then Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, strongly urging the high court to reduce its caseload -- specifically by hearing fewer death penalty cases.

Now Right Demanding Dem Memos (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 15, 2005

Conservative strategists are drafting a letter to Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee demanding the release of hundreds of internal memos detailing contacts between the lawmakers and liberal interest groups opposing John Roberts's nomination to the Supreme Court.

By planning to press Democrats on the sensitive subject, conservatives seem to be pulling a page from the Democrats' own political playbook. In the weeks leading up to the confirmation hearings, Senate Democrats have repeatedly called on the White House to give them memos Roberts penned while he was deputy solicitor general in President George H.W. Bush's administration.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), the ranking member on the Judiciary Committee, raised the issue again yesterday by releasing a letter dated Sept. 9 from William Moschella, the assistant attorney general. In the letter, Moschella declined to disclose legal memos from Roberts's tenure in the Office of the Solicitor General.

"It is regrettable that the Bush administration persists in keeping this information from the Senate," Leahy said. "These documents, from the period of Judge Roberts's most substantive work experience in the executive branch, would help illuminate his views and earlier decisions on a wide range of key issues that are of vital importance to the American people and to the Senate."

In their letter, conservatives quote Leahy's argument that the Senate should have access to the withheld documents. In the letter, they assert that the public is equally entitled to know what is motivating and directing Senate Democratic scrutiny of Roberts, according to a verbal summary given to The Hill.

"Given your demand that the Justice Department hand over John Roberts's work documents during his time as deputy solicitor general, you should have no reservations about approving the release of the full complement of documents that make up all of the Memogate papers," conservatives wrote in a draft of the letter, which will be circulated for signatures starting today. About 30 conservative leaders or more are expected to sign it.

A spokeswoman for the Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee declined to comment without first seeing a copy of the letter.

Specifically, conservatives want access to what they estimate may be as many as 4,000 Democratic memos that are in Senate Sergeant at Arms William Pickle's possession. Last year, Pickle seized Senate Judiciary Committee computers during an investigation. Democrats on the committee called for the probe after internal memos written by aides to Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) were made available to the press without Kennedy's or Durbin's consent.

The publicized memos detailed contacts between leading liberal members on the committee and groups that lobbied them on President Bush's judicial nominees.

In their letter to Democrats, conservatives plan to argue that the memos are not protected by attorney-client privilege, giving them a stronger claim to the documents, they assert, than the Democrats have to the solicitor general's documents. Roberts's defenders have argued that a solicitor general's relationship to a president is akin to an attorney-client relationship and deserves special privilege.

Mark Levin, president of the Landmark Legal Foundation, a conservative public-interest-litigation firm, said that he was familiar with the letter and plans to circulate it.

"I fully support it," he said. "I've always thought that the Congress and the Senate Judiciary Committee in particular gets away with a hypocritical standard. They demand that the executive branch produce everything, and yet on the other hand they refuse to make anything public."

Kay Daly, president of Coalition for a Fair Judiciary, a conservative group defending Roberts, said she was aware of the letter.

"There are some 4,000 memos locked away in the sergeant at arms' office that the public has a right to know about," she said.

Daly said that the since the taxpayers' fund the salaries of lawmakers and their aides they have a right to know about their work.

Conservatives said their case is bolstered by a memo sent by the Senate archivist to all Judiciary Committee staff members instructing them to preserve all documents and e-mails related to Roberts's confirmation proceedings, including correspondence with outside groups. Conservatives cite the archivist's message to support their claim that the internal memos held by the sergeant at arms should be made part of the public domain.

Jeff Lord, who served as associate political director in the Reagan administration from 1985 to 1988 and is working with Progress for America, a pro-Roberts advocacy group, has called for the Democratic memos to be made public during recent trips to Washington state and North Dakota. He traveled to those states to promote a new book he has written about the contentious 2002 Senate confirmation battle over Judge Brooks Smith's appointment to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Lord called the memos "some of the most revealing things I've ever seen while in government," adding that the evidence of coordination between Democratic senators and third-party groups in the memos made public was "eye-opening."

One of the publicized memos, by a former aide to Kennedy and dated April 2002, reported that Elaine Jones of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund had asked Democrats to postpone the nomination of Judge Julia Gibbons to the 6th Circuit court until a key case on affirmative action had been decided. Conservatives consider it one of the most damning of the publicized batch.

The memo was downloaded from the Judiciary Committee server and made public in 2003.

In Roberts Hearing, Specter Assails Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - Senator Arlen Specter's testy interrogation of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. on the Supreme Court's treatment of Congress may well have left viewers scratching their heads on Wednesday morning, with cryptic references to the "congruence and proportionality test" and to unfamiliar case names like "Lane and Hibbs."

But the line of questioning that Mr. Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is Judiciary Committee chairman, chose to pursue offered a window on the increasingly troubled relationship between the court and Congress, as well as on one of the most consequential developments of the Rehnquist court's later years.

In a series of decisions, many written by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist himself, the court declared unconstitutional acts of Congress that had been passed by broad bipartisan majorities.

DOJ_NMG_0005525

Laws permitting public employees to sue state employers for discrimination on the basis of disability and age, and also giving women access to federal court to sue rapists for damages, ran up against the court's new definition of the limits on Congress's power and the justices' insistence that they alone have the final word in interpreting the Constitution.

"I take umbrage at what the court has said, and so do my colleagues," Senator Specter told Judge Roberts.

From 1995 to 2003, the Supreme Court overturned all or parts of 33 federal statutes, 10 of them on the ground that Congress had exceeded its authority either to regulate interstate commerce or to enforce the constitutional guarantees of due process and equal protection. Until then, the modern court gave Congress wide berth to define its own role under both of the Constitution's relevant provisions, the Commerce Clause and the 14th Amendment.

Senator Specter took particular exception to the court's conclusion in several of the cases that Congress had not compiled an adequate record showing the existence of the problems the statutes sought to solve.

He said that leading up to the passage of the Violence Against Women Act, for example, "there were reports on gender bias from the task forces in 21 states, and eight separate reports issued by Congress and its committees over a long period."

In United States v. Morrison, the court's decision in 2000 that overturned the private-lawsuit portion of the statute, Chief Justice Rehnquist said that "Congress's findings were weakened by the fact that they rely so heavily on a method of reasoning that we have already rejected," namely that various instances of violence against women could be added together to demonstrate an impact on the nation's economy sufficient to bring the subject within Congress's authority over interstate commerce.

Turning to Judge Roberts, nominated to succeed the late chief justice, Senator Specter said, "Do we have your commitment that you won't characterize your 'method of reasoning' as superior to ours?" The nominee demurred and, in fact, was so cautiously nonresponsive as to leave the senator to continue with what amounted to a monologue.

"There isn't a method of reasoning which changes when you move across the green from the Senate columns to the Supreme Court columns," Mr. Specter said. "And we do our homework, evidenced by what has gone on in this hearing. And we don't like being treated as schoolchildren, requiring, as Justice Scalia says, a taskmaster." Then he demanded, "Will you do better on this subject, Judge Roberts?"

"Well, I don't think the court should be taskmaster of Congress," Judge Roberts replied. "I think the Constitution is the court's taskmaster, and it's Congress's taskmaster as well. And we each have responsibilities under the Constitution."

Senator Specter's reference was to a dissenting opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia in a decision last year, Tennessee v. Lane, which permitted states to be sued under the Americans With Disabilities Act for failing to provide accessible courtrooms. On the surface, at least, the decision conflicted with a 2001 ruling, Board of Trustees v. Garrett, which gave states immunity from lawsuits by their employees under the same law.

Justice Scalia, who had joined the majority in the 2001 case, said the conflicting results showed the "judicial arbitrariness" of the court's approach. "It casts this court in the role of Congress's taskmaster," he said.

Justice Scalia objected to the requirement the court has placed on Congress to show that its legislative approaches are "congruent" with, and "proportionate" to, the problem it is seeking to address.

Mr. Specter asked Judge Roberts: "Isn't this 'congruence and proportionality' test, which comes out of thin air, a classic example of judicial activism? Isn't that the very essence of what is in the eye of the beholder, where the court takes carte blanche to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional?"

Judge Roberts started to reply that in its two most recent cases in this series, the Lane case from Tennessee and another case, Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs, the court had shifted gears and rejected constitutional challenges to the laws in question. The Hibbs case, from 2003, allowed suits against states under the Family and Medical Leave Act.

But no sooner had Judge Roberts started to explain "Lane and Hibbs," than Senator Specter cut him off: "But Judge Roberts, they uphold it at the pleasure of the court. Congress can't figure that out. There's no way we can tell what's congruent and proportional in the eyes of the court."

Mr. Specter asked Judge Roberts if he agreed with Justice Scalia's critique of the "congruence and proportionality test." The nominee declined to say, noting that another such case is on the docket for the coming term.

That case, United States v. Georgia, scheduled for argument on Nov. 9, raises the question of whether prisoners can sue states under the disabilities act, as Congress intended.

DOJ_NMG_0005526

Senator Specter was not satisfied, but it was clear that he knew the dialogue was over. Before turning to a less freighted subject - how the nominee would, as chief justice, lead the other justices, all of whom are his elders - he made one last try.

"Judge Roberts, I'm not talking about an issue," he said. "I'm talking about the essence of jurisprudence. I'm talking about the essence of a man-, woman-made test in the Supreme Court which has no grounding in the Constitution, no grounding in the Federalist Papers, no grounding in the history of the country. It comes out of thin air."

Group Pushes Specter To Back Roberts (HILL)

By Peter Savodnik

The Hill, September 15, 2005

The anti-abortion-rights group Concerned Women for America (CWA) is applying pressure on Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) to back Supreme Court Chief Justice nominee John Roberts.

"When it comes time for the committee to vote, Chairman Specter's promise of fairness should lead him to the inescapable conclusion that it couldn't possibly be fair not to vote for this exceptionally qualified nominee," said the CWA chief counsel, Jan LaRue.

She acknowledged that "I've been very tough on Senator Specter … but fairness requires me to applaud him for running a full and fair hearing, as he promised to do."

The CWA statement appears to dispel some concerns voiced by Republicans on Capitol Hill that Roberts had alienated some conservatives with his statements on abortion and judicial precedent.

Brownback Outlines Terms For Next Pick (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 15, 2005

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) said Wednesday that he would like the next Supreme Court nominee to have a detailed track record opposing the Roe v. Wade decision, as opposed to the relatively limited record on abortion issues held by Judge John Roberts.

While Brownback expects to support Roberts as President Bush's pick for chief justice of the United States, he warned that he and many in the conservative movement would like the nominee to replace retiring Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to have a clearer record of opposing abortion rights than Roberts.

"I'd like to see it take place," Brownback said in between his first and second round of questioning of Roberts at the Judiciary Committee's confirmation hearings.

While Democrats and liberal activists have grown increasingly weary of Roberts' refusal to answer detailed questions about Roe and the right to privacy, Brownback voiced frustration of his own at the nominee's unwillingness to go much further in response to GOP questions on the matter.

"Democrats should be happy," Brownback said, only half-jokingly.

Brownback's veiled criticism of Roberts' record on the divisive issue of abortion could resonate for months, as the Kansan is considering running for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008 as the conservative anti-abortion candidate.

In the short run, it could make the selection of the next nominee to the high court even more difficult for Bush, as some Democrats appear to have withheld their sharpest political fire on Roberts and instead are concentrating on the nominee who succeeds the swing-voting O'Connor.

Brownback said Bush owes it to the millions of conservative voters who heard him say he would pick nominees similar to Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas — two favorites of anti-abortion activists.

"It really is what the election was about, and Bush ran on it and Kerry did not," Brownback said of Sen. John Kerry's (D-Mass.) presidential campaign.

To date, the Bush White House has done little if any consultation with Senators on the second Supreme Court choice. Aides to Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said they are unaware of any substantive conversations Specter has had on the topic with White House officials.

And there has been no indication from the White House when the next pick will be announced.

DOJ_NMG_0005527

Edward Gillespie, the former Republican National Committee chairman who is serving as an unpaid White House adviser for the Roberts nomination process, said that the views of Brownback and many other Senators will be heard in the selection process, noting that more than 70 Senators were consulted before Roberts' nomination was announced.

"In the consultation process, I'm sure those views will be heard," he said of Brownback.

Gillespie, who is not involved in the selection process for the second pick, said he expects the president to live up to his pledge to pick justices "in the mold of Scalia and Thomas."

"I have no doubt the president will do what he said he would in two presidential elections," he said.

Roberts has been an active lawyer since the early 1980s, first in the Reagan and Bush administrations and then in private practice before taking a seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. However, his writings on Roe v. Wade have been limited, leaving his liberal opponents with just a couple of pieces of evidence to presume that he would be an anti-abortion justice.

In particular, they have pointed to his tenure in the Solicitor General's office, when he signed a 1991 brief in a pivotal Pennsylvania abortion case saying that Roe v. Wade was wrongly decided.

In addition, in a memo from his early days in the Reagan administration, he referred to a "so-called" right to privacy.

Under questioning from Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and others, Roberts seems to have left some wiggle room concerning how he would rule on such cases. Most conservatives remain pleased with Roberts, but many still fear his appointment could turn out as badly for conservatives as President George H.W. Bush's appointment of Justice David Souter, who eventually voted to uphold Roe v. Wade when the Pennsylvania abortion case, Planned Parenthood v. Casey, was decided in 1992.

In his questioning Wednesday morning, Brownback sought to elicit a bit more on his views on the matter, asking the nominee: "Could you state your view as to whether the unborn child is a person or is a piece of property?"

Roberts declined to answer the question, saying that the issue may come before him on the court and he didn't want to give any hints as to how he'd rule.

Manuel Miranda, a former Senate GOP leadership aide, sent conservative activists an e-mail Wednesday warning that the second pick should come from a crop of candidates who have either ruled on the issue on state courts or written on the matter. He noted that William Rehnquist won confirmation as chief justice in 1986 even though he was one of two justices to rule against Roe in 1973.

"When the President promised he would appoint judges like Scalia and Thomas, it was not their views on the Clean Sewers Act that he was trying to signal to us — it was code for Roe. He knew it, we knew it," wrote Miranda, who resigned his Senate post 20 months ago during an internal chamber investigation about whether he had improperly accessed Judiciary Committee memos.

Miranda now runs Third Branch, a group devoted to confirming conservative jurists to the federal bench.

Brownback said that he has not spoken to White House officials about the next Supreme Court selection, but indicated that he's made plain that he wants someone with a clearer record on Roe.

"I have communicated that, but I have not talked directly to [White House] individuals," he said.

As he closed his second round of questioning with Roberts on Wednesday evening, Brownback told the nominee that there was much pressure on him. "A lot of hopes and prayers are riding on you," he told Roberts.

"May God bless you," Brownback added.

How Conservative Is Judge Roberts? (NYT)

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

It's not surprising that the Senate hearings for Judge John Roberts Jr. are turning out to be about how conservative he would be as the next chief justice of the United States. But there is a twist. It is the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee who want to make sure that he would be conservative in the true sense: respectful of tradition, and not seeking to impose radical new rules. The key question is whether he would stand by established legal precedents on issues like abortion, civil rights, the environment and the power of Congress, or would seek to push the law in a drastically different direction.

DOJ_NMG_0005528

Judge Roberts's record, on the bench and off, puts him well to the right end of the ideological spectrum. As a Reagan administration lawyer, he argued for a very narrow interpretation of the Voting Rights Act. As an appeals court judge, he wrote an opinion in an Endangered Species Act case that suggests he may have a very cramped view of Congress's power. The documents about his past legal work that have become public contain some troubling passages, notably his assertion that abortion rights are based on a "so-called 'right to privacy.' "

Responding to questions, he has talked at length about his commitment to civil rights, privacy and Congressional authority. He told Russell Feingold, the Wisconsin Democrat, that "the gains under the Voting Rights Act have been very beneficial in promoting the right to vote, which is preservative of all other rights." He emphasized that the Reagan administration had favored extending the act, whatever its differences with voting rights groups over the details. He told Joseph Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat, that he believes the Constitution prohibits discrimination against women, and he endorsed the test the court now uses in such cases.

He told Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican, that Roe v. Wade is "settled as a precedent of the court" and "entitled to respect" under the legal principle that a court's past rulings should be given deference. He also said he recognizes the existence of a constitutional right to privacy and agrees with the principle of the 1965 case striking down the laws against selling birth control devices, that "marital privacy extends to contraception and availability of that."

These are good things to hear, but there's reason for concern. He did not say he agrees with Roe, for instance, only that it is entitled to deference. That is a truism: all of the court's decisions are entitled to such deference, but some are reversed anyway. Judge Roberts waved away questions about troubling statements in his older legal memos, saying he was just a staff lawyer in his 20's when he wrote them. But he and the White House have refused to release more recent memos, from his time in the solicitor general's office, which might give a better picture of his views as a mature lawyer.

Senate Democrats have two goals. Before Mr. Roberts, now 50, becomes chief justice for life, they want to try to determine that he does not hold far-right views on important issues. It is a determination that many senators seem not to have made yet. Senator Biden, for one, complained about the "Kabuki dance" of the hearings and worried out loud, saying, "We are rolling the dice with you, judge."

No less important, Senate Democrats are putting down markers for the next judicial battle. President Bush will soon nominate a replacement for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who has been an important swing vote on the court. Democrats have been calling for Justice O'Connor to be replaced with another centrist Republican. By subjecting Judge Roberts to tough questioning, they are sending a message that if President Bush chooses a far-right nominee, he can expect a major fight.

Judge Roberts Speaks (WP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

In his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee over the past two days, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. shed important light on his views and likely approach if confirmed as the Supreme Court's chief justice. To the apparent frustration of some Democrats on the committee, he declined, as nominees traditionally do, to give his specific opinion of the merits of matters that could come before the court. But he spoke with surprising clarity on several issues and displayed an agile legal mind and an appealing ability to disagree constructively, both characteristics of a good chief justice. While Americans still lack a road map to how he will handle the many important matters the court will face, Judge Roberts is less of a sphinx than he was at the time of his nomination.

The nominee affirmed that he regards stare decisis -- the doctrine of generally allowing even erroneous past decisions to stand -- as a critical foundation of the American legal system. While he rightly pointed out that precedents sometimes need to be overruled, his position distinguishes him from more radical conservatives such as Justice Clarence Thomas, who regards the doctrine as having limited value in constitutional cases. Those who might disagree with Judge Roberts's views have some assurance that he will not seek to rewrite large swaths of modern American law.

Judge Roberts made clear that he believes the Constitution contains a right to privacy, and he expressed his agreement with high- court decisions striking down bans on contraception. While he declined to address the merits of Roe v. Wade , he did indicate that it is a decision to which stare decisis considerations properly apply. Importantly, he said several times that the subsequent decision in Planned Parenthood v. Casey -- which reaffirmed Roe's core principle -- was independently entitled to be treated as a precedent. That implies that there would be a heavy burden for the court in upsetting abortion rights now. Judge Roberts was careful not to say what he would do, but his comments suggest that he appreciates the difficulty of eliminating a right the court has solemnly declared, and redeclared, in the past.

He was less clear concerning the balance of power between the federal government and the states, a subject on which his writings have been ambiguous and in some respects troubling. Still, he expressed a healthy regard for the foundations of federal power and an appreciation of the need for the courts to defer to congressional expertise. There is no reason to assume Judge Roberts will be more radical on federalism questions than either the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist or retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Concerning his memos as a young lawyer in the Reagan Justice Department, Judge Roberts's answers varied considerably. He generally did not back off the substance of his memos on civil rights issues, but, rather, he stressed that the positions in question were those of the administration -- leaving ambiguous his own stance now. He did, however, retreat somewhat from his embrace of legislation to limit the jurisdiction of the courts. He also treated the court's jurisprudence on religion and public life with far greater respect than he did as a young man. His clear statement that only law, not religious faith, will govern his decisions was welcome.

The cumulative impression is of a cautious, incremental conservative, unlikely to unmask himself as a liberal once on the bench but unlikely as well to try to impose his own political agenda.

Roberts Comes Off As No Conservative In Scalia-Thomas Mold (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, September 15, 2005

It's about as certain as anything that John Roberts will be the next chief justice of the United States, but it's anything but certain where he'll come out ideologically.

That should be encouraging to moderates and liberals and discouraging to conservatives, who expected President Bush to appoint a justice in the mold of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, whose views are seldom in doubt.

Liberal interest groups and Democratic Senators ought to be using the standard Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) applied to Roberts: If he's not an "extremist" conservative and "out of the mainstream," he ought to be confirmed.

If that's the test, Roberts surely passed it, judging by his early performance before the Senate Judiciary Committee. But the interest groups and, apparently, the main body of committee Democrats, still seem set to oppose him.

If a majority of Senate Democrats follow their lead, assuming no damning evidence surfaces before a confirmation vote, it will brand the party as ideologically driven and out of the mainstream itself.

Polls show that Roberts has made a highly favorable impression with the public. And both his history and performance more than fulfill the traditional requirements of a Supreme Court justice: intelligence, fair-mindedness, a judicial temperament and the respect of his professional colleagues.

Roberts specifically declared that he would not bring an "overarching philosophy" to the court and would "look at cases from the ground up rather than the top down."

He said he is a "modest judge" who will interpret law and not make it, who values precedent, who respects the views of his colleagues and who will not allow his personal opinions to sway his judgments.

Roberts may be a conservative, but he's not a rigid, big-C conservative ideologue. And, assuming he's being honest, he's not going to be the activist hoped for by the right and feared by the left.

Roberts' memos from the Reagan era do suggest a smart-alecky conservative possibly on his way to big-C status, as in his reference to a "so-called right of privacy" in the Constitution.

But Roberts is now 20-plus years older, and he went out of his way to inform the committee that he admires the late Justice Robert H. Jackson, once Franklin D. Roosevelt's attorney general, who changed his mind as he changed his job.

It's also a good sign of Roberts' maturity and open-mindedness that he told students at Wake Forest Law School in February that he's found being a federal appeals court judge far harder than he had anticipated.

"I kind of thought that in most of the cases, it would be pretty obvious ... that this person should lose, this person should win and you'd spend most of your time writing opinions," he said.

"I've found that I have to spend more time than I thought just getting to the first step — what the right answer should be," he said. "It's not at all unusual to have one view when you finish reading the briefs, a different view when you sit down with your clerks, another after oral arguments and you're back to a different view after the conference [with other judges].

"Then as you go through the writing process, you come up with either the original view, a third view or the second view." Can anyone imagine Justices Thomas or Scalia not knowing from the get-go how he'll rule?

When asked by a student several months before he was nominated who his favorite justices were, he did not name Scalia and Thomas — Bush's favorites — but rather Jackson, Felix Frankfurter, John Marshall Harlan, William Brennan and his mentor, William Rehnquist.

And it's just conceivable that Roberts might end up a justice ideologically more in the mold of Anthony Kennedy, a swing conservative, than even Rehnquist.

Kennedy wrote the court's plurality opinion in the 1992 Planned Parenthood v. Casey case, upholding Roe v. Wade, and sided with liberals in striking down state laws discriminating against gays.

Kennedy also voted with conservatives on some states' rights and capital punishment cases and on Bush v. Gore after the 2000 election. Roberts disagrees with Kennedy's frequent crediting of foreign precedents, but he seems to share Kennedy's open-mindedness.

Roberts rigorously refused to forecast his views on possibly pending cases, but he did indicate strongly that he's no automatic vote to overturn Roe, as right-wingers expect from a Bush appointee.

In answer to searching questions from Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), Roberts demonstrated strong respect for the doctrine of stare decisis — that is, following precedent. Specter said that Roe had been revisited by the court in 38 cases since 1972 without being reversed.

Roberts concurred that breaking precedent constitutes "a jolt to the legal system" and that "it's not enough that you might think the precedent is flawed to justify revisiting it."

He certainly cited theoretical grounds for revisiting precedents — such as unworkability or erosion of the precedent — but right-wingers are expecting a reversal on the mere grounds that the case was "wrongly decided" to begin with.

Roberts also departed from the right-wing line by saying that "the right to privacy is protected under the Constitution in various ways" and that "the court — in a series of decisions going back 80 years — has recognized that personal privacy is a component of the liberty protected by the due process clause."

A right of privacy was a key basis for the Roe decision, and big-C conservatives routinely say it's nowhere to be found in the Constitution, much as Roberts did back in 1981.

In response to Roberts' first-day testimony, a coalition of liberal groups, Independentcourt.org, put out a press release accusing him of moving "from dodging to dishonest."

Judiciary Committee Democrats issued a joint statement saying that Roberts "didn't answer questions." Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) practically shouted, "You've told us nothing," because Roberts wouldn't disclose his personal feelings about life and death.

But, assuming he's not dissembling, Roberts has in fact told Congress a lot: that he's fully qualified to be chief justice, that he'll look at cases fairly and without prejudgment and that he's no ideologue.

Democrats have no way to block him, since the "Gang of 14" agreement takes the filibuster out of play. They have a decision: Let him through and concentrate on Bush's next appointee, or oppose him and brand themselves as mere agents of their interest groups.

Dean Of The Democrats (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

No, not Howard. The Dean whom Democrats have tapped to represent them at John Roberts's confirmation hearings this week is John W. Dean III, White House Counsel to President Nixon and one of the architects of the Watergate coverup.

DOJ_NMG_0005531

This isn't the first time Mr. Dean will be appearing in the Caucus Room of the Senate's Russell office building. In 1973, he sat at the witness table during the Watergate hearings and testified about a "cancer on the Presidency." This was shortly before he spent two years in jail for obstruction of justice.

This paragon of the law is now a columnist for FindLaw.com, where he has been writing articles opposing Mr. Roberts's confirmation. Specifically, he wants the White House to release Mr. Roberts's documents from his time in the Solicitor General's office -- presumably the reason he's turned up on the Democrats' witness list. (He has a conflict on Thursday and will appear if the hearings are extended to Friday, says a spokeswoman for Senator Pat Leahy, the Committee's ranking Democrat.)

In other words, the Democrats are using a man who will go down in history for facilitating a Presidential coverup to make the case for open government. Meanwhile, they ignore six Solicitors General from several administrations, Democrat and Republican, who have said publicly that the Roberts documents are covered by attorney-client privilege and should be kept confidential. So: a bipartisan group of law-abiding SGs vs. a convicted felon and Watergate enabler? You make the call.

Bush, Annan Tout The Role Of The U.N. (LAT)

By Maggie Farley And Warren Vieth

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

UNITED NATIONS — In a rare show of unity after a bruising week for the U.N., President Bush joined U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan on Wednesday in saying that no country can stand alone against the 21st century challenges of terrorism, disease and natural disasters.

Both leaders also chided the world body's member nations for blocking key reforms aimed at making the United Nations more able to tackle those challenges, even though many diplomats felt the U.S. was one of the countries responsible.

But Bush also surprised delegates by reversing U.S. stances on trade and development that had nearly scuttled weeks of negotiation on the reforms.

"To spread a vision of hope, the United States is determined to help nations that are struggling with poverty," Bush said. "We are committed to the Millennium Development Goals."

Those goals include cutting poverty and hunger in half, ensuring universal education and stemming the spread of AIDS by 2015.

"In this young century, the far corners of the world are linked more closely than ever before, and no nation can remain isolated and indifferent to the struggles of others," Bush said in a keynote speech at the opening of the three-day World Summit.

In an address that was at once global and aimed at home, Bush noted that the United States was in the unusual position of receiving aid from abroad after Hurricane Katrina, and thanked the 115 nations that had offered money and help.

"The world is more compassionate and hopeful when we act together," Bush said. "This truth was the inspiration for the United Nations."

Although Washington had endorsed the eight Millennium Development Goals at the 2000 summit and again in the so-called Monterrey Consensus statement, U.S. negotiators feared that targets related to the goals would require the U.S. to increase foreign aid.

The goals were restored at the last minute in a U.S.-crafted compromise that saved the talks from collapse.

Nonetheless, delegates and U.N. officials had not expected Bush to publicly endorse the goals in front of more than 150 world leaders.

"That was a big deal," said Mark Malloch Brown, Annan's chief of staff and the former head of the U.N. Development Program. "They are not standing in the way of it, and that is real progress."

Some diplomats saw Bush's emphasis on development as an attempt to defuse the sentiment here that the United States was one of the spoilers of the summit document, which now falls far short of Annan's original ambitions.

Or, quipped one diplomat, perhaps Hurricane Katrina made him suddenly aware of the dire effects of poverty.

Reversing another U.S. negotiating stance, Bush also called for the removal of trade barriers and farm subsidies that prevent poor nations from selling their goods.

DOJ_NMG_0005532

"The United States is ready to eliminate all tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same," he said.

Bush and Annan expressed their disappointment that a summit accord passed grudgingly by the General Assembly on Tuesday did not go further.

The stripped-down document omits key proposals on nuclear disarmament and trade and defers details on human rights, terrorism and U.N. reform.

World leaders are expected to adopt it Friday, the last day of the summit.

Bush aimed his strongest criticism at the failure to establish criteria for membership in a new human rights council to replace the U.N. Human Rights Commission, which has included among its members alleged violators such as Libya and Sudan.

"When this great institution's member states choose notorious abusers of human rights to sit on the U.N. Human Rights Commission, they discredit a noble effort and undermine the credibility of the whole organization," Bush said. "If member nations want the United Nations to be respected and effective, they should begin by making sure it is worthy of respect."

Annan expressed greater concern about the failure to include in the final document any reference to nuclear disarmament and nonproliferation, calling it "our biggest tragedy and our biggest failure." The Bush administration opposed language that called for nuclear powers to reduce their weapons stockpiles.

In what appeared to be a jab at the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, Annan cautioned, "Even the strongest among us cannot succeed alone…. We cannot succeed without the leadership of the strong and the engagement of all."

Compared with previous Bush speeches in which he demanded that the U.N. confront Iraq or stand aside, Wednesday's address seemed almost conciliatory.

"He found the themes that resonate with the international community," said Jean-Marie Guehenno, the head of peacekeeping at the U.N. "The emphasis on poverty and development was certainly noticed and welcomed."

But what Bush didn't mention — Afghanistan, Sudan and the Middle East — also resonated. The president did not focus on the U.S. use of power, or the U.N. role in rebuilding new governments and societies that have been disrupted by conflict.

After his address, Bush met with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. In brief remarks to reporters, he praised Sharon's courage in removing Israeli settlers from the Gaza Strip.

The president then participated in a meeting of the U.N. Security Council, which adopted a resolution banning the incitement of terrorism and calling for action to share intelligence, restrict cross-border movement and freeze financing for terrorist organizations.

Human rights groups fear the wide-ranging resolution could be used to censor inflammatory media and deport political opponents cast as extremists.

Separately, Bush signed a new international accord to deter nuclear terrorism and participated in the launch of the U.N. Democracy Fund, designed to help developing nations build democratic institutions.

Bush Challenges World To Drop Trade Barriers (REU-Y2)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, September 15, 2005

U.S. President George W. Bush told a U.N summit on Wednesday he was willing to drop all trade barriers if other countries did the same, issuing a challenge that could invigorate critical talks on world trade.

Trade experts saw little chance of the pledge becoming a reality but some said the attention Bush gave to trade in his speech could spur interest in the World Trade Organization talks on trade and development, known as the Doha Round.

"The United States is ready to eliminate all tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same," Bush told other leaders.

"The elimination of trade barriers could lift hundreds of millions of people out of poverty over the next 15 years."

DOJ_NMG_0005533

Bush said the stakes were high for a successful conclusion to the Doha talks, which aim to lower trade barriers for everything from farm goods to services and foster economic growth in the poorest countries. He devoted a full three paragraphs to Doha in a 25-minute speech.

With a deal needed by the end of next year, the Doha Round is entering a crucial stage. Negotiators need to make substantial progress at a WTO ministerial meeting in Hong Kong this December to keep the round alive.

The talks have suffered from a lack of high-level interest, which makes Bush's comments significant even though they mean little on a practical level, said Greg Mastel, trade adviser at the law firm Miller and Chevalier in Washington, DC.

"It's an offer that will never be taken up," Mastel said. "Other countries are not likely to drop their trade barriers any time soon."

He noted such a move would not be politically feasible in the United States, where protectionist policies are popular for industries such as steel but even more so agricultural goods.

Disagreements over how much to cut farm subsidies and tariffs are the biggest obstacles to a new world trade deal. However, the negotiations are also bogged down on issues linked to trade in services and industrial goods.

"I strongly endorse the spirit of (Bush's) remarks and I think that it's important that somebody like the president should give this amount of attention to the round," European Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson told reporters after meetings in Washington on farm trade.

The United States and the European Union both generously subsidize their farmers, but are striving to reach agreement in coming months on how far to cut their subsidies and tariffs.

How much other countries, such as Brazil and India, are willing to scale back their own protection for farmers will also be an important element of final WTO deal.

"It's rhetorical but it's important as a political signal that the president is willing to push the envelope on trade further than the conventional wisdom of the Congress," said Jeffrey Schott, senior fellow at the Institute for International Economics, a Washington think-tank.

As an example of the difficulty of the politics of trade liberalization in Congress, Schott pointed to the tough fight it took Bush to secure passage of the Central America Free Trade Agreement.

Mastel said talk had been circulating that the Bush administration might be ready to offer a proposal to phase out all industrial tariffs eventually, also an ambitious goal but perhaps more feasible than the one Bush spoke of at the U.N.

At U.N., Bush Links War On Terrorism To Anti-Poverty Efforts (WP)

By Peter Baker And Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 14 -- President Bush, reaching out to an audience he has antagonized in the past, told the assembled leaders of the world Wednesday that the United States shared "a moral duty" to combat not only terrorism but also the poverty, oppression and hopelessness that give rise to it.

Addressing the United Nations, Bush linked his campaign against terrorism to the anti-poverty agenda advanced by other nations, although he shied away from adopting some of the specific commitments sought by allies. He later took the U.S. seat at the Security Council for the first time in his presidency to emphasize his solidarity with other countries in the struggle against terrorism.

"We must help raise up the failing states and stagnant societies that provide fertile ground for the terrorists," Bush said at the gathering of more than 150 presidents and prime ministers on hand to mark the 60th anniversary of the world body. "We must defend and extend a vision of human dignity and opportunity and prosperity, a vision far stronger than the dark appeal of resentment and murder. To spread the vision of hope, the United States is determined to help nations that are struggling with poverty."

Arguing that trade can lift hundreds of millions of people out of poverty, Bush pushed for a new global trade agreement and for the first time vowed to drop all U.S. tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to foreign goods if other countries do the same. He also urged other nations to join U.S. efforts to fight AIDS and malaria, and he launched a new international partnership to address the spread of avian flu.

Paying special notice to perennial conflicts that leave much of the world destitute, Bush said the United States would train 40,000 African peacekeeping troops over five years "to preserve justice and order in Africa." And he marked the inception of a new U.N. democracy fund to promote greater liberty around the world.

"The lesson is clear," Bush said. "There can be no safety in looking away or seeking the quiet life by ignoring the hardship and oppression of others. Either hope will spread or violence will spread, and we must take the side of hope."

On the sideline of the U.N. events here, Bush also met for 35 minutes with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to congratulate him on the withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and to challenge the Palestinians to reciprocate. "I know it was hard, but I admire your courage," Bush told Sharon in front of reporters. The president added: "Now is the time for Palestinians to come together and establish a government that will be peaceful with Israel."

Bush's two-day visit here focused his attention back on world affairs at a time of domestic crisis along the Gulf Coast. Many of his counterparts expressed their sympathy following the death and devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina; more than 115 countries have offered assistance. Comparing Katrina to the tsunami that killed hundreds of thousands in South Asia last year, Bush said the outpouring of compassion this month showed that the world is better "when we act together."

The rhetorical nod to international harmony contrasted with past visits by Bush to the United Nations that were marked by bitter disagreement over the war in Iraq. Since his reelection last year, Bush has worked to heal those wounds and has adopted a more multilateral approach to sensitive issues such as Iran's nuclear program.

His approach Wednesday generated a far warmer reaction among U.N. officials and foreign delegates than previous appearances, when he lectured countries about their responsibility to fight terrorism and stand up to North Korea and Iraq. Diplomats praised Bush's embrace of targets known as the Millennium Development Goals to dramatically scale back poverty, child mortality and disease, although he did not endorse proposals to spend 0.7 percent of national income on international aid, four times more than current U.S. spending.

"It was a different tone," said Chile's ambassador, Heraldo Muñoz. "Before, it was all about terrorism. Although this speech had an unavoidable component on terrorism, it went well beyond. He expressed . . . renewed trust in the United Nations, and I feel many leaders welcomed that."

At the same time, Bush was trailed around U.N. headquarters by his ambassador, John R. Bolton, a longtime U.N. critic who was sent here with a temporary recess appointment after Senate Democrats blocked his confirmation. Bolton has clashed with diplomats here over efforts to make the United Nations more efficient and accountable.

When Bush was greeted by Secretary General Kofi Annan on Tuesday, U.N. closed-circuit television showed the president joking about the tension over Bolton, who once suggested it would make no difference if 10 floors of the U.N. building disappeared. "How is he behaving?" Bush asked. "Has the place blown up?"

A 35-page declaration on poverty and U.N. reform completed this week did little to overhaul the organization in the way Washington wants, but Bush publicly credited Annan for trying. "We have made a solid start," he said in a toast. "More work remains."

U.N. officials sought to counter the impression that weeks of hard negotiations had yielded a scaled-back document that would have little impact. The declaration, to be endorsed by world leaders attending a summit on Friday, includes the first unqualified U.N. condemnation of terrorism "by whomever, wherever and for whatever purpose." It also constitutes the first public commitment by the full U.N. membership to take responsibility for protecting people from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity. The declaration does not legally obligate governments to intervene in places such as the Darfur region of Sudan, but it will increase political pressure on countries to do so.

As it has during many of Bush's visits here, terrorism dominated the agenda, coming on a day when more than 160 people were killed and hundreds more injured by a wave of bombings and rocket attacks in Baghdad. Many of the leaders sitting with Bush at the Security Council, including Russian President Vladimir Putin and Chinese President Hu Jintao, did not support the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

But they agreed with Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair to adopt the resolution calling on nations to crack down on the incitement of terrorism.

"The terrorists must know that wherever they go they cannot escape justice," Bush said, adding, "We must send a clear message to the rulers of outlaw regimes that sponsor terror and pursue weapons of mass murder: You will not be allowed to threaten the peace and stability of the world."

This Year, Bush Takes A Different Tone With The U.N. (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 14 -- Three years ago, making the case for confronting Iraq, President Bush said the United Nations would sink into irrelevancy if it failed to act at a "difficult and defining moment." But, addressing the U.N. General Assembly on Wednesday, the president struck a strikingly different tone, praising the "vital work and great ideals of this institution" and its efforts to take the "first steps" toward managerial and structural reforms.

A year ago, in the same venue, Bush denounced terrorists as people who believed "the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the American Bill of Rights and every charter of liberty ever written are lies, to be burned and destroyed and forgotten." Bush condemned terrorism in this year's speech as well, but with a twist -- he explicitly linked defeating terrorism to changing "the conditions that allow terrorists to flourish."

"We must help raise up the failing states and stagnant societies that provide fertile ground for the terrorists," Bush said.

Bush then ticked off a series of U.N.-sponsored initiatives to help promote human dignity and prosperity, saying the United States has a "moral duty" to join in the effort. In effect, Bush used the speech to marry the United Nations' goals of defeating poverty and disease with his vision of fighting terrorism by promoting democracy.

Since the start of his second term, Bush has tried hard to reach out to a world that has been dismayed with the foreign-policy choices and actions of his first term. He has traveled four times this year to Europe, the heart of anti-Bush attitudes, though polling by the German Marshall Fund has indicated that the charm offensive thus far has failed to resonate with many Europeans.

The United Nations refused to back a war against Iraq, but apparently it did not become irrelevant either. Bush's speech Wednesday lacked the confrontational tone of his previous addresses here, and he reached out for common goals and objectives. Bush even lingered to participate for the first time in a session of the U.N. Security Council and then joined other world leaders for a meal.

"May the U.N. embody the high ideals of its founding in the years to come," Bush said in a toast.

Interestingly, Bush did not mention the looming confrontation with Iran over its nuclear programs, even though the United States is leading the drive to bring the matter to the Security Council as quickly as possible. Instead, French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin -- who as foreign minister in 2003 had clashed heatedly with U.S. officials over the invasion of Iraq -- played the heavy in his own speech. He warned Iran that it faces referral to the Security Council if it fails to meet its obligations under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Unlike last year's address -- when Bush was trying to woo his conservative base during a presidential campaign -- the president did not mention trafficking in humans or the conflict in Sudan, two issues of importance to evangelical voters.

Skipping a chance to be confrontational, Bush also referred only obliquely to the Iraq oil-for-food scandal that has tarnished the world body -- and he skipped lightly over the fact that the General Assembly on Tuesday agreed to a watered-down document intended to guide the reforms that U.S. officials say are necessary for the United Nations.

Bush was also significantly less defensive about conditions in Iraq, nearly three years after the invasion. Two years ago, he all but demanded that the world join in helping rebuild that shattered nation. Yesterday, he simply said: "No civilized nation has an interest in seeing a new terrorist state emerge in that country."

Bush used his speech to explain why, in his view, democracy thwarts the growth of terrorism. "Democratic nations uphold the rule of law, impose limits on the power of the state, treat women and minorities as full citizens," he said. "Democratic nations protect private property, free speech and religious expression."

DOJ_NMG_0005536

Writing in the current issue of Foreign Affairs, F. Gregory Gause III said that a review of academic literature and statistics finds little evidence that democracy stops terrorism. Gause, a political science professor at the University of Vermont, noted that the State Department's records show that, between 2000 and 2003, India, the world's most populous democracy, had 203 terrorist attacks while, China, the world's most populous authoritarian state, had none. One study cited by Gause found that "most terrorist incidents occur in democracies and that generally both the victims and the perpetrators are citizens of democracies."

Bush Thanks World Leaders And Takes Conciliatory Tone (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 14 - President Bush, facing an array of world leaders who are deeply divided on how to define terrorism or act against nuclear proliferation and poverty, struck a conciliatory tone at the United Nations on Wednesday, describing himself as the grateful leader of a superpower that in recent days has received emergency aid from nations around the world.

His speech, at the opening of a United Nations session that drew more than 150 presidents, prime ministers and monarchs, came hours after the General Assembly greatly watered down what had once been ambitious plans for institutional change and for commitments to fight terrorism and nuclear arms.

But Mr. Bush only alluded to the leaders' differences, and his tone was far more muted than three years ago, when he urged the United Nations to confront Saddam Hussein.

On Wednesday, from the same podium, he balanced his discussion of the need to chase down terrorists with his endorsement of a set of antipoverty objectives called the millennium development goals. Only weeks ago, the administration had proposed eliminating all reference to the specific goals from the United Nations' agenda this week, but the administration subsequently backed off. Rather than declare, as he had in the past, that countries had to choose to be "with us or against us" in battling terrorists, Mr. Bush cast himself as the leader of one of many nations fighting the same plague.

"No nation can remain isolated and indifferent to the struggles of others," he said in a hall that remained, by tradition, largely silent. "When a country or a region is filled with despair and resentment and vulnerable to violent and aggressive ideologies, the threat passes easily across oceans and borders and could threaten the security of any peaceful country."

Mr. Bush began his speech by thanking 115 countries and a dozen international organizations for offering aid to victims of Hurricane Katrina, putting him in the unaccustomed position of being the recipient of help from abroad - including from countries like Iraq. "I offer the thanks of my nation," he said.

Secretary General Kofi Annan seemed to allude to American vulnerability in a speech earlier in the day, noting, "Whether our challenge is peacemaking, nation-building, democratization or responding to natural or man-made disasters, we have seen that even the strongest among us cannot succeed alone."

That seemed to set the tone for Mr. Bush, who arrived politically injured. His approval levels among Americans are at record lows, with the aftermath from Hurricane Katrina raising questions about the administration's abilities to respond to a major disaster, and with Iraq facing violence on a scale few predicted three years ago. But even with close to 150 people killed in Iraq just hours before he spoke, Mr. Bush stuck to his message of optimism about democratic revolution in the Middle East.

"It's an exciting opportunity for all of us in this chamber," he told the leaders, many of whom opposed his decision three years ago to go to war and have steered clear of Iraq since.

Nonetheless, American officials traveling with Mr. Bush said that they wondered how successful the White House would be in allocating more reconstruction aid for Iraq now that the hurricane damage will soak up so many American resources. "It seems clear," said one senior official traveling with Mr. Bush, "that the days of American largess for Iraq are coming to a close."

At his toughest on Wednesday, Mr. Bush seemed to scold the United Nations for failing to enact change on the scale discussed for more than a year. "The United Nations must be strong and efficient, free of corruption, and accountable to the people it serves," he said, adding that it "must stand for integrity, and live by the high standards it sets for others."

He described the effort to improve the operations of the organization as in its infancy, adding: "The process of reform begins with members taking our responsibilities seriously. When this great institution's member states choose notorious abusers of human rights to sit on the U.N. Human Rights Commission, they discredit a noble effort, and undermine the credibility of the whole organization," apparently a reference to Sudan, Zimbabwe, Cuba and Libya.

"If member countries want the United Nations to be respected - respected and effective - they should begin by making sure it is worthy of respect," Mr. Bush concluded.

He pressed for a Security Council resolution committing countries to prosecute - and extradite - anyone seeking fissile materials or the technology for nuclear devices.

On Tuesday, Mr. Annan said the exclusion of language in goals on countering nuclear proliferation was a "disgrace" that compounded a similar failure at a spring United Nations conference on the future of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

But Mr. Bush did not repeat his previous calls to bar any new country from producing enriched uranium or plutonium - a plan the administration has done little to promote over the past year and a half.

In his references to the goals for poverty reduction, he cited not only the millennium development goals but also another initiative that grew out of a summit meeting in Monterrey, Mexico. There, poor nations agreed to fight corruption and improve governance, and rich nations committed to "make concrete efforts" toward giving 0.7 percent of their national income in aid. Mr. Bush did not address the aid issue, but advocates said they hoped his endorsement of Monterrey would make it harder for the United States to continue to oppose such aid targets.

Jeffrey D. Sachs, the economist who led the millennium project, said in an interview that Mr. Bush's support "was as explicit and plain as could be." As to Mr. Bush's mention of the millennium goals, he said, "As far as I know, the president has never uttered that phrase before."

The Security Council also passed a resolution calling on countries to ban incitement to terrorism and prevent subversion of educational, cultural and religious institutions by terrorists and their supporters. The measure was offered by Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain in a move paralleling his government's response to bombings in London in July.

The seats around the horseshoe panel were filled by the leaders attending the United Nations summit meeting, and among those raising hands in approval were Presidents Bush, Vladimir V. Putin of Russia, Hu Jintao of China, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil, and Gloria Macapagal Arroyo of the Philippines.

"We must unite not just in condemning the acts of terrorism, which we all do, but in fighting the poisonous propaganda that the root cause of this lies with us, not them," Mr. Blair said. Citing the bombings Wednesday in Baghdad, he called it "obscene" for terrorists to claim to be acting in response to Western aggression against Muslims. "Their victims are largely Muslim," he said.

Rights groups in Britain have protested the government's crackdown since the bombings, and the New York-based Human Rights Watch criticized Wednesday's resolution for failing to define incitement.

"The resolution's sponsors have made it easy for abusive governments to invoke the resolution to target peaceful political opponents, impose censorship and close mosques, churches and schools," said Kenneth Roth, the group's executive director.

Bush Calls On U.N. To Fight Poverty, Terror (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2005

President Bush urged the members of the United Nations on Wednesday to unite in the war on terrorism and to push for the spread of democracy and prosperity in Iraq and the Middle East.

“We have a solemn obligation to defend our citizens against terrorism, to attack terrorist networks and deprive them of any safe haven,” Bush told the World Summit in New York. “No nation can remain isolated and indifferent to the struggles of others.”

With Bush casting the U.S. vote, the U.N. Security Council unanimously passed a resolution that condemns the incitement of terrorism and calls for all nations to take “appropriate action” to fight such incitements. “Appropriate action” was not defined.

Declaring that poverty breeds despair and terrorism, Bush challenged world leaders to abolish trade tariffs and subsidies to promote prosperity and opportunity in poor nations, a move that would be worth billions of dollars.

“There can be no safety in looking away or seeking the quiet life by ignoring the hardship and oppression of others,” Bush said. “Either hope will spread, or violence will.”

Court lifts curbs on Aruban suspects in Holloway case

DOJ_NMG_0005538

A court ruled Wednesday that three suspects in the disappearance of an American teenager in Aruba can remain free without conditions, overturning an earlier decision that restricted their travel.

The appeals court ruled there was a “lack of sufficient grounds and serious suspicions” to keep the restrictions on Joran van der Sloot and brothers Deepak and Satish Kalpoe, the Aruban prosecutor's office said. They remain suspects in the May 30 disappearance of Alabama teenager Natalee Holloway, the prosecutor's office said.

Bombmaking instructions at issue in Belfast trial

Arabic instructions on how to detonate a bomb hidden in a baby's milk bottle could be used to destroy an aircraft in midair, a U.S. explosives expert testified in the trial of an Algerian man accused of links to the al-Qaeda network.

Abbas Boutrab, 32, is charged in Belfast, Northern Ireland, with possessing 25 computer disks filled with instructions on how to build compact bombs and other weapons and how to smuggle them aboard passenger aircraft.

Donald Sachtleben, an FBI explosives expert, testified that he built and successfully detonated three bombs based on the instructions found in Boutrab's home. Boutrab says he downloaded the material from the Internet out of curiosity.

In U.N. Talk, Bush Urges Nations To Fight Poverty, Open Up Trade (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK -- President Bush urged world leaders to band together to combat poverty, terrorism and disease, while eliminating barriers to trade.

Mr. Bush's remarks before the United Nations General Assembly came three years after he used the same setting to lay the ground for the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. He began his speech yesterday noting the "awesome power of nature" that was Hurricane Katrina, and thanking the more than 115 countries that offered the U.S. aid "in this hour of need."

Amid declining approval ratings, Mr. Bush plans to interrupt several days of diplomacy to give a nationwide address on Katrina this evening from Louisiana, before returning for a meeting tomorrow with Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Mr. Bush traveled here with several aims. The U.S. hopes to build support from China, Russia and other nations to bring Iran's nuclear program before the Security Council, and to keep up pressure on North Korea through the six-party talks under way in Beijing. Mr. Bush and his aides also have used the gathering to push for other goals, such as health programs and trade.

President Bush repeated a pledge that he would move to eliminate all tariffs and agricultural subsidies within the current global round of trade talks if other countries agreed to do the same. He also stepped up calls for Asian countries to increase their vigilance against the spread of avian flu, which he warned could become "the first pandemic of the 21st century."

The Security Council afterward approved a British-sponsored resolution urging countries to adopt laws prohibiting "incitements to terrorism," a move that some civil-rights groups say could offer countries legal cover to crack down on dissent. U.N. members resisted pressure from Washington to agree to a definition of terrorism.

The Bush administration came under some criticism for declining to endorse a widespread push to enlarge the permanent core group of countries within the Security Council, from five member nations to as many as nine. The U.S. had backed the idea of Japan joining the five veto-wielding countries, but didn't support including Brazil, Germany and India.

Efforts to enlarge the Security Council were part of a broad push to overhaul the U.N., which devolved this week into a package of relatively small changes. Developing countries blocked a move to give more power to the secretary-general's office, while others eliminated a section on nonproliferation and disarmament.

There was also dismay over Bush administration attempts to drop any mention of specific targets for aid to developing countries. The U.S. is the largest aid giver in dollar terms but among the lowest among rich countries as a percentage of its overall economy.

In his speech, Mr. Bush surprised developing countries by unequivocally committing to U.N. goals to end global poverty by 2015, which could mean a trebling of U.S. aid.

Bush Hits U.N. Corruption (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK -- President Bush yesterday implored the United Nations to rid itself of corruption and scolded the global body for squandering the world's respect and making a mockery of human rights.

"When this great institution's member states choose notorious abusers of human rights to sit on the U.N. Human Rights Commission, they discredit a noble effort and undermine the credibility of the whole organization," Mr. Bush told the U.N. General Assembly.

In past years, Libya and Sudan have served on the commission.

"If member countries want the United Nations to be respected and effective, they should begin by making sure it is worthy of respect," he said.

Although Mr. Bush did not mention the multibillion-dollar oil-for-food debacle that has rocked the United Nations, he called on the world body to move past scandal.

"The United Nations must be strong and efficient, free of corruption and accountable to the people it serves," he said. "The United Nations must stand for integrity and live by the high standards it sets for others."

The president also used yesterday's speech to thank U.N. member nations for donating money to Hurricane Katrina relief efforts.
